It was not often that Ivor Grant left his rooms in Piccadilly before late noon, unless some of the arduous duties of the Household Cavalry required his attendance at a levée or review. But he had risen at the unwarranted hour of nine this morning, and, declaring that the heat indoors was unbearable, strolled out, cigar in mouth, to the utter confounding and amazement of Burke, his personal attendant and faithful body-guard, the said Burke having been brought up on his uncle's estate, and apportioned to Mr. Ivor's service since his days at Eton.

His master meanwhile strolled through the streets somewhat moodily. He had come out with no very definite idea why, only that the heat seemed unbearable, and now he felt himself acknowledging that it was infinitely worse out of doors than in. He turned abruptly out of Regent Street, and on through Hanover Square.

A string of carriages impeded his progress, and attracted his attention. He glanced down towards the fashionable church, and a girl's light words rang in his ears:

"I am going to join the noble army of martyrs."

"By Jove!" he thought breathlessly. "Could it be—she?"

The carriages were driving up and putting down their freight of dainty millinery and martyred manhood. That instant's hesitation of his had brought him to a standstill on the edge of the pavement. Another carriage dashed up. Just as rapidly as he seemed to take in the fact that it was the bride's, so did he also take in the knowledge of who the bride was.

A beautiful pale face—more beautiful still with its shroud of gossamer lace and sprays of orange-blossoms—and two deep, soft eyes met his gaze for one rapid moment. He could scarcely tell whether she had recognised him—there had been no time to bow—when the carriage moved on and he was free to follow his intention of crossing the road and proceeding to Grosvenor Square.

He proceeded.

"It was true then," he said to himself. "What infernal tomfoolery weddings are!"

"I, Beryl, take thee, John, to my wedded husband."

Like one in a dream the girl found herself repeating the formula of the marriage ritual. She was perfectly self-possessed. Too much so, some of her friends thought, who deemed that tears and nervousness were a sine quâ non for a bride.

The words her lips framed fell like a dull echo upon her heart, and gave her a strange feeling of unreality, a sort of wonder that, often as she had heard them, she had never in any way grasped their full meaning.

Did marriage really mean so much? A lifelong love, an unimpeachable fidelity, an earnest resolve to keep those vows that sealed the bond, in letter and in spirit?

It must mean all this. Why had she never thought of it before? And why did she think of it now, and, as she so thought, see only two startled, pleading eyes looking back at her, and the figure of a man outlined against the sunny streets—a man whose six feet of height and fair, handsome face bore little resemblance to the short, plain-featured individual fidgeting so nervously at her side?

She grew irritated and impatient at herself. She found she had not heard a sentence of the clergyman's exhortation, and yet the word "amazement" cut short her thoughts and recalled her to a sense of her position. On her finger gleamed a thick gold band; jubilant strains of music were pealing through the church.

There was a stir and bustle, and she was leaning on John's arm now, and following the clergyman to the vestry. She roused herself with a start, and strove to realise her new condition.

Everyone was congratulating her and kissing her, and her father's eyes were dim and yet happy. The wish of his life was accomplished, and his child's future assured.

Alas! alas! is human nature ever but the blindest thing that calls wisdom its own, when it arrogates to itself the right to order the destiny of others?

Beryl met her father's gaze, and smiled, but the smile was dreamy and absorbed. She did not yet feel as if she had come to herself. And why was it that, look where she might, she only saw that one figure outlined against the sun?

Ah, if we could comprehend the mysteries of our nature, the warnings that come to us, and are only disregarded or ignored, would our lives be the blundering, reckless things they too often are?

It scarcely seemed possible then to Beryl to associate this vague unrest, this sudden sense of sorrow and regret, with the fact of a chance meeting, a face only seen twice, a voice only heard once. But long, long afterwards she remembered, and, remembering, understood.

CHAPTER IV. "WE SHALL SEE."

IN the pleasant morning-room at Grantham Court two people were sitting at breakfast.

A woman with a proud, sad face that bore traces of care and anxiety, and a man of some sixty years, handsome, hale, hearty, good to look at still, despite the handiwork of time.

The morning post had come in, and they were both busy with their correspondence. Mrs. Grant was the first to break the silence. She laid down her letters, and looked across at her brother-in-law, her usually calm face lighted up with expectation and delight.

"Ivor is coming at last," she said. "He will be here on the eleventh."

"Ah," said Sir Hector Grant, dropping the sheet in his hand, and meeting her delighted glance with delight as great, "that is good. Whom does he bring?"

"Young De Grey—he was here last year, you know—and a Captain Forsyth, and two other friends whose names I don't know. One is a foreigner, I think. Count—Count something. I can't read it. See if you can make it out."

"What hieroglyphics the boy does use," laughed his uncle, as he ran his eyes over the hasty scrawl Ivor had penned. "Count—"

What in Heaven's name is it? No, I can't make it out. No matter. Ivor's friends are always welcome. He has the good taste only to bring those worth knowing. He doesn't say much about himself, I see."

"No," answered Mrs. Grant. "His letters lately have been very reticent. But, of course, he is so much occupied."

"I don't know that the duties of the service are very arduous," laughed her brother, "although the fellows declare them so. Well, I shall be glad to see our boy again. It's a long time since he was here."

Mrs. Grant hurried away to give orders to the housekeeper, and personally superintend the arrangement of rooms for her idol.

He was her idol, and she knew it. Sole fruit of a loveless marriage, the one tie that had bound her to life when life looked dreary beyond expression, it was no wonder that the long choked springs of her nature gushed out in fresh, warm, living waters at the cry and touch of her first-born. Widowed but two years after his birth, she devoted herself entirely to him—loving him passionately—trying to associate her own mind with such things as pleased him—putting her own weak fondness aside at such times as correction and discipline demanded, and atoning for hard-won harshness by yet more adoring tenderness afterwards. As Sir Hector was a childless widower, and Ivor his only possible heir, he persuaded the boy's mother to take up her abode with him at the Court, and here it was that most of Ivor's youth had been passed. He went to college at seventeen, distinguishing himself by constant "plucks," a general disregard of the classics, and a fondness for late hours and wine-parties.

But then he won the coveted position of "stroke" in the Oxford eight, and kept it for three famous victories, and assured his mother that such an honour was worth all the "double firsts" he might have won had he been so disposed.

Meanwhile athletic exercise had developed him into the model type of a young Englishman. A superb figure bespeaking nerve and muscle, graceful as it was strong, and telling of capabilities of "pulling up stream," or doing fifty miles across country, that made many a burner of the midnight oil envious.

He was not worse than most of his sex and age under similar circumstances, though certainly not much better. But he had never committed a dishonourable action, never contracted debts he could not pay out of his uncle's liberal allowance, and altogether enjoyed life as heartily and heedlessly as all manly youth enjoys it, when gifted with splendid health, unflagging spirits, and a purse into whose depths they can fearlessly dive.

The life of youth has been not inaccurately described as "a champagne-cup with aconite lying at the dregs." However that may be, Ivor Grant had managed to quaff pretty deeply without tasting the bitterness. From college he had entered the Household Cavalry, and lived the brilliant, useless, ornamental life of one of its pet "lions" for many a London season.

If at the present time he felt a little inclined to cry vanitas vanitatum, it was scarcely from the fault of even a crumpled rose-leaf, certainly not because life had been in any way unkind. As a surfeit of sweets makes one doubly enjoy a plain dish, so, perhaps, a long course of flattery and idleness had awakened in Ivor Grant's breast a longing for something simpler and more wholesome. The fact of being able to see life in any form he chose probably divested such liberty of its charms. Opposition and inaccessibility are the sauce piquante of life; take them away, and it becomes flat, wearisome, disappointing. So Ivor Grant suddenly bethought himself of an adoring mother, the delights of "covers" awaiting his gun, the peace and beauty of the country, the utter freedom and enjoyment of life at the Court, and resolved to run down there for a month. Before going, however, he dispatched another missive to his mother, more brief even than its predecessor. It simply said: "On no account ask any women."

Mrs. Grant read it, and wondered. Ivor's rare visits were usually the signal for a brilliant house-party, and now he wished to have no one. She consoled herself by saying, "No matter, I shall have him all to myself," and her eyes brightened, and her cheeks flushed, and happiness brought such tender beauty to her face, that she looked quite youthful as she stood in the vast entrance-hall waiting to welcome her son.

Wheels were heard. The great deer-hound, stretched before the oak fireplace, rose and bayed loudly in welcome. There was a sound of voices—of eager manly steps. Then the beloved voice rang out in the familiar greeting, "Well, mother?" and Ivor, who was far too affectionate a son to heed conventionalities, took the still graceful figure in his arms, and kissed her again and again before he introduced her to his friends.

Three men stood apart in the shadows of the great hall, but as Ivor turned, two of them stepped quickly forward.

Mrs. Grant welcomed them warmly, and Sir Hector did the same. Then Ivor's voice continued the introduction, "My mother—Count Savona," and she bowed and raised her eyes. They met a dark, scrutinising glance, saw a pale oval face, with jet black hair, and a cold, smiling mouth. For an instant she turned as white as death, and the hand she had stretched out to the stranger fell to her side. The lights and shadows seemed reeling before her, the hum of voices, as the group drew round the fireplace, sounded deafening as a brazen trumpet's blast. Then rapidly she recovered herself. Her eyes looked bravely—almost defiantly—at the dark, watchful face.

"I am pleased to see you, count," she said in clear, unflinching accents. "Pray come nearer the fire, the evenings grow chill."

A footman entered with tea on a silver tray. She seated herself by the little table where he placed it. Ivor crossed to her side, and bent fondly over her. No one had noticed that momentary agitation. Her voice was steady, her face composed. She poured out the tea, and handed the dainty china cups without the slightest tremor of the white hands.

The count leaned against the massive oak chimney-piece, and smiled furtively beneath his heavy moustache.

"A clever woman," he thought to himself; "she braves it out well. But we shall see—we shall see."

"May I give you some tea, count?" said the clear, well-bred voice of the hostess.

He bowed low.

"With pleasure, madame."

CHAPTER V. IN THE AUTUMN WOODS.

MRS. GRANT sat by her dressing-room fire, awaiting the signal of the dinner-bell.

She had dismissed her maid, and was expecting her son, to whom she had sent a message. Her face was very pale, and the paleness seemed intensified by the black velvet dress she wore. Her beautiful white hair was dressed high on her head in the style of Marie Antoinette, and covered with a tiny square of filmy lace. Some rings glittered on her delicate hands. She wore no other ornament.

The usual proud composure of her expression was now anxious—almost terrified. She leant over the fire and shivered from the nervous fears that oppressed her.

Ordinarily calm and self-controlled, except to her son, in whose presence she delighted to show herself loving and womanly, this strange and unwonted agitation would have surprised anyone who had witnessed her usual demeanour.

But when she heard Ivor's step she made an effort at composure, though a faint nervous flush tinged her cheeks, giving a new and rare beauty to her usually cold and colourless face.

Her son threw himself into a low chair beside her own, and smiled benignly as he met her wistful glance.

"Well, mother, and how have you been all this time?"

It was his usual question, as much a matter of form as the conventional "How d'ye do?" which we all use and scarcely ever answer. But Ivor always described himself as being "not good" at conversation.

Mrs. Grant scarcely seemed to hear the familiar interrogation. She stretched out one delicate ringed hand for a small screen, and, shading herself from the fire's somewhat obtrusive attentions, said:

"My dear Ivor, what made you bring a foreigner here in the shooting season? You know they can never understand a gun."

"On the contrary, my dear mother," laughed Ivor gaily, "the noble British institutions of 'le sport' and 'la boxe' are becoming quite popular among our neighbours. Why, I met a Frenchman lately who assured me that no Parisian lady of fashion was happy unless she possessed a 'bouledogue.' We call them pugs, but there is a family resemblance."

Mrs. Grant did not smile. The fire was still engrossing her attention. The hand-screen was moving from side to side as if she had confused its usage with that of a fan.

"Have you known him long?" she asked abruptly.

"The Frenchman? No, not very long; he's a most amusing fellow. I had a great mind to ask him down, only—"

An impatient movement brought the hand-screen down upon the tiled hearth. Ivor stooped and picked it up.

"No damage done," he said lightly, "But, as I was saying—"

"I did not mean the Frenchman," interrupted his mother, with unusual impatience. "I meant this—this count."

"Oh, Savona! No, I've not known him long. He was everywhere this season. The women rave about him. He is a sort of universal genius. I met him at Duchess May's; you know, your little protégée who married—"

"Yes, yes," said Mrs. Grant, "I know all that. But I hope this man is all right. I mean—"

Her son's astonished glance stopped her.

"My dear mother, what has come to you? Of course he's all

"It won't require much daring," said Ned. "It will be done, I swear to you. So now choose. Will you stay here and find yourself arrested within an hour, or will you sign a paper acknowledging your guilt, and then go straight away to America? I give you two minutes to make up your mind."

Chambers did not take the two minutes; he gave in at once, seeing that Ned was in earnest. Ned drew up a paper in which Chambers undertook never to return to England, and confessed that Mr. Fowler's share in the embezzlement was solely to screen his defalcations.

Mr. Fowler in the meantime carefully watched him, trying hard to recognise in this fine, middle-aged man traces of the youth who had involved him in so much misery. Travel and exposure had, however, so changed him that it was evident he ran no risk in returning to the town where he had rendered himself liable to prosecution.

The paper was signed and given to Mr. Fowler; Ned handed the miserable culprit enough money to pay his passage out, and then saw him off at the station. That was the last he ever saw of him.

A month afterwards he was married to Nellie. Little did she think of the risk which he had run for her sake, and Ned was rewarded for his courage and sacrifice in seeing that his darling wife was able still to clasp her father's neck without a thought of how near she had been to sharing his disgrace.

Gone!

WHERE the waters flash and glitter
In the sunny gleam,
Where the song-birds chirp and twitter
By the silent stream,
Yellow gorse and purple heather
Caught the crimson glow,
As we plighted troth together
Years and years ago.
Once again my footstep lingers
By the vacant shrine;
Once again those slender fingers
Seem to rest in mine.
As the summer sunset flushes
All the lonely place,
Once again I see the blushes
On her pure, pale face.
Still the waters flash and glitter
In the sunny gleam;
Still the song-birds chirp and twitter
By the silent stream.
Love may bind, or death may sever,
Fate may bless or ban;
Nature's aspect changeth never
For the griefs of man.

CHAPTER III. "I, BERYL, TAKE THEE, JOHN——"

A HOT sultry morning. Not a breath of air anywhere—only a haze of burning sunshine, and a sky whose cloudless brilliance was like a dream of Italy.

It was not often that Ivor Grant left his rooms in Piccadilly before late noon, unless some of the arduous duties of the Household Cavalry required his attendance at a levée or review. But he had risen at the unwarranted hour of nine this morning, and, declaring that the heat indoors was unbearable, strolled out, cigar in mouth, to the utter confounding and amazement of Burke, his personal attendant and faithful body-guard, the said Burke having been brought up on his uncle's estate, and apportioned to Mr. Ivor's service since his days at Eton.

Her son's astonished glance stopped her.

"My dear mother, what has come to you? Of course he's all right. Good family, plenty of money, all the talents. Why, everyone's running after him."

There was a short silence.

Then the ringing of the dinner-bell startled them. Ivor rose from his seat and gave her his arm with his usual courtesy. She accepted it—not with her usual loving grace, not with that upward glance of adoring mother-love at his handsome face that he so well knew, not with anything but a look of sombre abstraction in her blue eyes, and a mechanical effort at composure and pride.

So she met her son's friends, still clasping her son's arm; so she took her place at the stately dining-table, beside that son's chair; so she met the eyes of that stranger guest whose coming had so moved her—whose cold, smiling eyes were ever on her face.

Dinner is over. She rises and withdraws, a smile on her pale, proud lips, a tearing, breathless, unspeakable anguish in her heart. Someone advances and opens the door, a low bow follows her retreat—a bow emphasised by a whisper that only her ears catch.

In the dining-room glasses chink, wine flows, voices ring, all is mirth, gaiety, goodwill. In the great drawing-room a woman stands alone beside the tall, draped windows. Lamplight and fire-light are behind her, but she has left them to gaze out on the clouded autumn sky, the shadows of the bare trees. Her face is white as death. Her lips close in a line of intense pain.

"Great Heaven!" she whispers below her breath, "spare me, help me. Not this, it cannot be—it cannot be."

The men did not return to the drawing-room. They seldom spent their evenings there, unless there was a house-party. Mrs. Grant heard them go to the billiard-room, and gave a sigh of relief. At least for that night she had no more to fear.

"Yet what should I fear?" she asked herself proudly, as alone in her own room she saw how white and anxious her usually calm face had become. "The story is so old a one, and no one knows it but—"

The reflection in the glass seemed to startle her, looking back to her eyes with so sombre and so sad a gaze. It chilled the thought in her mind as if she had been speaking it out, and the words held some name of dread.

She turned abruptly away, and rang the bell for her maid.

"Of course I have nothing to fear," she said.

But that assertion, confident as it was, could not silence the chill, foreboding whispers of her heart.

The next morning all was bustle and preparation. The sportsmen met at early breakfast, attired in rough homespuns and tweeds, and full of Englishmen's excitement at the prospect of "something to kill." The preserves were pronounced to be in splendid condition by the keepers, the soft, grey, hazy sky gave fairer promise of fine weather than one more brilliant would have done. Hot coffee, devils, omelettes, were being swallowed down with a speed too hasty for appreciation, and at the head of the table sat the proud, fair woman whom Count Savona's eyes unceasingly watched.

She looked so calm, so serene, so untroubled, that it was difficult to associate her with anything dark or mysterious. Only a certain nervous tremor about the firm lips, a studied avoidance of one face among the many around her—for the party had been augmented by some neighbouring sportsmen—showed that there was something beneath the perfect composure of her outward demeanour—something that only a very close and watchful eye could have observed.

Breakfast over, the party dispersed. Sir Hector, who was still a keen sportsman, despite his three-score years, accompanied them. The Court was deserted, and Mrs. Grant was free to retire to her own morning-room, overlooking the wide sweep of the park. It was a small octagonal room, with a view of wide woodlands and beautiful avenues and glades, where the deer herded in timid groups as the crack of the guns disturbed their solitude.

The sky was still grey, but a faint gleam of brightness was spreading itself over the hazy clouds, giving promise of a brilliant noon.

Mrs. Grant usually found plenty to occupy her time. She was no useless fine lady, but a woman with good brains and sound judgment, and she detested idleness and frivolity as only such women can. This morning, however, when her orders had been given and her correspondence answered, she seemed unable to settle to any of her usual avocations; a strange restlessness possessed her. She started at every sound. At last, rendered desperate by this restlessness, she dressed herself for walking and went out.

The trees were already growing bare and leafless. The early days of September had been heralded by fierce gales and much rain, and the golden pomp of the autumn woods had suffered severely. She took her way through the beautiful elm-tree avenue that was one of the glories of the Court, and followed it for fully a mile. She had set out with the intention of going to the village, but suddenly altered her mind, and turned off into one of the glades, where the fern grew high almost as a man's elbow, and the great trees shut out the faint sunlight. Pursuing a narrow footpath, she came at last to an opening in the wood. The old Court, grey with years, and beautiful with the beauty of past ages, when architecture seemed a labour of love that should defy time's ravages, faced her fully where she stood, but though her eyes caught sight of it with the sense of something long known and familiar, their startled glance never rested on it, so it seemed to her, but was caught and arrested midway by a figure standing just a few paces beyond—the figure of a man leaning lightly on his gun, and gazing with a curious intentness at the distant building. The sound of her step, the rustling of the brushwood, made him turn. Their eyes met.

A smile of triumph crossed his lips. He lifted his hat and advanced. Pale, startled, she looked full into the dark face and smiling eyes; an involuntary exclamation escaped her lips:

"I thought you went for a day's shooting, count?"

"The day is not half over yet, madame," he said, with that curious foreign intonation of the words that always sent a shiver of remembered pain through her veins whenever she heard it. It was so like—so like a voice of her long past youth. "This is an unexpected pleasure," he continued; "I knew that I must request half an hour's private conversation with you soon, but I hardly thought chance would favour me so rapidly. You are surprised to see me. I left the sportsmen but half an hour or so back. I am not what you English call 'keen' on it. Besides, is it not cruel—a little? The poor harmless things fluttering at our mercy, helpless in our power, like—women, it seems to me, if madame will excuse my comparison."

Madame continued to look over him, away from him, anywhere but at him, with cold, unsmiling eyes, and a face set in stern, rigid lines as if she held herself in a determined self-control no word of his should break.

"You wish to speak to me—what about?"

He smiled, the same singular, inscrutable smile that was like a mask to his face, revealing nothing, yet expressing much.

"What about? Need you ask that? Have we not many things in common of which to converse?"

She made a gesture of impatience.

"None—now. My past is utterly blotted out. I have nothing to do except forget it. I only know you have come here as my son's guest. What circumstances have led to your reception in London society under your present name I am at a loss to imagine. But if I consent to your presence here, it is from no fear of what you know, remember that. You are powerless to hurt me now, save only through the memories that presence wakes."

Her voice was low, firm, defiant. He listened with respectful attention. The smile had left his lips. His face was grave now as her own.

"It is as well we should understand each other, madame," he said calmly. "I will return to your opening statement. You say your past is blotted out. Say rather you wish it to be so. They say sins have long shadows, you know, so have follies, youthful errors, even the caprices by which your charming sex delight to torture ours. Next, you speak of circumstances—of my changed name. I simply inherit a title which would have belonged to my—eldest brother, had not death rudely interfered. You start. Is it possible you did not know—"

"I desire to know nothing. I have already told you that."

"I am sorry I cannot bow to your commands, madame. A woman cannot, even by right of her sex, always escape the consequences of—shall we call it imprudence—early imprudence?"

The blood rushed to her face. She stamped her foot on the dry and crackling brushwood in the momentary forgetfulness of the passion that consumed her.

"Speak—tell me plainly what you mean by these hints."

He smiled. His eyes glanced back to the beautiful Gothic buildings with the warm sunlight resting on its pointed gables, and lancet windows, and ivied turrets.

"Your son has a fine inheritance," he remarked. "It would be a pity if anything—any little unforeseen mistake arose to turn him out of his possession. Would it not, madame?"

She bit her lip to keep back the outburst of rage that longed for vent. She made one last effort to show herself fearless, to defy him even while this terror at her heart turned her sick with shame and sudden dread.

"You would be better employed in pursuing the sport you pretend to commiserate, instead of propounding riddles to me, count. Allow me to suggest—"

"Pardon, madame, I am not jesting. As you say, however, we have fenced long enough. I came here, not as your son's guest, but to see you. My reason, one only, and a very simple one. I know you are devoted to your son. I know that he is your brother's heir—ostensibly. I am possessed of some information that concerns you and him. That is the cause of my presence here. Will you just cast your eye over this paper? With the true characteristics of your charming sex, you doubtless abhor statistics. Dates are an abhorrence to you. Nevertheless, dear madame, dates are sometimes very important things. Instance, the present time."

As he spoke he handed her a paper, a small printed slip cut out apparently from some foreign journal. She glanced at it.

"I have seen that before," she said contemptuously, and pushed it aside.

Again he smiled.

"Have goodness now to read this." It was a letter this time that he placed in her reluctant hand, and on which her eyes fell in a glance of abhorrent recognition. "It is dated, you observe, two years later than the printed announcement," he said slowly and significantly. "The inference is clear."

No need for words now, no need for explanation. Only a pale, terrified face turned itself in unspeakable anguish to the brightening sky, as if seeking there for some hope in this moment of horror. A moment—two—three passed by. At last her white lips moved. They only let fall two words:

"Your price?"

He neither flushed, nor paled. Perhaps he had no feelings of delicacy to wound.

"That will require a longer interview to arrange. Besides, you will naturally want proofs. I shall be happy to afford them. May I wait upon you in your own room to-night after dinner?"

She bowed. She seemed to have passed beyond all power of speech. A faint wind, rustling the branches overhead, scattered a shower of leaves upon the ground. She looked at them mechanically. Sere, withered, dry, like old hopes long dead—like proud dreams scattered and laid low.

The glance resting on her had nothing of remorse or pity, not even a momentary compassion for the wreck of a lifetime's glory—the blow that in a second's space had ruined the fondest hope of a desolate life.

Suddenly she drew a sharp breath, as of a cry stifled in her heart's depths, then turned and went back through the little glade as if to seek refuge in its darkness from those cold and pitiless eyes.

"After all these years—after all these years!" she cried to herself; "and now, is he to suffer for my sin?"

CHAPTER VI. A MYSTERY.

COUNT SAVONA was as much a mystery to people enjoying the doubtful pleasure of his acquaintanceship as to the outside world.

He had been a great traveller—knew most modern languages, and most of the known, as well as many of the unknown, parts of the globe. In bygone years he had been known as plain Luigi Rocca, and when he shone forth on Parisian and London society in the glories of title, and, apparently, wealth, the little whispers, and scandals, and on dit floating about to the credit or rather discredit of the former name were conveniently forgotten, or ignored in connection with the latter.

It may be that he ruled as much by fear as by his vaunted popularity, for he had an unpleasant knack of getting at people's private histories, and a reputation of being a dangerous enemy, and a merciless one.

He might have been any age from thirty to fifty. It was hard to say and difficult to guess. He professed to have no family ties, and his only occupation seemed that of a fortunate speculator.

In all the involutions, changes, and mysteries of finance he seemed without equal, and he worked the wires of too many puppets not to be perfectly aware of any chance and fluctuation in the money market long before such information was public property. Apart and aside from this phase of his life and character was that other one by which he charmed society and secured its prestige, where many a better man failed.

He had come to London from Paris with some introductions which his own tact and talents helped him to establish and use for his further advancement. A foreigner can often make his way where an Englishman fails, and Count Savona was quick at seizing opportunity.

Ivor Grant had met him out a great deal before taking much notice of him. Indeed, he would have been surprised had anyone told him that his languid good-humour and placid indifference had made him malleable as wax in the hands of a mere designing adventurer, and won from him that invitation to the Court, which he always thought he had given in a moment of impulse and good-nature.

On the contrary, it had been slowly and steadily worked for through many months; planned with the skill and carried out with the success that usually marked Count Savona's designs. This design was destined to have results of which Ivor Grant never dreamt, slaughtering the pheasants there in his own prospective preserves, revelling in the enjoyment of sport, without caring to analyse whence came its charm. He told himself he had been right to come here. Life in town was, after all, a great bore, and the men and women of his "set" were horribly uninteresting. At this point he had usually paused to look back upon one night, when he had found there might, after all, be a charm in such scenes, a night into whose brief hours the whole memories of the past season had been crowded. He wondered how it was he could not forget it, or that girl with the piquant face and beautiful, dark, deep eyes that were like wells of purity and truth, eyes into which he could have gazed, and gazed, and never wearied, if only—Ah, that was the rub. Why did things always go in such contrary fashions? Why did the right people always meet too late? Which paradoxical question proving that by so doing they must assuredly be the "wrong" people, he treated the whole affair as a sort of gigantic conundrum, and gave it up.

Coming home tired and happy that night, with a sense of "duty done," and a heavy game-bag to the fore, he went to his mother's room for his usual chat before dinner. But the maid stopped him with a message. Her mistress had a bad headache, and was lying down. She would not be able to appear at dinner that evening. He felt disappointed at so unusual a rebuff. As a rule his mother allowed nothing to interfere with his privileged visits, and it seemed odd that a headache should debar him from her presence.

However, he went in to dinner and apologised for her absence, and listened to the count's brilliant talk and the sportsmen's various accounts of their day's luck or otherwise, and felt that life was, after all, not such a bad affair.

When they were dispersing to the billiard or smoking room, he wondered somewhat that Count Savona begged to be excused on the plea of important letters to write, for which purpose he retired to the library.

It might have been an hour or so later when Ivor, going upstairs to his own room for some trifle or other he wanted, heard the sound of voices coming from his mother's boudoir. For a moment he stopped in the corridor in sheer surprise.

Yes, there was no doubt about it. That was his mother's voice—cold, haughty, yet subdued, as if its faint echoes might betray the misery slowly fastening itself on the very roots of her life; and the other—there was no mistaking that either. Well enough Ivor knew the foreign accent, the clear, resonant tones. But what on earth could the count have to say to his mother, and why had she risen from her bed to grant him an interview when she had refused to see her own son?

Utterly unable to answer such questions, or conceive any probable reason for so strange an interview, he turned and went back to the smoking-room, completely oblivious of his reason for leaving it.

He was so silent and so preoccupied that his friends jested him on the subject, without, however, eliciting any satisfactory explanation.

He sent another message to his mother, and was informed that she had retired for the night.

The count joined them all again, and was his usual gay and brilliant self, charming even the country squires by his versatile talents. Ivor, watching him closely, saw how his eyes glittered, and what an unusual satisfaction showed itself upon his face. He grew more and more puzzled every moment.

What could that interview have been about? What mystery was there between his mother and this comparative stranger?

"Pshaw!" he said to himself at last. "Why need I bother? She is sure to tell me;" and with his usual easy indifference he threw off the momentary discomfiture of the evening.

In the morning, when the party had met again, the Count Savona declared himself desolated, heart-broken, but unfortunately news had reached him which compelled his immediate departure for Paris. Mrs. Grant was presiding at the breakfast-table, and involuntarily Ivor's eyes turned to her face. Save that it might have been a shade paler than usual, its outward calm composure was unaltered. She murmured a conventional regret, but her eyes never once sought the count's face; she only sat there perfectly still, and to all appearance perfectly indifferent.

The meal proceeded. The count, with his unfailing politeness, insisted that his young host should not disturb his arrangements on any account. So Ivor gave orders for the dog-cart to drive his guest to the station, some eight miles distant, and bade him farewell with less cordiality than he would have shown had not this sense of something mysterious been oppressing his frank and honest mind.

Before that day ended another surprise awaited him.

Though he spent his usual half-hour at his mother's dressing-room fire, and though she was as loving as—if possible more so than—ever he had found her, the name of Count Savona never passed her lips.

He alluded to the count's departure. She made but brief response, and changed the conversation as soon as possible.

"I don't think you liked my Italian friend," he said jestingly, as they both rose at last in answer to the summons of the dinner-bell.

"Your friend!" she said hurriedly, and her eyes met his, a strange wild disturbance on her face. "Don't call him that, Ivor, for Heaven's sake. You are right. I—don't—like him."

Anger, and fear, and shame contending for victory, suppressed and kept back by the stern self-control of years. He had never seen her so moved, so strange. The white hand with its glittering gems trembled as it clasped his arm. Involuntarily he bent and kissed it.

"No enemy of yours can be friend of mine, dear mother."

"Enemy!" She shuddered and turned paler still. "No, not that. I did not call him that, my dear."

Ivor made no answer, but in his heart he said:

"No, but you meant it."

And the wonder grew deeper and more troubled, as all perplexed and unanswered doubts must grow.

Away in the rising moonlight stretched the rich woodlands and the vast acres that he deemed his own, that marked as goodly a heritage as the heart of man need desire. Perhaps as her eyes looked out through the oriel windows of the gallery it was as well that her son could not read their meaning. As well, too, that he knew nothing of the price paid, and still to pay, for that heritage—the tears of blood and shame its purchase-right had cost.

Snowdon House.

(A SHORT SERIAL STORY.)

PART V.

WITH the near approach of the day fixed for the wedding, Mr. Wayre became more genial and kindly in his demeanour; there was less of the cynical tone in his conversation than there once had been, and—although in this there was, perhaps, no marvel—to Agatha he was constantly gentle and thoughtfully kind. On her side there was fully as marked a change in the girl. Her manner had always been attentive, if not deferential; but there was now something a great deal beyond this. If not actual affection, there was certainly anxiety to please, with—or so it appeared to her father—a deep sense of the responsibility she was about to assume. He was not sorry to see her in this mood, although rather surprised; indeed, he was surprised altogether at the earnestness with which she had now joined in his plans, and augured favourably for her happiness in the future.

A day had elapsed since his receiving such strange information from Brooks, and he had done nothing in the matter. He could not make up his mind as to what steps he should take; yet he was a man of decision, and not accustomed to waste much time in fruitless speculation.

On the second day he went over with his daughter to Snowdon House, it having been arranged that they should go with Mr. Wayre for a drive; but when he saw that gentleman, he explained that some business imperatively demanded his attendance in Bridgeley, and so he could not go. Agatha, however, would be happy to ride over to Beacon Mound—a place of some celebrity in those parts—and Wayre, knowing that a doctor's time is never his own, was not surprised at the disappointment.

The drive was intended to test the pair of black ponies and the beautiful new carriage. A man from Mr. Dutton—the vendor of the animals, we hope the reader bears in mind—was sent to drive, as being used to the ponies, "Not," as the charioteer himself said, "not but what they was as quiet as lambs, and just as harmless."

Fulham lingered to see them depart, and passed many encomiums on the beauty of the turn-out, which were certainly deserved. As he turned from the spot, he saw Ezra Crake standing near him. The man had evidently been watching the horses and carriage with something of the doctor's admiration, mingled with a feeling not quite so complimentary, to judge by a slightly contemptuous curl of the lip. The matrimonial weakness of his master was distasteful to Ezra, as the latter had often made known in conversations with his wife.

"Good-morning, Ezra," said the doctor; "are you very busy to-day?"

"Pretty middling, sir," replied the man, who touched his hat and turned away.

He did not actually dislike the doctor, who had always been civil to him, but he could not actually like him, either, for he was the father of the girl who was going to turn everything topsy-turvy at the house, and it was he who had introduced her there.

"Stay a moment, Ezra!" exclaimed Dr. Fulham; "I have a question or two to ask of you, and, even if busy, I think you will find time to answer me."

Ezra stopped, and half turning his head, waited for something further.

"Come into the house," continued the doctor; "I mean business, Ezra, as you will find."

Ezra's face relaxed a little at this, for he was quick in taking any hint which appeared to promise profit, and he knew what the doctor's reference to his meaning business signified.

The latter led the way into a parlour, Ezra followed, and the doctor began:

"You have lived with Mr. Wayre for many years, Ezra, have you not? I thought so. He knows, I suppose, when he has a good servant; you know when you have a good master. Do you remember Mrs. Wayre?"

"Yes," said Crake; his eyes were fixed with a wary expression on the doctor's face, and he evidently did not mean to commit himself by saying too much.

"She died many years ago, I believe?" continued Dr. Fulham.

"Yes," said Ezra again.

"I believe Mr. Wayre had one son," the doctor went on. "Did you know him?"

"I don't see what you are asking me these questions for," returned Crake; "and I don't know that Mr. Wayre would be best pleased if he knew I answered them."

"I shall ask you nothing that will in any way injure Mr. Wayre, of that you may be sure," said the gentleman. "Here is a sovereign for your trouble, Ezra, and be assured you may answer me freely. I shall be closely allied to Mr. Wayre, I hope and expect, in a few days, and I feel a natural curiosity to learn all I can of him. But some of the matters on which I wish to enquire may have painful memories connected with them, if what I am told is correct. Now I have been told a good deal by a person whom I met casually a few days ago. I only wish to know, from so trustworthy a person as yourself, if what he said was true. I do not seek any fresh information from you at all. You cannot object to that, I suppose?"

"Well, I suppose not," said Ezra, half sulkily still, yet somewhat mollified by the sovereign. "I know about all in Mr. Wayre's life that there is to know."

"Of course you do!" exclaimed Fulham. "Well, then—there was a son?"

Crake nodded assent.

"I am told also that this son occasioned some trouble to his parents, and in fact shortened his mother's days. Is that true?"

"That is true, to say the least you can," returned Crake sternly. The doctor smiled inwardly, if such a thing can be done, as he saw that the morose Ezra was moved at last. "He was always a wild, half-savage, reprobate fellow. He broke his mother's heart, and his father banished him from his house. He was always in some evil. He took away the prettiest girl in the neighbourhood from her sweet-heart, persuaded her to look down on an honest, hardworking man, who meant what was right by her, and to take up with him. And much good it did her!"

"I heard something of this," said Fulham, venturing on a chance shot. "I did not learn the particulars, but it was said he took the girl away and beat her old sweetheart. Is that right?"

Crake did not answer in any direct manner, but he scowled so bitterly, as he uttered two or three oaths more bitter still, that Fulham felt sure he had now found out why Ezra Crake hated the son of Luke Wayre, and would injure him if he got the chance to do so.

"He never became friendly with his father again, I understand?" resumed the doctor.

"Friendly! No, I should think not," cried Crake. "He soon put all hope of that out of the way. He had a good chance, though, if he had only known it, for the old man softened down a great deal, and, as I can tell, used to blame himself a great deal for the separation—thought he had been too strict, you see."

"But I heard much more than that," said the doctor. "I was told that he committed a crime, and was sent into penal servitude."

"So he was—hang him!" exclaimed Ezra. "I can't think who you could have got hold of to know that, but he was right. Young Wayre did not do so very much, after all, but he half-killed the officer who tried to arrest him, and that's how it was."

"Well, then, I heard that he got out on a ticket-of-leave," continued Fulham; "but the man, who was, as I have told you, a stranger to me, did not know what became of him afterwards. Do you?"

"Yes, I do," replied Ezra. "He is dead, and a good job too. If he was alive, the police would have him again, for he stole a horse, or something, and broke his leave. He is dead, sir; there's an end of him."

"I am much obliged to you for the information, Mr. Crake," said the doctor, speaking with a change of tone, as though to show the conversation was concluded; "you see you have said nothing that any one could object to, while you may have saved me from making some painful allusions in Mr. Wayre's presence. By-the-bye, though, I should think you must be mistaken in one point. I can never believe that Mr. Wayre would be weak enough to blame himself in such a matter. He seems to have too much firmness for that."

"Firmness! He is firm enough, and obstinate enough, too, in everything he takes into his head," returned Ezra; "and so you will find before you have done with him; but on this point it is different. If that young fellow—Saul, his name was—hadn't died, and was to ask for half of all his father has got, he'd get it—yes, and the other half as well, if that wasn't enough. I know Luke Wayre too well, sir, to make a mistake."

Fulham laughed slightly at this, not as implying a jest, but to show that he was pleased by Mr. Crake's penetration and candour, and then bade his informant "good-day."

Ezra's story completely confirmed that which he had already heard from Saul Wayre, or Brooks as he was called, but this did not in the least surprise the doctor. He had made up his mind that the story was true, even while the man was telling it; his anxiety arose from a very different cause to doubt or incredulity. Fulham was a man of fair and honourable conduct enough, as things go; he had never seen it greatly to his profit to take a different line. Had he seen such an opening he might have embraced it, for his moral sense was not very profound; he might, or he might not, have hesitated at committing a great crime, in pursuit of his ends, but he was certainly not the man to give up a great gain, a tangible benefit, for sentiment. Consequently, Ezra's news, and his comments thereon, had greatly disturbed him.

If he mentioned this man's existence to his father—this wretched convict who ought to have died, and saved everybody trouble—why, Mr. Wayre, who had probably a monomania on the point, would make himself a comparatively poor man in his favour.

"Egad! if he were to learn it at once," thought the doctor, "it might stop the marriage—or my loan."

Even if the proposed settlements were executed, and the marriage had come off, there would be a vast difference between a wealthy man without a person in the world, beyond his wife and her friends, for whom he cared, or to whom he was likely to leave a shilling—there was a great difference, the doctor repeated, between such a person, and the same man with a son, daughter-in-law, and grandchildren, all as hungry as leeches, draining this man of every shilling.

There is no doubt that if Fulham could have procured the arrest of Brooks, and his re-committal to Portland, without his real name being mentioned, he would have done it; but he saw at once that such an attempt would be fatal. The convict's identity would certainly be proved at the examination before the magistrates; Mr. Wayre's self-reproach would be intensified; the wife and children would have all, and even more than, he would have given to his son, while, if the doctor's agency were suspected, every chance of favour that he now possessed would be gone, while the marriage would almost certainly be abandoned.

Yet Wayre must in some manner be informed of this man's existence. Wayre might yet have children, and if so, the provisions in the settlement—which the doctor had of course seen—would, or could, be held to apply to this horrible spectre which had so suddenly sprung up, and he would get the money intended for Agatha's children. It was not an easy problem to solve, and the doctor applied himself earnestly to think it out.

Meanwhile Wayre and Agatha pursued their drive over the beautiful downs and gently swelling hills which lie in the vicinity of Bridgeley, every fresh ridge showing a prospect more beautiful than the last. Presently they were able to look down upon Bridgeley; its streets, its smoke, its dingy houses all being refined and beautified by distance—even Shalgtown looked cheerful from there. As for the ponies, they had behaved to perfection, and Mr. Wayre felt that Mr. Dutton's encomiums on them, warm as they had been, fell short of their merits.

A certain hotel was the limit of their journey, and here, while the driver and the ponies were resting, and after Wayre and Agatha had themselves taken some slight refreshment, they walked to a seat which was noted as commanding the finest view for miles around.

Mr. Wayre and Agatha sat down, and for a few moments contemplated the splendid panorama in silence.

"Agatha," said Mr. Wayre, with such suddenness that the blood rushed into the girl's cheeks and then left her pale and white, "I will say now what has been in my mind for many days—ever since, indeed, you gave me your promise to brighten a life that for years has had little to make it cheerful. I hope you think—I hope you know I love you dearly."

"Yes—yes, I am sure of it," said Miss Fulham, speaking in a low tone, for her companion's earnest manner and this strange commencement of his speech almost awed her.

"And I have indulged the hope that I have, in a measure, won your love," continued Wayre. "I do not venture to believe that—but no, I will speak no more in that strain. I wanted to say this to you, Agatha, and I could not feel I had done my duty unless I said it—with all my love for you, with all the happiness which your promise has brought, the chief anxiety of my mind is for your happiness, not my own. Did I ever think that the consent you have given, the step you are about to take, was in any way forced upon you—by circumstances, I mean—did I ever suspect that your whole heart and earnest free-will were not in that promise, that you held in your mind hidden regrets for what your tongue had spoken, I should be the most unhappy man in the world. Is it so—is there any reason to hold you back—anything which would make you hesitate? If so, confide in me as your truest friend, as I hope to prove myself always."

This was a lengthy speech, and while it was in utterance a multitude of strange emotions rushed through Agatha's mind, almost overpowering her. It was only by a great effort that she retained sufficient composure to listen. In Mr. Wayre's language she seemed to hear strange unearthly echoes to voices of the past. There was at once before her the lifelong importance of her decision of that moment, with the full consciousness of her utter inability to give now any decision at all, or to alter in the slightest degree the die which she had cast, or which had been cast for her.

For a while her brain swam, and she felt as though she should faint, but even then she knew that if she did so, although uttering no word, she would have given a most painful answer to this appeal.

"You are very kind, Mr. Wayre," at last she said; "as kind as I have always thought you. Had I any wish—were it possible, indeed, for me to alter—I should not fail to take advantage of your unselfish, generous candour. But I cannot retract a word I have said."

"It makes me happy to hear this," replied Wayre, "and Heaven knows how earnestly I hoped your reply would be as it is. You must never dream that it was from indifference to the value of what I have won, that I spoke as I did just now."

"I never shall," interposed Agatha, and in saying this she spoke the barest truth. "I shall ever be grateful when I think of your words."

"Well, then," said Mr. Wayre, "we will dismiss the subject for ever. I could not have felt easy unless I had spoken what was in my mind. I will not inflict my reasons upon you; I hope you will never learn them; but I have suffered in past years so severely from want of candour, have given and received so much pain which an interchange of simple, kindly words might have averted, that I, of all men, should take care to be truthful and frank in the future. But, come," he added with a change of tone, "I can see the driver looking reproachfully in our direction, as if to enquire how much longer we mean to sit here. We will go and relieve his mind."

They rose, and went to their carriage, Wayre being more cheerful and lighter in his conversation than Miss Fulham had ever before seen him; he seemed, indeed, with the close of the dialogue just detailed, to have thrown off a gravity and a shade which had nearly always hung around him, and to speak with the air of a man thoroughly cheerful and at ease. When they separated, his manner was more affectionate than usual, and he reminded Agatha that in a few days she would be his to part no more.

Agatha smiled and blushed as became her at this speech, and as she left Snowdon House in the carriage, leant over the side, and waved her hand and smiled as long as she was in sight of Mr. Wayre, who watched the vehicle until the tall hedges hid it from his sight.

Cheerfully as Agatha bore herself, she was yet glad to find, upon her arrival at home, that her father was absent, and she went to her own room without delay.

"This is the last time," she exclaimed, lifting her face from the pillow in which she had buried it, "the last time I will ever give way to regret for the past, the last time—if I can so far control myself—that I will ever dwell upon it. No! I resolve from this moment to do all I can to cheer and please the honourable, kindly man who has chosen me. I will strive to deserve his love, and if I cannot be entirely worthy of him, I will do all in my power to prevent him from regretting his choice. Between me and all that is past is now a gulf. I hope that in what I am about to do I may be forgiven. I act for the best—I act as I must. But oh, why did not all this happen one short year ago? What memories I should have been spared! What anguish and what peril I should have escaped!"

Her paroxysm endured but a short time, but she sat alone in her room until long after dark, and until after she heard her father come in. On his part, he had his own reasons for wishing to be by himself, but finding that his daughter had complained of a headache, and had gone to her room to lie down, he went up to enquire after her.

"I am very glad to hear it," he said, when she assured him she was now recovered, and thinking of joining him in the parlour; "but I would not trouble myself to come down if I were you. I thought the glare of the sun on the white roads over those hills would be too much for you. Keep in the dark, and your head will be all right by the morning. By-the-bye, Aggy"—the doctor rarely called her "Aggy" unless he wished to appear specially affectionate, or was in high good-temper—"your aunt is not in a great hurry to answer my letter. I am afraid Mr. Tummell has taken it a great deal to heart. Only think what you have lost, Aggy! You might, if you had played your cards well, have been the leading groceress in that delightful Cheshire village."

It was arranged that the bridal trip should occupy but a few days—the real honeymoon holiday was to be taken in the next summer. So after a few days on the southern coast, they would return to Snowdon House, which was still further to be remodelled under its mistress's eye.

Only two days before the ceremony, however, Mr. Wayre had occasion to remind the doctor of a matter which the latter had neglected. The trespasses on Snowdon House grounds had been resumed, and some fowls stolen. The theft was annoying in itself, but the trespass was even worse, as Nero had given no alarm, and, there was every reason to believe, was quite cowed by the punishment he had received in the struggle already referred to.

"So the sooner you get me the other dog the better," concluded Mr. Wayre, "and you can take away Nero. I should like the poor old dog to be well cared for, and will pay for his keep with any decent person you know; but he is no good here. Now, will you see about this while we are away?"

Dr. Fulham, of course, promised that he would do so, and kept his word by writing at once to his agent.

"I believe that Wayre has a slight monomania on this trespassing business," muttered the doctor as he sat at his desk. "It is said we each have our weak point, and I am convinced his is trespassing. It can't be my friend Brooks, or whatever his name is, this time, for he is away; of that I am certain. I wish he would go trespassing on somebody's fishpond, and fall in and drown himself. I would give another fifty pounds, this moment, to hear of it."

To explain this allusion of the doctor's, we may say that he had given Brooks a present to that amount, telling him that he was paving the way for a disclosure which would most probably result in the entire accomplishment of the ex-convict's wishes.

He gave the man the sum he had just named, and made it a condition that he should go away from Bridgeley for a time, adding something like a hint that Ezra Crake had been talking a good deal of late about a curious resemblance he had noticed in one of the factory-hands to someone he had known a long time ago. Brooks was to stay at a certain small town till he heard from the doctor, taking up his abode at a quiet out-of-the-way inn, the landlord of which was known to the latter, and who was privately instructed to write to Dr. Fulham, announcing the arrival of Mr. Brooks, and, furthermore, to keep a vigilant eye on that person. The doctor had received advice of his protégé's safe arrival at Quillington, the name of the town in question, so he knew the present trespasser could not be Mr. Brooks.

It will, however, be seen from the general tone of his remarks, that this individual was still a source of embarrassment to him, and, although no crime had ever marked the doctor's career, it would have been a hazardous experiment for Mr. Brooks to put himself wholly in his power. At any rate, he was got rid of for a time, and the best thing, according to the doctor's present views, which could be done with him, was to sacrifice part of the loan from Mr. Wayre, hand it over to Brooks—as he always chose to call him in his own mind—with a message, purporting to come from his father, stern in its tone, and conveying an announcement that he need never look for any further help.

As a condition of his receipt of even this, Brooks was to go to some country with which no extradition treaty existed—Mexico, the doctor thought the best place—then, by a third party, the police should be informed that he was alive, and take care that Brooks heard of this information, so that he would never dare to come back. When all this was done, Mr. Wayre should be told of the existence of his son, the latter's conduct being coloured so as to convey such impressions as were most favourable to the doctor's interests.

This plan was rather complicated and rather hazardous, it may be, but the doctor thought that as he would have all the threads in his own hands, he could keep them from entangling.

At any rate, his management proved remarkably successful, so far as the first and chief aim was concerned. His daughter was duly married to Mr. Wayre, and the bride and bridegroom started for their few days' trip as arranged. During their absence Dr. Fulham had much to occupy him; for one thing, the purchase of Dr. Z——'s business was now virtually completed, and it was understood that the money was to be paid directly upon Mr. Wayre's return. Dr. Z—— had seen that gentleman more than once upon the subject, and learnt his willingness to advance the required capital, so Dr. Z—— was perfectly ready to meet Dr. Fulham's wishes, and oblige him in every way, which might not have been the case had the latter been compelled to trust to his own unassisted credit.

So Dr. Fulham was often at what was to be his new professional residence, and often also at Snowdon House, according to a promise he had given to Mr. Wayre. These matters, in addition to his attendance on his own practice, would have sufficiently occupied his time and his mind; but, in addition, he was considerably disturbed by the receipt of letters almost every day from Brooks, urging the settlement of his claim.

As with many other extremely clever and cunning persons, the doctor had been a little too successful in his craft, and had not only inspired Brooks with sufficient fear of Ezra Crake's activity to make him keep away from Bridgeley for a while; but the man was, or pretended to be, in great terror lest he should be followed, and so was anxious to get abroad without delay. It was entirely out of Dr. Fulham's power to send him any considerable sum of money until the return of Mr. Wayre, and he had already had to feign a necessity for a larger sum than the new purchase required, to obtain from the latter the means of getting rid of Brooks; he had enough to do to pacify his suspicious correspondent.

Take it all in all, the week of Mr. Wayre's absence was about as trying and tedious a period as was ever passed by the doctor, and then, to his increased annoyance, he heard from his daughter that their return would be delayed for a few days, as the weather was so charming at the coast town where they were staying.

This delay at once exasperated Brooks, as the doctor foresaw would be the case; and the man told Fulham plainly enough that he believed the latter was attempting to trick him, and only inventing excuses to keep him quiet.

At last, even the extra days were past, and a telegram from the southern coast advised the doctor that Mr. and Mrs. Wayre were just starting on their homeward journey.

An hour or two after the receipt of this message, two letters were delivered by post, the perusal of which appeared to disturb the doctor greatly.

The first was so short that we may venture to give it entire.

"SIR, "Red Lion Inn, Quillington, 18—

"Mr. Brooks has left my house. He went off this evening in spite of my persuasions, saying that he did not intend to come back. He has been in a bad temper, and has given a great deal of trouble for several days.—Yours obediently, etc."

A Storm.

DEEP in the sheltered country,
Where the valley lies secure,
They hear the far-off thunder
Of the tempest on the moor.

They see where the clouds are flying
Over the pale moon's light;
They watch the great trees bend, and say,
"There will be a storm to-night."

Under the hill, the roof-tree,
Lies quiet, safe, and warm,
The oaks stand fast, to the roughest blast;
They do not heed the storm.

But away on the iron sea-board,
With fear, and prayer, and wail,
They read the signs in sea and sky
That tell of a rising gale.

For they know as the mighty rollers
Crash on the hollow shore,
And to the wind's fierce challenge
Answers the ocean roar,

That o'er the wild wan morning
Breaks o'er the angry waves,
The driving moon may have gleamed to light
Stout sailors to their graves.

They know that, to the foam-flecked sands
On the rising tide may float,
Spar and cordage and tangled wreck
Of many a gallant boat.

And tossed with shell and seaweed,
Up to the shelving sands,
Somebody's darling may helpless come,
To be streaked by stranger hands.
And oh, it is 'mid their sobbing prayers
That with lips all pale with fright,
Wives and mothers and sisters say,
"There will be a storm to-night!"

A Dancing Girl.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

A YOUTH was threading his way northward through streets—streets, streets, wide and narrow, short and long, there was nothing else but bricks and mortar, though the locality was called a suburb, and the youth was country born and bred, and had the innate love of greenery such a lad must have.

Three months he had been in London, and his life seemed to grow more narrow each day, such a contrast was it to the measureless hopes with which his soul had panted as he rolled away from Lattermere village in his father's gig. An aunt, Miss Ursula Money, had said she would give him a home, and this lady had a certain authority over the various branches of her family by reason of her spinsterhood, and her "stocks and shares," consequently, young Oswald Money was advised to try and make himself content with this home. Country doctoring was not profitable enough for him to follow his father in his village practice, and here again Miss Ursula's words carried weight.

"Let Oswald come up, and grow into a merchant—there's my house for bed and board, and I have enough interest with Drayson Brothers to get him in."

A lady with a strong will and a narrow mind was Miss Ursula; but there, we cannot waste time over an analysis of her character. She had Oswald Money under her roof.

Yes. And she was pinching the dear life out of him.

Three months had taken the tan of sun and wind from off his face—a handsome young man he was, with an elastic tread, and an upright manly bearing; city ways had not robbed him of that heritage. No, he never could be robbed of that; the freedom of the fells and of the dales was in his blood, and though he might chafe, and, perhaps, would fight against a limited, bounded existence, he surely would never be beaten in spirit.

It had been a brilliant October day, the sun had been hot like June; the air was clear, and keen, and invigorating, and had set a different humour upon the grimy office where he worked. As he threaded the streets, upwards to Holloway there was the spring of a wild animal in his muscles, and once he actually threw out his arms instinctively as if he could, Samson-like, break down the walls of his imprisoning Gaza.

That very action threw him further back into the narrowness of his days. He walked along one degree less quickly, and he cared not at all to look at any person or thing he chanced to pass. Generally he followed the high-road—now, this dulness of spirit having got the upper hand, he turned off down a side-street. This, and some other side-streets, would take him more quickly home to the substantial, routine orderliness of Miss Ursula.

The street had a red gleam of western sunset light glinting along it, the last ray of daytime. One bar of fiery scarlet shone far away where a break in the universal brickwork let one see the lower sky. One bar of scarlet, and the rest all murky grey. Gazing on it Oswald went dreaming on, and thought of the autumn sunsettings over Lattermere Tarn.

A chill wind coming round a street-corner woke him—the grand red fire was burnt out, and only the thick city smoke and fog remained. He had missed his turning. Never mind, it only made a change of streets.

Some of the houses were closed for the night, and had lamps and gas lighted, other windows glared grim and hollow like eyeless sockets; some were eerie, some were gay with the flicker of firelight—comfortable people like a fire in October even if the sun does shine.

One was ruddier than the rest, it shone warmly in front of Oswald with its bay-window and with the firelight making its crimson, undrawn curtains declare themselves very decidedly.

A little square of garden before the house kept it well off the public road; it was one of some dozen semi-detached villas, and Oswald roused from his dulness to look over the railings to the room.

There was a red curtain at each side of the window, the centre pane being broad and open. No blind was drawn down, and one could well see a bright fire flashing and leaping and making queer figures and apparitions of the people and things inside.

There was a white-capped lady in a chair by the fire; presently a child's head bobbed up, and she threw something on the fire—nuts.

Then other girls came running from the mysteries of the room, some must have been sitting on the rug before the fire, for they sprang up, so it seemed to Oswald, from a dark hollow.

A peal of laughter rang out through the closed window and across the little garden.

Oswald saw a dark girl clasp her hands, and then a fair one twirled round, waving her arms in the air; then two others linked together and danced round. He could hear a voice singing a well-known waltz-tune—gay, and glad, and fanciful. How he wished he could go in!

The dark girl next seemed to be gesticulating—was she praying or beseeching? If so it must all have been in fun. So quaint was it! sometimes seen in a flash of brilliant light, then, as the flame flickered away in another direction, there would only be a vague swaying and bending—just a vision of misty grace and beauty.

The girl must have been asking the lady to play, for she rose, and moving to the rear of the red curtains, Oswald heard the notes of a piano. What was it she played?

It was strange to the young man—a monotonous swinging, a springing regularity, quick and yet regularly swaying—neither polka nor waltz assuredly.

But his eyes were occupied—let sounds go!

He saw waving arms, and heard the click of—would it be castanets?—rising and falling, swaying and twirling, softly, gracefully, gently, but oh, so quickly.

The dark girl was evidently teaching the rest. She stopped them with a sharp click of her castanets.

Her head nodded and shook, and she made the fair girl dance by herself.

A gay laugh rang out—evidently the performer had made some egregious mistake.

A rapid flourish of the hand, a click-click of the castanets, an angry shake of the head at the laughing girls, and the dark one, she must have said, "Look at me, I will show you," then danced alone.

Steps could not be seen, of course, but the easy rising and bowing could. Now the slim figure lifted and turned; now spinning round so swiftly she yet bore the same strange monotone of grace that the quaint minor-keyed music had. Now she seemed to run within the circle of girls, lifting her arms on high, swaying them, waving them, clicking the gay castanets all the while, sometimes, too, giving a little short cry as she went on.

All at once she stopped, talked with vivacity, pointed here, pointed there, set the laughing girls apart.

She must have bidden them dance with her, they all began again, rising, falling, gently swaying, skimming round and round.

Who was she, that girl?

She was dark and tall, and her head had closely knotted hair; all the other girls had the universal fringe and friz variously arranged. All the girls had a gay merry grace; the dark one was different, she was the perfection of grace.

Oswald Money said to himself as he moved away that he understood now what was meant by "the poetry of motion."

He and Miss Ursula Money dined together in punctilious order, after which she retired to her drawing-room—so went the nightly routine. An hour after, also by routine, Oswald went upstairs to her, and together they had a cup of coffee.

She had heard his experience of the dancing-girl at dinner-time.

"No news to-day?" she asked abruptly.

"None—no, nothing."

"Business flat?"

Oswald shrugged his shoulders.

"Very much the same as usual. Thompson has a lift; they've given him the offer of the Canaries."

"Don't talk business jargon here," reprimanded the lady stiffly.

"The offer of the Canaries! Is the group of islands to be given to the young man named Thompson?"

"King of the Canaries!" laughed he. It was a sorry joke, but Oswald was free and buoyant of heart, and under such conditions one does laugh easily. "He is offered the management of the house there, I mean."

"I could divine so much, but I admire perspicuity of language and fit phraseology."

Miss Ursula was prim and precise.

A silence followed.

"I wish you could have seen that girl, aunt—those girls, I mean," presently the young man began.

"A suitable correction, Oswald. Let no special 'girl' or female of any rank occupy your thoughts for some years to come. Girls taken generally are ennobling elements in a young man's society—they refine it. One girl," she extended a hand oracularly, and spread out her bony, jewelled fingers, "must be relegated to the uncertain future."

Oswald did not laugh, but he stood up before an ancient mirror and fingered his thick fair moustache. Those words of his aunt's fixed a vague germ in his mind ; it was a healthy living germ, and it would grow.

"I never saw such dancing !"

"Inane, idiotic folly, sinful desecration of human strength !" exploded Miss Ursula.

"Rather strong, aunt," ejaculated her nephew. "Did you ever see graceful dancing ?"

"I have seen in my youth apeish gesticulation and posturing. I do not wish to hear more of it."

"Then what I saw does not come under that head."

Miss Ursula looked astonished. She thought she had nearly brought this lad, this Oswald Money, her nephew, into decorous behaviour—lo ! he was displaying quite as much independence of spirit as he had done at home.

"Tut, tut ! the subject is distasteful to me. Reach me the paper. Have you read the report of the Social Science Meeting ?"

She read.

Oswald lazily moved about the room.

"Really !" she cried, "I cannot endure your aimless fidgets. Has Herodias bewitched you ?"

Oswald smiled.

"Herodias—or Salome ? No, aunt, I am in possession of myself, so far."

"Ha ! you twit me on the score of names. I think I knew my Scriptures before you were born, sir. Herodias answers my purpose. Dismiss her from your thoughts, boy."

The boyishness of Oswald Money was not yet extinct, and it set him to disobey the old lady.

"It is the dance, aunt, that has bewitched me. If I only knew the name of it I dare say I could exorcise my demon."

"A minuet ?"

The young man laughed lightly. Then he described what he had seen.

"Castanets ?" said the old lady sharply.

"I suppose so."

"Tarantella—a witch's dance."

"A fairy's dance, if you will."

Another silence fell, and Miss Ursula either dozed or ruminated—she certainly did not read, for the paper had got turned upside down in her angry contempt, and she never righted it.

Presently she said suddenly :

"Where did you see that foreign folly ?"

"The dancing ? In Lansdowne Villas. There were four fair girls and one dark one. Do you know any people answering that description ?"

He tried to seem careless, but failed.

"I may or I may not."

"Then perhaps"—he took the "may not" for simply being words thrown in for his behoof, and therefore heeded them not—"perhaps you may some day come across Herodias—I beg her pardon for so misnaming her."

"Do you mean to say that you did not know that Drayson's head-clerk lives there—in Lansdowne Villas ?"

"Well ? Not at that house, surely ?"

Oswald actually flushed.

"I am ignorant of which your house is." The old lady jerked her head as she set her gold spectacles more tightly on her nose. "I know that he has taken some Spanish girl to educate with his daughters—a nice thing for his wife to have a young Popish minx undermining her family !"

"The family seemed happy under the process," carelessly said Oswald.

"Pshaw ! he'll repent it—mark my words."

"The daughter of one of our correspondents, I suppose," mused the young man.

"Suppose nothing," commanded Miss Ursula grimly, "or you'll repent in worse dust and ashes than poor Mrs. Reddison. I'll have no Papistical dancing niece brought here—mind !"

She only strengthened that vague germ of fancy of which we have spoken. Such things may exist slumberously for a long while, but just give one flick of opposition to the fancy and it starts into a full growth at once.

Oswald Money before long was a welcome guest at the house of his fellow-clerk. The old clerk would continue in clerkdom, but Money all the world knew would rise to mastership either in "Drayson's" or in connection with "Drayson's"—a man may be glad enough to welcome such a fellow to his house when there are four fair young daughters with an unseen future before them.

Alas and alas for the Reddison hopes !

It was Carolina, the Spanish girl ; she was as full of grace and of all sweet charms in the clear light of companionship as she had been through the misty October light ; she it was for whom Oswald Money angered his aunt.

Yes, without doubt he offended her beyond any retrieving. She soon knew all, and she spoke some few of her strong words. She turned Oswald out of her house, and she altered her will.

Things happen strangely in this world which looks so utterly commonplace.

Three years went by.

Oswald was working hard, and would rise by his own worth and capability. Lina had left the Reddisons, and for six months went to stay at Brighton with some relations of her own who were in England—by-the-bye, she was of high rank, and her father was Don X—. She was a girl strangely particular in the matter of lovers, she would need perfection. But all that could wait until she went home when the relations returned to Spain. Perhaps she had some sure perception of that perfect lover, though as yet no one had declared himself to her under that name.

No ; Oswald had his ideas of manly honour—he was not rich yet.

Miss Ursula Money became ill, and she also went to Brighton. One day, driving along the King's Road, her horses took fright at some hideous clang of so-called music, and an accident happened. The old lady's collar-bone was broken.

Things are done with barbaric freedom at such times ; they carried her into the house occupied by a Madame Molinez. She might have been carried home almost as easily. Well, she was not, and here came the ordering of fate. A tall, dark girl, whose touch was gentleness itself, and whose voice was music, though it bore what once Miss Ursula would have condemned as a foreign ring, nursed her, or helped to nurse her.

The girl was Lina X—. Miss Ursula thought her name was Molinez, and that she was a daughter of the lady who so courteously housed her—the invalid.

While this was going on Oswald Money got his promotion—would he accept the post of manager of the branch house at Lisbon, becoming thereby a partner in the house of Drayson and Co. ?

Accept ?—of course he accepted at once.

He wrote a letter home, and he went off at once to Brighton ; he knew enough of Senor Molinez to be able to call at his wife's house.

Miss Ursula was weak and fretful ; she heard sounds about the house, and she missed her sweet young nurse.

"Why do you not stay with me ?" she called when Lina came back after a long absence.

The girl was flushed, and tears of gladness shone in her eyes.

"What is it ? Are you ordered back home ? You do not want to go ? Come and stay with me in London." The old lady spoke sharply but not unkindly.

"Yes, I go," she said. "But many things are changed ; I do not go to stay at my father's house—"

"Some marrying nonsense !" snapped the old lady.

Lina laughed, then she directly after began to cry.

"I will not cry !" she burst out ; "I am too happy ; but ah ! how can I tell you all ? I will make you angry with me—hate me !"

"Stuff ! Who are you going to marry ? Is he a gentleman ?—is he an Englishman ?—is he rich ?"

"Yes—yes—yes. All three—yes. But you do not think I care about the last—do you ?"

"I do. Lovers are fools," growled Miss Ursula. "Is the creature in the house ?"

"Yes."

Lina's face was a study of brilliant purpose. She clasped her hands energetically.

"Bring him to me."

"And you will say he is good ? You will say that I, Lina, am good too ? You will not be angry with me ? You will not say, 'Bah ! I will have no foreign niece' ?"

"Ah !"

Lina was gone.

The poor old lady was weak ; she fell a-crying and so they found her—they, Oswald Money, her nephew, and Lina X—, her future niece.

"You !" she cried, and she brushed her unusual tears away. "You !" she shook her hand at Oswald. "She's taken me in altogether, and—and—there ! give me a kiss, child !"

The Editor's Note Book.

SIR CHARLES DILKE is going to work with an energy for which few of the people concerned seem to have been prepared. After a long course of travel in the slummiest districts of London, and after making himself thoroughly acquainted with the facts of the case as they really are, he has turned to a consideration of the existing law, instead of lamenting that nothing could be done unless somebody else did something unexplained.

THE result is that it appears that existing Acts of Parliament give considerable powers to vestries, which have been little, if ever, exercised in some places, and that the Local Government Board is stirring up the local authorities with startling vigour. There is a great deal of dogged, stolid, inert opposition to overcome, but it is pretty certain that a Minister like Sir Charles Dilke will get his own way in the end.

AND another thing is also certain—a thing which should be carefully considered by party politicians. When the country finds a Minister who will set vigorously and energetically to work, as if his office were a matter of business and not intended merely for political purposes, the country will believe in him and trust him, without caring a jot whether he calls himself a Radical or a Tory.

THE great majority of the public will have read with satisfaction the intimation which has been sent by the Board of Trade to the promoters of the Channel Tunnel, that the Government will feel it their duty to oppose in Parliament the Bills authorising the construction of the Tunnel of which notice has been given. Naturally, the satisfaction will not be shared by Sir Edward Watkin; but then, unfortunately, Sir Edward Watkin's views are not often identical with those of the public nowadays.

IT is the fashion in this age of pessimism to make the beginning of a new year, not so much a period of hopeful anticipation, as a time for Jeremiads over the past. The country, we were assured by all our journalistic instructors last week, is rapidly going to the dogs, politically, socially, and financially—the particular kind of dog varying with the party to which the individual writer belonged.

EVERYBODY, however, unites in complaining of the depression of business, of the small profits of masters, and of the diminishing earnings of men. It is, therefore, not easy to explain why the Revenue returns are infinitely more favourable than could have been hoped, or why, when two Colonial Governments put loans to the amount of eight millions on the market, they should have been taken up at once. Perhaps, after all, things are not so bad as they are said to be.

AS few things can be worse than any uncertainty in the administration of the law, it is to be hoped that the Government will have time to bring in and carry a short Bill to settle the point as to the admissibility of the personal statements of prisoners who are defended by counsel.

IT was supposed to have been settled at the meeting of the judges the other day that such statements could not be admitted, but now it appears that the solemn decision of the judges is not worth the paper on which it was written.

MR. Justice Watkin Williams has declared not only that he agrees with Mr. Justice Stephen, who dissented from the view of his learned brethren, but that he does not consider the decision of the judges as binding on him. Mr. Poland, sitting as Recorder at Dover, has gone a step farther, and has actually admitted the statement of a prisoner, who was afterwards acquitted. As the man's counsel (who made the application that he should be heard) was Mr. Henry Dickens, himself Recorder of Deal, it seems likely that the Recorders of Kent agree with Mr. Justice Williams.

SINCE the above note was written I have had reason to modify this last opinion. Mr. Smith, Recorder of Margate, differs from Mr. Poland, and things are consequently more mixed than ever. It is certainly time to put this matter on a proper footing.

MOST people are aware that a sentence of ten years' penal servitude does not mean that the convict will have to serve the full term, but it is probable that people who read about a man being sentenced, in addition, to seven years' police supervision are impressed with the idea that for that term he will be well looked after and harmless.

THE history of the man calling himself Ralph Williams, who stands charged with a number of burglaries in Chiswick, is calculated to weaken, if not altogether to destroy this faith. Williams, it is stated, was condemned in 1871 to ten years' penal servitude, with seven years' supervision. Supposing the ten years only to have meant seven, the man would have been at large in 1878, and should have been under the eyes of the police until 1885. In 1880, however, he was sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for another offence, and now that he is charged again, it is said that he is well known to the detectives of London. Police supervision seems, if we may judge from this sample, to be a sham altogether.

Facts and Fancies about Church Bells.

Vivos voco,
Mortuos plango,
Fulgura frango.

Inscription on the Schaffhausen Bell.

OF all inanimate objects, except sacred emblems, which have become intertwined with our joys and our sorrows, with our home life and our religious feelings, perhaps none have taken so high and universally recognised a position as church bells. It is difficult for us in these days to conceive how the Early Church could have existed without them, as exist it certainly did, for even if bells could have been cast, their use would have been very imprudent, as it would have been an advertisement inviting persecution. It is no less difficult for us to imagine the state of a country reduced to such straits as was England when the papal legate put it under an interdict, whereby all religious observances were suspended, and, consequently, the church bells were silenced in their towers.

The powerful voices of church bells have ever deeply affected the poets; indeed, few minds are so utterly devoid of feeling as not to perceive that church bells speak to him not only as a poor mortal, though subject to a heavenly King, but that they also enter into his personal affairs, rejoicing at his birth, his baptism, or his marriage, announcing to his neighbours that his house is on fire, proclaiming a holiday for his recreation, ushering his soul into eternity, mourning over his grave; alas! too, sending forth fearful commands for the massacre of devoted fellow-creatures.

It is this personal interest which seems to be the original reason for giving bells a name, such as Mary, Meg, Tom, Gabriel, and so forth.

The Germans claim to have been the inventors of church bells, as we now understand them, for the small bells formerly employed by the Jews and Romans in their worship, had an entirely different character and use.

In the earliest days of Teutonic heathendom the worshippers were summoned to their sacred places by blows struck upon a kind of tambourine formed of skins stretched on a framework. As the skin was injured by the weather it was replaced by a plate of metal something in the manner of the "thunder" of the theatrical property-master. During the nomadic condition of the Teutons a spear, struck upon a shield, formed a happy substitute for the "thunder." Three or four of these shields, fastened together with rivets, would form a much better instrument for the production of sound, and would perhaps furnish the idea for the proverb, "Empty vessels make the most sound." A clapper was then only necessary to give us a bell.

In the way thus indicated were the first bells made, and it was very long before a step in advance could be taken, before bells, in fact, could be cast in one piece. Such a bell was, in the year 613, rooted out of a marsh near Cologne by a sow. It may be that it had been hidden there by its heathen possessors to prevent its desecration by the Christians. It was baptised by Archbishop Kunibert, after which it was long in use at the Church of St. Cecilia, but is now preserved at the Walrafianum. In shape this bell is octagonal, and is composed of three pieces riveted together. It has a height of fifteen and a half German inches, a diameter at the rim of thirteen and three-quarters, of eight and three-quarters at the body, and five and a half at the crown, whilst its thickness at the rim is one and a quarter.

This bell is far from being a unique specimen, for many such have been found in the Rhineland, the oldest of all being, perhaps, that of Odindar, which probably dates from before 600 A.D.

Bells, it will be seen, were a heathen invention. The Christians were summoned to worship by "runners." When the heathens became a minority, the Christians, feeling they could be more public in their actions, used rattles, clappers, trumpets, or even hand-bells; but when Odin worship became a thing of the past, these bells, made of shields or plates of metal, were seen to offer the readiest means of announcing the hours of service, and they were, therefore, whenever found, consecrated by baptism, to convert them, in the eyes of the populace, from heathens to Christians.

Pope Sabinian, who died in 606, ordered the hourly use of bells to mark the times of the services of the Church, and we may, therefore, fix this date as the period when bells became general.

On the other hand, some antiquaries claim Bishop Paulinus of Nola, in Campania, as the inventor of church bells, and in proof of this they adduce the word campanile, the low-Latin combination of Campania and Nola, which gives us the French word campanille. If all this be true, which may be considered doubtful, bells would date from the year 400.

Bells were not introduced to the Eastern world until the year 865, when Patrizias, Doge of Venice, made a present of one to the Emperor Michael of Byzantium, in acknowledgment of services rendered to the republic in its wars with the Saracens.

It has been mentioned above, that bells were baptised. Perhaps in the first instances, where the bells of the heathens were used for Christian purposes, this may have been necessary to mark the transition from one life to the other, and to do away with any lurking belief that the old heathen gods might somehow or other return to claim their own.

Bell baptism is often mentioned in the decretals of Charlemagne, and the Popes contemporary with him set apart a special service for it, which is substantially the same as that now in use in the Roman Church. This office consists usually of the Misere and the twenty-eighth Psalm; the bell is then sprinkled with a mixture of holy water and salt, and anointed with holy oil. It is then signed with the cross, and the formula of baptism is pronounced over it, when the name of the patron saint, or of some other benefactor, is given to it. This ceremony of baptism of an inanimate object was one of the matters which gave offence to the Reformers, when they handed in their protest to the legate of Adrian VI.

Indeed, Protestant Churches generally have set themselves against such canonical baptism, though they do not as a rule object to celebrate the inauguration of a bell by a service in the church, and in many instances they even permit, or at least connive at, the bell being inverted and filled with some generous liquid for the comfort of their congregations. Even in the Roman Church bell baptism has not been always regarded with favour, for bells, like other infants, require godfathers, who are expected to be munificent in the way of christening gifts; and on these occasions the religious communities oftentimes showed themselves so rapacious that serious riots and disturbances took place.

Perhaps this custom of canonical baptism has, more than any other circumstance, endowed bells with a factitious personality or imaginary vitality, which in an uneducated age could not but conduce to the propagation of superstitious beliefs. Thus bells were rung during heavy storms to drive away the evil spirits who produced them; under the name of "passing" or "soul" bells they were rung when Christians were dying, to drive away the evil spirits which were supposed to contend for souls with guardian angels; at Dewsbury they were tolled dolefully on Christmas Eve to mockingly celebrate the death of the devil, but joyfully on Christmas morning for the birth of the Saviour.

The offices of bells were therefore manifold, and hence we have the monkish lines which are preserved by Sir Henry Spelman, "Laudo Deum verum, Plebem voco, congreco Clerum, Defunctos ploro, Pestem fugo, Festa decoro," which under various readings are inscribed on so many bells.

The Church having sanctioned so many legitimate uses of bells, must also be held responsible for many of the superstitious tales which were connected with them; especially as, to the thoughtful mind, the evidence in favour of one class of ideas was not a whit more substantial than that in favour of the other. Bells have therefore furnished the poets with many of their most telling ballads, and many of their best legends. We hear of wonderful bells under the sea, bells buried in the bowels of the earth, bells hidden in the recesses of the woods, and bells hung in the airy clouds. One of our own legends is very pretty and poetical. It states that when the bells were hung at Rostherne in Cheshire, one of the men uttered an oath at the weight of the Tom, whereupon the bell broke loose, crushed the profane swearer, and rolled into the mere where it may now be occasionally heard. The legend goes on to say that on Easter Monday a water nymph who lives in the lake rises to the surface riding on the bell, but the legend very prudently adds that this sight is only visible to those about to die. Etchingam Church, we are told, was enclosed by a moat, wherein lies a bell which can only be drawn thence by a yoke of six pure white oxen. A small silver bell in the papal palace at Avignon was supposed to proclaim of its own accord the death or election of a Pope; another at Barcelona rang each time a member of the house of Austria died, or even when a great public danger was impending; a third at Vellila in Arragon, which always rang when any danger threatened Spain, announced in 1564 the outbreak of the plague at Saragossa, and in 1578 the death of Sebastian of Portugal at the battle of Alcazar; whilst a fourth bell at Roquemada proclaimed in the same way danger to those travelling by sea. Some bells are said to have prevented crime. Thus when the Huns attacked the nunnery of Lieu, all the bells in the town, through the influence of St. Commarus, patron of the place, began of their own accord to ring so lustily that the heathens were frightened away. In the same way the bells rang when the bones of St. Isidore were to be translated to Madrid. Stolen bells were supposed to express their displeasure at the change of owners by obstinately refusing to ring at all. The Bosham bell, however, would not even leave the village when stolen by the Danes, but sank through the ship into the harbour, where it even now rings in company with its brothers in the church tower.

The discerning reader will perceive that many of these bell stories will, if analysed, be found to have originated in an echo, especially those stories in which water or a wood forms a part, and that they are therefore merely expressions of that natural poetry which may be found even in the roughest human heart; whilst others may be traced to a well-known acoustical law which, when an incomplete chord is struck, produces complementary chords to satisfy the ear. Of course, too, many of these legends are doubtless mere monkish inventions to enhance the sanctity of some particular shrine, and may therefore be traced rather to gross superstition than to natural poetry. Thus bells were supposed to be utterly unringable for an unholy purpose, and they were especially obstinate during an interdict. Then again the saints in heaven were said to speak to mortals through the sound of bells, as for example those heard by the mother of St. Gaucherius, and those which awoke Pope Celestinus at the hour of prayer.

The devil, too, was said to have his bells, an example of which may be cited in that possessed by the necromancer Virgil, which so affected the hearers that they were powerless to resist his will.

It was many years after the introduction of bells that they could be made of any size, for the resources of the early founders were very inadequate to the production of large works; indeed, though great advance had been made during the eleventh and twelfth centuries in this direction, it was not until the fifteenth century that gigantic size became a matter of rivalry. The city of Moscow has distanced all competitors in this respect, for Moscow is the metropolis of bells. The Kremlin bell weighs four hundred and thirty-two thousand pounds, the Tsar Kolokol, now broken, weighed three hundred and sixty-nine thousand two hundred pounds, and the Iwan Weliki one hundred thousand pounds. In Central Europe the most noteworthy bells are those of Olmütz, which weigh three hundred and fifty-eight thousand pounds; that of Vienna, three hundred and fifty-four thousand pounds; the Maria Gloriosa or Susanna of Erfurt, twenty-seven thousand five hundred pounds; and the bell of Notre Dame, which weighs thirty-four thousand pounds. Our English examples are far below these great monsters so far as size is concerned. The Big Tom of St. Paul's is but eleven thousand four hundred and seventy-four pounds, though his big brother Paul, our great exception, is thirty-seven thousand three hundred and eighty-three pounds, Tom of Lincoln weighs twelve thousand and ninety-six pounds, "mighty" Tom of Oxford seventeen thousand three hundred and sixty pounds, and Great Tom of Exeter thirteen thousand four hundred and forty pounds.

The earliest casters were the monks themselves, and there are several instances on record of their being so unfortunate as to set their monasteries on fire during the process of smelting. The patron of the casters is St. Forquernus, once a founder himself, afterwards a monk, and eventually a hermit. He is represented in Roman costume with the adjuncts of a casting-house, a bell, and the usual implements of the craft.

Bell-metal consists generally of a mixture of from three to four parts of copper to one of tin, and no other metals or proportions have ever been successfully employed. Iron bells are a complete failure in tone, and require a clapper of very large size in proportion to the bell; while iron bars which have been sometimes used on account of their comparative cheapness, are simply monstrosities, deserving the name of devil's bells, if ever there were such things. It is a popular fallacy that all bells of sweet tone have a proportion of silver in their composition; but in point of fact the silvery tone, as it is poetically termed, is produced not by an admixture of silver, but by scientific knowledge of the founder's art—indeed, if the precious metal were added it would entirely destroy the tone. Of course it is a matter of history that silver has been given by the faithful for this purpose, but it is questionable whether the silver ever found its way into the bell—indeed, if it did it was rather through the caster's ignorance than his honesty. Founders have occasionally even gone to the length of allowing the faithful to throw their own silver into the melting-pot, but they previously took care that the melting-pot had a false bottom, a trap-door, or other contrivance for passing the metal thus obtained into a receptacle where the artisan could readily appropriate it to his own use afterwards.

The art of bell-ringing cannot be noticed in this paper. Suffice it to say that for a peal of four bells, bass, tenor, quint, and octave, the diameters of the bells should range as the numbers thirty, twenty-four, twenty, and fifteen, and the weight as the numbers eighty, forty-one, twenty-four, and ten.

It would also be a very wide subject to treat of the relation of bells to poetry, for the tuneful nine have ever been in love with bells, but it will not be out of place to notice that a masterpiece of German literature, and probably the best lyric ever written, is undoubtedly Schiller's "Song of the Bell."

The inscriptions on bells are often curious, and usually give what may be called the historical particulars—occasionally, too, fantastic verses. The longest inscription on a bell which has come under our notice is that on the Maria, or Susanna, of Munich, which may be thus rendered into English:

"I am called Susanna; I was cast in the names of Jesus, Luke, Matthew, Mark, and John; His Highness the High and Mighty Prince and Lord, Albert of the Rhine, Duke of Upper and Lower Bavaria, was my Godfather; I was brought here from Regensburg; I dispense Storms; I guard from Death; Hans Ernst cast me when People counted from the Birth of God one thousand four hundred three-and-ninety years."

It would not be paying due respect to Great Paul, our own Triton among the minnows, to pass him over without some slight notice. He weighs, as already stated, thirty-seven thousand three hundred and eighty-three pounds, and is composed of thirteen parts of copper to four of tin; his note is E flat, and his cost was three thousand pounds. He was manufactured at Loughborough by Messrs. J. Taylor and Sons, and it is worthy of notice that he is the only big bell which is properly hung, so that while our Great Toms are struck, Great Paul may be rung in the ordinary way.

Cookery.

A BUNDLE OF RECIPES.

AMONG the following simple recipes are a few of Eastern origin which may be useful to many of our readers who desire either to taste dishes with the names of which they are familiar, or who want some little change from the national everyday fare.

Pilau ought to be much more popular in England than it is. Rice and meat thus served form a perfect food, and when it is desired to make the dish more savoury, the rice can be cooked in broth or in the liquor of boiled bacon.

Among the other recipes, mutton brawn will be found useful at this time of the year, especially for those who do not care for brawn made of pig's head. Great care should be taken in cleansing the sheep's head, and if the plan, before recommended in these pages, that of throwing away the first water in which it has boiled for ten minutes, is followed, perfect cleanliness will be secured.

TURKISH PILAU.

Boil Patna rice in plenty of water for twenty minutes, taking care that each grain is separate and rather under than over done. Having strained the rice, stir in a small bit of butter, and season with salt and pepper. Place the prepared rice on a dish, and on the top of it a chicken thoroughly well boiled, or mix with it small pieces of fried or roasted mutton or lamb.

TENGÉRÉ KEBOB.

Fry a piece of meat in butter until it is half cooked, then place it, together with some lemon-peel, a glass of red wine, and a small quantity of spices, pepper, and salt, into a stewpan. Cover it up closely and stew it for four hours over a slow fire.

KIENFTÉ.

Pound in a mortar some beef-suet, half-boiled onions, parsley, eggs, pepper, salt, and a little water. Make this up into small balls, then flour and fry them.

MOHALIBI.

Boil some milk mixed with sugar, and pour into it gradually rice-flour, stirring it all the time over the fire until it becomes as thick as honey. Turn it out upon a plate, and after it has become cold sprinkle it with powdered cinnamon and sugar, and add a few drops of rose-water, or any other perfume.

POLENTA.

Put one pint of water into a stewpan; when it boils add a little salt, stir in with a stick sufficient coarse yellow maize-flour to make it very thick, continue stirring till the mixture is well cooked, which you can tell by its rising in bubbles, then take it out with a spoon on to a napkin and mould the paste into the shape of a ball; let it cool for a few minutes, then cut in slices, lay them in a dish, and sprinkle each layer with Parmesan cheese, and pour two ounces of dissolved butter over it. It may be eaten in this manner, or put in a brisk oven and baked.

The polenta, when it comes out of the stewpan very hot, is nice served with sausages or little birds; the latter laid on the polenta, and gravy over them.

MUTTON BRAWN.

Boil the head and four feet of a sheep until all the bones come out. Cut the meat up into smaller pieces, and mix with the gravy in which it has been boiled a tablespoonful of minced onions, a teaspoonful of pepper, half a teaspoonful of salt, a teaspoonful of mint, a teaspoonful of parsley, a tablespoonful of Reading Sauce, and a dessertspoonful of ketchup. Mix all these well together and boil them for forty-five minutes in a mould or basin. When quite cold, turn it out.

MUSHROOMS.

Take two small newly-gathered mushrooms, cleanse them with a cloth, but on no account use any water, and cut the stalks closely down. Prepare a slice of toast to fit under a tumbler or finger-glass; then place the mushrooms head-downwards on the toast, and put inside them salt, pepper, and butter. Place the toast on a plate, with an inverted tumbler, or finger-glass, over it, and subject it to the heat of a strong fire. When the mushrooms appear to lie flat on the toast, and the evaporated moisture has dripped from the glass on to the toast, the dish will be ready to be served up to table.

ÉPINARDS AU LAIT.

Having boiled some spinach, put it into muslin and squeeze it quite dry. Place it in a saucepan, and add one tablespoonful of butter, one teacupful of milk, and pepper and salt. Stir it up well, adding the milk gradually, and boil it slowly for ten minutes.

PLAIN BUNS.

Take four pounds of sifted flour, and add to them one pound of good moist sugar. Make a cavity in the centre, and stir therein a gill of good yeast and a pint of lukewarm milk, with sufficient of the flour to make it the thickness of cream. Cover it over and allow it to lie for two hours. Melt to the consistency of oil—it must not be hot—one pound of butter, and stir it into the other ingredients with sufficient warm milk to make it into a soft paste. Sprinkle it over with a little flour and let it lie for an hour. Rub a baking platter over with butter, and having moulded the dough with the hands into buns about the size of an egg, place them in rows fully three inches apart. Set them in a warm place for half an hour, or until they have risen to double their original size, then bake them in a hot oven until they become a good colour, and wash them over with a brush dipped into milk after having taken them out of the oven.

PARKIN.

Mix half a pound of butter, two pounds of treacle, one ounce and a half of ground-ginger, one ounce and a half of caraway-seeds, and half an ounce of cinnamon. Put these into a brass pan and stir them together over the fire until they become hot, but do not let them boil; then pour them into three pounds of oatmeal and mix the whole well together. Bake it in tins in a moderately hot oven, so as to avoid scorching it.

SHORT BREAD.

Take two pounds of flour, six ounces of pounded loaf-sugar, one pound of butter, half an ounce of caraway-seeds, and one ounce of sweet almonds. Beat the butter into a cream, gradually dredge in the flour, and add the sugar, almonds, and caraway-seeds; the almonds to be blanched and cut fine. Work the paste till it becomes quite smooth, and divide it into six pieces. Place each cake on a separate piece of paper, with the paste cut square to the thickness of about an inch, and pinch it up on all sides. Put the cakes into a good oven and bake them for twenty-five to thirty minutes.

MACAROONS.

Blanch four ounces of sweet almonds, dry them well in the sun or a cool oven, and pound them thoroughly in a mortar together with half a pound of sifted sugar, and rub both well together; then add the whites of four eggs one by one until the whole be formed into a thinish paste, and add half a teaspoonful of essence of almonds. Pour drops of the size of a walnut on wafer-paper, and sprinkle over the top some sliced almonds and sifted sugar. Bake them in a slow oven until they become a light brown colour.

SEED CAKE.

Take one pound and a quarter of flour well dried, one pound of butter, one pound of loaf-sugar crushed and sifted, eight eggs, two ounces of caraway-seeds, one grated nutmeg, and cinnamon equal to it in weight. Beat the butter into cream and put in the sugar; beat up the whites of the eggs and their yolks separately, then mix them with the butter and sugar. A little before baking beat in the flour, spices, and caraway-seeds. Bake it for two hours in a moderate oven.

CANDIED ORANGE-PEEL.

Boil the peel in several waters until it loses its bitterness, then in a syrup until it becomes soft and transparent; take it out, drain, and dry slowly in the oven. Lastly sprinkle over it a little powdered sugar.

The Lincolnshire Fens.

THE history of the Fens' drainage is a romance in itself. In James I.'s time, a local jury decided against further draining; but in 1626, the king granted leave to Cornelius Vermuyden, a Zealander, who offered for a third part of all he could reclaim to retrieve seventy thousand acres in Axholm alone. The Van Peenins, Valkenburghs, and Vrenattis, rich merchants of Dort and Amsterdam, encouraged the enterprise of their countryman, and his skilled Dutch and Flemish workmen soon got near the end of their work. The fenmen became furious at the improvements. They complained of unjust distribution of the new lands, and of wilful injury done to the old. Openly countenanced by Portington, a turbulent justice of the peace, they frequently fell on the foreigners, broke down their new embankments, and burnt or destroyed their obnoxious implements. The resolute Dutch, who had checked the Thames at Dagenham, and had drained Windsor and Sedgemoor, were not, however, to be baffled by the stilt-walkers of the fens. Vermuyden collected round him French Protestants from Picardy and Walloons from Flanders, refugees whose fathers had fled from the Duke of Alva, and settled in eastern England, along the edge of the fens, especially at Wisbeach, Whittlesea, Thorney, and Spalding. Slowly he carried the waters of the Sole into new deep channels, for ever to be tributary to the Trent. The waters of the capricious Don were also forced henceforward to flow directly into the Ouse, near Goole. Farmers had no longer need to ferry from Axholm to Sandtoft: not again would a boat with coffin and mourners be lost, when crossing from Thorney to Hatfield. Nor, on the other hand, would future time ever see the glorious sight that Prince Henry beheld, when five hundred deer were driven before his one hundred boats, from Hatfield to Thorney Mere. Unfortunately for the industrious Dutchman, one single error in his first plan rendered his whole life miserable. Vermuyden forced the Don at first through its northern channel alone into the river Aire. This cutting proved insufficient, and fresh lands were flooded. The people of the northern Don henceforward became the chief enemies of the improvement, and some of Vermuyden's men killing one of the rioters, led to fifty successive attacks on the works, till at last a royal proclamation read in Axholm by the sheriff, escorted by fifty horsemen, mingled with threats of fire and vengeance, led to some transient quietude. Vermuyden, though proud, resolute, and sometimes driven to retaliation by the stupid boors who did not know their own good, succeeded at last; in 1629 he was knighted by Charles I., and took a grant from the crown of Hatfield Chase for the sum of sixteen thousand and eighty pounds, and an annual rent of one hundred and ninety-five pounds three shillings and fivepence halfpenny, and one red rose.

The Dutch and German settlers were now allowed to build chapels in their villages. Still, the conservative fen-men continued turbulent and complaining. Their houses and farms were flooded, they said, their corn was washed away, their cattle were drowned, and the old rights of common cancelled. Unfortunately for Vermuyden, he had now either lost his temper or grown too arrogant and despotic. He threatened petitioners against him with the gallows, which indeed many of them richly deserved. He threw many offenders against his Dutchmen into York Gaol. He ruthlessly stopped the old freeholder's privilege of cutting moor turf, till he had, at last, to restore many old rights, owing to the interference of Lord Wentworth, president of the North. Eventually Vermuyden washed his hands of ungrateful Lincolnshire altogether, and sold all his property there. In 1642, when the Royalists were threatening the fens, Cromwell's party broke the dykes, pulled up the flood-gates, and again laid Hatfield under water. The tide had turned, and henceforward all—except short gleams of success—went ill with Sir Cornelius. He became involved in a spider's-web of lawsuits, and found his way into prison. The Dutch speculators who had lost by the "Dutch-Canal" also took legal proceedings against him. But indomitable as ever, in 1629 he commenced the great Bedford Level for the Earl of Bedford. The clamour against the brave, resolute, industrious Dutchman then became louder than ever. The street ballads sung against the drainers contained such verses as the following:

Behold the great design, which they do now determine,
Will make our bodles pine, a prey to crows and vermine;
For they do mean all fens to drain and waters overmaster,
All will be dry, and we must die, 'cause Essex calves want pasture.

Wherefore let us entreat our antient water-nurses
To show their power, to grant us t' help to drain their purses;
And send us good old Captain Flood to lead us out to battle,
The two-penny pack, with scales on 's back, will drive out all the cattle.

The noble captain yet was never known to fail us,
But did the conquest get of all that did assail us;
His furious rage could none assuage, but to the world's great wonder,
He tears down banks, and breaks their cranks and whirligigs asunder.

Still the Dutchmen plied their spades, and Charles I. urged forward the work, which was, however, stopped by the agitation aroused by Oliver Cromwell, "Lord of the Fens," as he was called, who urged the gross exactions of the Royal Commission, and the inevitable plunder that would fall on the helpless smaller proprietors at the great man's voice. The work stopped, and the Earl of Bedford died poor. In 1649 the new earl and Vermuyden again set to work, afterwards aided by Cromwell's Scotch and Blake's Dutch prisoners, and by the year 1653 forty thousand acres of land were reclaimed. There are now in Lincolnshire and the Great Bedford Level sixty-one thousand acres of land, worth on an average at least four pounds an acre. Ely is now healthier than Pau, sheep feed where fish once floated, the fen-men are no longer savages, more irreclaimable than were their fever-haunted marshes. The fate of poor Vermuyden was sad indeed. During the Civil Wars he had sold all his lands in Dagenham, Hatfield, Sedgemoor, Malvern, and the Bedford Level, to pay his Dutch workmen. The ungrateful company then preferred heavy pecuniary claims against him. He could not meet them, and in 1656 appeared before Parliament, four years after the completion of his great work, as a suppliant for redress. It is supposed that he soon after went abroad, and died a poor, heart-broken old man. Yet Vermuyden did a brave work, and he left large-brained descendants. Through the Babingtons (the mother's side) the late Mr. Macaulay was descended from the patient, far-seeing Dutchman.

A Chapter on Wood Carving.

CARVING in wood is one of the most fascinating employments possible to a truly artistic and imaginative mind. It admits of immense and charming variety. It gives full and free scope to genius and originality of invention, and, what every true lover of art prizes above all, it not only allows, but seems to cry out for a faithful following of Nature. It is an encouraging work and a hopeful one. Even an invalid may carve wood, the rougher and harder work being done by another hand. We have known cases in which a very beneficial effect has been produced by the exercise of carving, when none other could be taken. It should, however, be done under medical advice, and prudently, with considerable intervals of rest.

WOOD-CARVING requires a great deal of patience and caution, and a considerable amount of ingenuity, especially if the carver invents his own designs, but this plan is, of course, impossible to a great many who have neither a correct eye, nor the gift of invention, though it is by far the most interesting manner of working. Very beautiful designs may be composed from natural objects, such as a bunch of filbert-nuts, with leaves tastefully grouped around them; a spray of blackberry-briar, with both flowers and fruit; a simple group of vine-leaves and tendrils, with or without fruit; some animate objects also look well, but are rather more difficult to arrange and harder to carve.

THE great secret of success is not easy of attainment. This is the tasteful arrangement of the objects forming the group to be worked out. If they are formally or stiffly arranged the effect is unpleasing. The best plan is to gather what you require, and arrange them whilst perfectly fresh in a group, as naturally as you can, upon a piece of flat board, or a small tray, make any alterations you think necessary, and at once transfer the whole to paper, either in drawing with a lead-pencil, or etched with indian-ink, taking only the outlines.

OF course it requires the experienced eye and practised hand of an expert draughtsman to do this, and unless these are at your command, it is wiser to trust to ready-drawn designs. It is always safer to do this in the beginning as anyone unaccustomed to pattern-composition is apt to crowd too much into the given space, and so to render the execution doubly difficult. As in all such pursuits, there should be a gradual progress, the first piece of work attempted should be a very simple one, scarcely more than a piece of fretwork, left thick enough in parts to bevel and shape here and there. Then by degrees, as the eye becomes trained, and the hand answers mechanically and without effort to the will, using the tools easily and skilfully, work of a more ambitious nature may be attempted with every probability of success.

DECIDEDLY the best wood for a beginner is white holly. The work can be distinctly traced upon it. It is firm in texture, fine in grain, and will take a beautiful polish; but, in spite of its firmness and close grain, it is soft enough, without being woolly, to carve easily. It has the additional advantage of hardening as it is exposed to the air. Chestnut, sycamore, beech and birch, box, walnut, and oak are all of them good material, but more suited to an experienced hand, but for a first attempt nothing is better or so good as white holly. The Naples two-pound macaroni white wood boxes are very easily made into many useful articles, and are of such hard wood that most intricate and delicate work may be done upon it.

THE most beautiful bracket we ever remember to have seen was carved by a young groom. His master, during some alterations, had been reluctantly forced to have a huge old laburnum-tree cut down. Not thinking it likely that the wood would be of any value in any other way, he gave orders to have the stem, which was two yards in circumference at the thickest end, cut up for firewood. The groom asked leave to buy it, and his master, knowing his taste for all sorts of wood-workmanship, gave him the whole trunk. The bracket we saw was from this laburnum-tree. It was a group of filbert leaves and nuts, and was exquisitely imagined and carved. The general colour of the wood, its beautiful markings and varied tints, surpassed any that we have ever seen before or since. A carpenter will always be able to procure different woods for you, and will cut them in slabs the thickness you require.

CASES of carving tools may be purchased at various prices, but a better plan than buying them in the lot is to get them separately at a good cutler's, as you grow to require them.

As fretwork may be considered a necessary introduction to carving in wood, we may take it for granted that you possess all the tools, etc., required for it—i.e. a fret-saw frame with saws complete, a set each of chisels, bradawls, and files, a screwdriver, a couple of gimlets, and a good knife with two blades. Besides these requisites for fretwork, a few additional tools must be procured for carving—a set of gouges, a countersink, a couple of scratch-awls, a carpenter's square, and a carving-knife which has finely-pointed blades, especially meant for carving. A V-gouge is a very useful little implement for veining leaves and stroking stems, and for other delicate work of the kind. A good plane of a small kind is also required, and a few rasps are a useful and cheap addition to the files. These latter should be of various sizes and shapes—some flat, some round, some round and pointed, and some with one side round and the other flat. A supply of glass, sand, and emery paper, in various degrees of coarseness, should be provided, likewise some pieces of freshly broken white bottle or window glass, for scouring and refining.

THERE is generally a difficulty found in getting the tools properly sharpened, for, as a rule, they are not sold ready for use; every cutler will do this for you at so much the dozen, small and large, but a carver in wood should endeavour to learn how to do it for himself, on an oil-stone. The best plan is to get a lesson from some carpenter, or other person, who knows how to do it. If you try to teach yourself you will probably ruin your tools.

A SIMPLE article for a beginner, who has not yet attained complete mastery over his tools and hands, is a book-slide of plain pattern. Having either designed your own pattern, or procured one ready drawn, first trace it out afresh on oil-paper, expressly sold for the purpose, reserve the original copy, and use the traced paper. In this way you always have the pattern at hand to work from. Gum the traced paper on the slab of wood, let it dry, and then with a fret-saw cut out all the open work. Having done this, take your common knife, and cut away all parts that require it, following your pattern exactly. Some parts will be taken out with a rounded cut, in order to leave a hollow, others with a sharp triangular cut, taken out abruptly. Some groundworks are finished with a sort of diaper pattern, that is, the level wood taken out in regular order, by dipping the point of the sharpest and most needle-like blade of the carving-knife in, and taking out a piece of wood not larger than a pin's head.

VERY much professional diaper-work is done by means of a little stamping machine, like a wheel for marking pastry, which is pressed heavily over the wood, after it has been soaked in cold water and is still wet. These wheels mark an impression of stars, trefoils, crosses, or any very minute pattern, but they have a poor and stiff effect, and the diaper wears out in such articles as trenchers and butter-dishes as soon as the article is washed.

In carving raised work of a more intricate character, the best plan is to have two or even three copies of the design: the flat pattern simply traced out, the intermediate stage, as it would appear when the roughest outer work was done, and the completed carving. Lay the flat pattern on the block of wood, for in deep carving the wood must be a considerable thickness, and should be measured rather deeper than the whole depth required by the design, to allow a margin in case of accidents. Then following the pattern, cut away freely all spaces between the pattern. Freely, but also cautiously, remembering that if you make a mistake, and cut away any part that should be left, you will have to plane your surface afresh, and begin again. Having got the work into ship-shape, and cut away all that you can so far, take your next paper and work up to it, leaving all the leaves, flowers, fruit, or what not, in simple blocks for the present, merely following their outline without attempting to model them.

As the work progresses take the copy of the completed design, and endeavour to carve your leaves, berries, and flowers, etc., to match. When the whole thing is brought as near perfection as you can, finish the leaves and flowers with the V-gouge, marking the veins of the leaves and the markings along the stems, sharpen out all corners with suitable files, and hollow out any parts that require it with a fine gouge. Then rub every part with sand-paper till every trace of roughness is removed; in some parts, where the wood is knotty and hard, it is better to smooth it with a sharply-broken bit of glass. The last process should be sand-papering the whole, first with coarse glass-paper, then with the next degree finer in sand-paper, and afterwards with emery-paper; this last must not be used for white or light-coloured woods, as it spoils the colour. It is impossible to give directions for every stroke, or even for every hundredth stroke; advice and instruction for the various kinds of work is all that can be attempted, the rest must be left to the eye and the hand of the artist, who must guide both by his intuitive sense of right and wrong. A little practice is worth a great deal of theory, and plenty of practice will soon make an earnest worker perfect.

VERY pretty effects are produced by working in striking contrasts; for instance, carving a bracket in white holly, and placing it upon an upright shield of dark wood. We have seen very pretty brackets carved in very dark wood—walnut or rose, of a very dark shade—in foliage designs, with a small bird cut out in white wood perched on a twig or leaf-stalk. The contrasting part in white is carved separately and glued in its place after the rest of the work is finished. A bright effect is also given by a bunch of flowers in a group of foliage being worked in white wood.

Law Makers in the Far West.

OF course there must be a legislature as soon as a territory, however rude, is organised, and somebody must "run" for it, and somebody be elected in the various divisions to sit in the local parliament, all who are so chosen having the title of "honourable." But, indeed, it would seem that in these parts every government official, except the policeman, is entitled to this handle to his name.

In the wilder parts of the western settlements, in old days, members of legislature have often been elected not so much for their talents as for being "good hands at poker," or "great on a spree," and one of these ("the honourable gentleman from Mariposa"), on getting up for the first time to speak in the Californian legislature, and essaying several times without much success, was greeted with shouts of "Git out! Oh! Git out!" They mistook their man, however, for, as one of his supporters remarked before his election, "He ain't much on the speak, but jist git him mad once, and he'll give 'em fits." "Look ye here, gentlemen," he remarked, cocking a Derringer pistol, "ye may holler 'Git out, git out,' as long as ye're let to, but my speech is already begun, and the next man who shouts 'Git out' in the House will bring to his ears the ominous click of small-arms. What is it the gentlemen wish, and what would they have? Is my life so dear, or my peace so sweet, that it must be purchased at the expense of incapacitating a few on ye for militairy service? No, sir-ee! I don't know what course others would take, but as for me, I'll finish my speech or there'll be a dead senator found round these premises in about fifteen seconds by the clock." He was allowed to finish at his leisure.

The late Dr. Henry, formerly Surveyor-General of Washington Territory, among the good stories which he used to tell, had one at the expense of the territorial legislature. An hotel-keeper in one of the fashionable towns in the Eastern States used to stand at the head of the table and read out the bill of fare in what the elocution-teacher would call a "clear articulate voice," though there was a printed carte on the table. This irritated his aristocratic customers not a little, until at last one said: "Say, cap, why do you read out the bill of fare? Do you think we can't read?" "Oh, gentlemen," was the reply, "you will excuse me, I hope. It is solely the force of habit. I once kept a ho-tel in Washington Territory, and most of the legislators boarded with me, and I'm blessed if half o' them could read or write!"

It is a matter of history that when the convention met to form a constitution for California, on the usual preamble being read, "that all men should be judged by a jury of their peers," a man from Oregon, who happened to be a delegate, moved, to the great amusement of the other members, that the word "peers" should be struck out. "This warn't a mon-archy—there warn't no peers in this here State!"

Disgraceful scenes of drunkenness were sometimes seen in the legislatures, but in that respect they did not stand alone. One of the Californian members of the United States Senate at one time was distinguished as "the sober senator," such a virtue as sobriety being rather uncommon in the then Congressmen from that particular State. Corruption in these State legislatures prevailed to a frightful extent, and was so open that newspapers even had the hardihood to give a list of the sums paid to each senator for his vote. In the more refined States, official embezzlements were styled "pickings," but in the Far West and the Pacific States plain English sufficed, and they were known as "stealings." On more than one occasion prominent government officials have asked me, while in social intercourse, how much salary I got for such an office, and when I stated it, "Wal," would be the reply, "that ain't much for this country, but of course you have got your little stealings?" I was naturally rather indignant, and inclined to resent the insinuation that I could be guilty of robbing my Government, or employers of any sort, until they assured me that no harm was meant. It was the regular thing there, everybody did it. "Why, sir, do you think I can support my family on fifteen hundred dollars a year in greenbacks at sixty cents to the dollar, or that I would come to this one-horse place, after having had a practice as a lawyer in 'Frisco of ten thousand dollars, for that? I guess not!"

All members of these legislatures are paid, and also receive a certain mileage or travelling allowance for their homes to the seat of government. This recompense, or "per diem" as they call it, varies from about ten to fifteen dollars a day, and is generally paid in the Pacific States in gold. The mileage is about twenty-five cents a mile. Now this to Congressmen travelling from the distant States of the Far West comes up to a good round sum, and, indeed, is regarded by them as their principal pay, always exclusive of the "little stealings" already mentioned.

In the Far West, as elsewhere, there are legislators not too much in earnest. I recommend to some of our candidates for British suffrages the following noble close to a Far Western election address: "Gentlemen," said the candidate, after having given his sentiments on the "constitootion," the "Munroe doctrine," and such like topics; "gentlemen," and he put his hand on the region of his heart, "these are my sentiments—the sentiments, gentlemen, of an honest man—ay, an honest politician, but, gentlemen and fellow-citizens, ef they don't suit you, they ken be altered."

Household Gardening.

AFTER having given instructions last week for making rockeries, we intimated that some suitable plants would be named for planting them. As planting should be done in either autumn or early spring, and as it is too late for one season and too early for the other, the matter is not urgent; and further, as some time must elapse ere the mounds in question can be prepared, the information referred to may without inconvenience be postponed in the interest of other seasonable notes on operations of more immediate importance.

DIGGING, TRENCHING, AND MANURING GARDENS.

Of all winter work that which is applied towards the amelioration and enrichment of the soil is of the greatest moment. It is plain and simple work, too, requiring in the opinion of many only willing hearts and strong arms to accomplish it; and therein lies the danger of the work being profitless.

Very much more than physical strength is needed in preparing ground in the best, most economical, and most effectual manner for the reception of the crops that it is desired to cultivate. No matter what these crops are, whether flowers, fruit, or vegetables, thought must be exercised in the work in question, and the brain must ever guide the hand in its accomplishment.

In the consideration of the three primary operations under notice, we will take them in the inverse order in which they are named, not as indicating their relative importance, for one or the other of them may claim priority in this respect according to circumstances, but as being in more strict conformity with the routine of gardening practice.

MANURING SOIL.

When material of whatever kind is added to the soil for rendering it more fertile, it is usually done before either digging or trenching. There are exceptions to the rule, but not generally when the work is done in winter. Supplementary manuring in spring is often practised with great advantage, and the subject will not be forgotten; but at present our remarks will have reference to the work as conducted at the present season of the year.

By the term manuring, we mean the addition of anything to the soil that will improve its staple and increase its productiveness, therefore our observations will not by any means be limited to animal manures—that is, the refuge of horse-stables, cowsheds, and piggeries.

OVER MANURING.

Some gardens have been so liberally treated with fertilising matter of that kind (and it is the most valuable of all for general purposes) that a further application would be injurious rather than otherwise. We know of many gardens that are disappointing in the returns they give considering the prodigal manner in which they have been enriched. They are, in fact, poisoned with manure.

When land has been heavily manured year after year, a greater quantity having been given than the crops could appropriate, it becomes sour and unhealthy. Soil that is black, unctuous, and buttery when dug is in this state, and far better than a further dressing of decayed stable refuse would be an application of lime.

LIME AS A CORRECTIVE.

Lime is an important element in plant growth, and is almost invariably absent from soils that have been treated as above described. Nearly all plants and crops need lime, and not a few cannot long exist without it. This mineral is cheap, easily applied, and serves important purposes, namely, supplying crops with one of their natural constituents, purifying the soil by liberating the acids that are sealed up in it, and destroying, or at least checking the increase of grubs and insects.

The proper way to apply lime is to obtain it in lumps, or "shells," as they are often called, place these in small heaps on the land, and cover them with soil dug from around them. The moisture in the soil will cause the lumps to swell and fall, the lime bursting through in the form of powder; then is the time to spread and fork it into the soil, keeping it as near the surface as possible, as it always finds its way downwards.

On soils very rich or heavy, a bushel of lime may be applied to a rod of thirty square yards, a less quantity sufficing for lighter land or gardens that are not made over-rich by frequent applications of manure over a series of years. It is particularly good for fruit-trees.

SOIL AS MANURE.

When gardens have been dressed with decayed leaves until the earth has become black in colour and light in texture, then a dressing of fresh soil of a heavier character will be of far more service than ordinary manure. In such a case it would be true economy for those who have manure to exchange it for fresh, free, yellowish loam, not the sour refuse excavated in making foundations for buildings. Such exchanges can often be effected to the mutual advantage of both parties who may enter into an arrangement of this nature.

ASHES AND GRITTY MATTER FOR GARDENS.

In many gardens, if not in the majority, the soil is so strong and heavy, almost approaching clay, that it cannot be easily worked. It is hard when dry, lumpy, and unkindly, and can scarcely be made fine enough for sowing and planting. The remedy is rough digging now, exposing as much as possible of it to the action of the weather, and incorporating with it all the ashes and gritty road-sweepings that can be collected.

Material of this kind possesses little manurial value, but its mechanical action is of great service, and is of more benefit than a dressing of manure. Wood-ashes, in addition to opening the soil, act as a fertiliser, and should never be wasted. Leaf-mould and decayed vegetable matter of any kind, such as cocoa-nut fibre refuse, and even sawdust, may also with advantage be applied to heavy soils, as also may soot, which is one of the best manures that can be used. Ashes should never be applied to light and dry soils, as there they would do more harm than good.

TRENCHING GROUND.

The object of trenching is to produce an increased depth of soil, and if this is alike good throughout, its producing power is increased in the same proportion. If the earth is fertile to the depth of eighteen inches, it will contain twice the amount of plant-food that is contained in a depth of nine inches.

But it does not follow that in every case where the soil is shallow that its depth should be doubled at once. The deepening of soil must always be gradual, as to bring up several inches of sour subsoil would be to invite failure, for in such soil nothing will grow satisfactorily before the earth is enriched.

In the process of trenching, only about an inch of the subsoil should be brought to the surface, the bottom of the trench being at the same time broken up and left there. If a layer of manure or vegetable matter can be spread on it at the bottom of each trench, this will not be lost, because another year it can be brought up with an increased quantity of the subsoil, which it will have materially improved. That is the safe and true way of deepening shallow soil and increasing the productiveness of a garden.

In the prosecution of the work the soil must first be removed to the width of, say eighteen inches, or two feet, to the depth required, this being removed to the other end of the plot. Then another trench, measured to the exact width of the first, taken out and the soil cast into the excavation, and so on till the whole is turned over, when the earth first removed will be in readiness for filling the last trench. That is excellent winter work, and, well conducted, always profitable.

DIGGING GROUND.

Though trenching cannot always be done, digging must be when the land is to be cropped with either flowers or vegetables. Always begin at the lowest part of the ground, and finish at the highest; and do not fail to dig as deeply as possible.

If the land is very strong and heavy, approaching clay, throw it up in ridges, and the frost and air will act on it beneficially; in the spring when partially, but not wholly dry, fork it over, and most of the large lumps can be crushed to powder. Light soil is not improved by ridging, but may be dug level at the first operation.

Preparing the soil by turning it over and exposing it to the ameliorating influences of the weather, adding at the same time such manurial ingredients as above suggested, is the very root of successful gardening, and it is by neglecting this work, or doing it imperfectly, that so many fail with the plants and crops they attempt to cultivate; hence attention is directed to the subject at a time when the advice communicated can be turned to account; but never attempt to dig when there is snow on the ground, nor when the surface is crisp with frost, or in a wet, unpleasant, adhesive state.

WINDOW PLANTS.

Primulas, Cinerarias, Cyclamens, and various kinds of bulbous plants will now be flowering, and to keep them fresh over the longest possible period, the roots must be kept regularly moist and the foliage free from dust.

Water should be given in a tepid state, and always in sufficient quantity to penetrate quite through the soil. Many persons are afraid to give sufficient water to such plants as Primulas lest the moisture should cause the lower parts of the leaf-stalks to decay, hence instead of giving a good soaking occasionally they give light surface sprinklings frequently. It is these light waterings that more than anything else cause the evils that it is sought to avert.

All the best roots of a plant are deep down in the pot, and if these are dry while the surface of the soil is wet, collapse must occur sooner or later. The soil must be moist where the roots are, and it is far better for that at the bottom of a pot to be moist and the surface dry than for the surface to be wet and the lower part practically destitute of moisture. Hyacinths and other bulbs now growing freely need copious supplies of water. The soil should never be permitted to become really dry. Water may be given at any time when it passes freely into the soil. If the pots are full of roots, and the room warm and dry, this will be every day; but in the case of plants in less active growth, and in a cooler position, not nearly so much water will be requisite for their support.

Keep the foliage of smooth-leaved plants clean by the occasional application of a damp sponge, but dust can be better removed from woolly-leaved plants by the careful use of a soft feather brush; removed it must be by some means, or they cannot long remain healthy.

Do Birds Think?

BY A LADY WHO KEEPS A BIRD HOSPITAL.

"Do birds think? Let me tell you of a little bird I once owned. The little bird was a female mocking-bird who had a nest of young ones about a week old. The baby birds were never healthy, inheriting weakness from their father, who had asthma. Early one morning I was awakened by the mother-bird standing on my pillow pouring into my ear the most mournful notes I ever heard. I knew something was wrong, and arose at once. The mother flew to her nest, then looked to see if I was following, which I was. As soon as I had reached the nest she took hold of one of the baby-bird's wings, pinched it gently with her beak, and watched it eagerly, I think, to see if it moved. Then she took hold of one of the little feet, and pinched it in the same manner, and finding it did not move, she looked up at me in a pleading way, as if she wanted me to try to waken them. I reached my hand out towards the nest. She stood aside, and looked on with as much interest and feeling apparently as any young human mother.

"I examined the lifeless little bodies, and when I withdrew my hand the mother hastened to hover over the little ones, seeming to think that if she could warm them they would awaken. In a few moments she hopped off the nest, looked at her babies, held food close to their mouths, and coaxed and called them, but in vain. She flew all around the room, as if in search of some untried remedy. Several times she perched on my shoulder, and looked so distressed and pitiful I could scarcely keep from crying. I put her in a cage, and hung her in the sunshine, to see if she would become quiet. She took a bath, but still remained nervous and seemed anxious, and by-and-by grew so restless that I had to take her out of the cage and let her go to her nest again.

"She stood quiet a while looking at her dead children. Then she went over all the little bodies—pinching them gently, and watching them closely, to see if they moved. When she saw no signs of life she seemed puzzled. She seemed at last to make up her mind that the little ones were dead. And one by one she lifted them tenderly in her beak and laid them side by side in the middle of the room. She looked at them lovingly a moment, then flew to her empty nest and gazed wonderingly into that. Finally she perched on my shoulder, and looked into my eyes, as if to ask: 'What does all this mean?' What a lesson of love and devotion that little bird taught! She always fed the little ones before taking a mouthful herself, and sometimes she would stand coaxing them to take one more mouthful, and finding they had enough would swallow it herself."

Odds and Ends.

MR. BARON GRAHAM was one of the judges who sat on the English bench in the early part of this century. He was distinguished for his remarkable politeness, and for having sentenced more unfortunate human beings to death than any other judge who ever presided at the county assizes. He invariably exemplified his peculiar notions of politeness, even in the very act of sentencing poor creatures to death. His manners on such occasions would often have been laughable, but for the deeply-affecting situation in which the unhappy prisoners stood. A very singular instance of the baron's excessive and ill-timed politeness occurred on one occasion, after the close of the trials at a county assize. Nine unhappy men were all appointed to receive sentence of death for burglary, highway robberies, and other offences. It so happened, however, that on entering the names of the unfortunate parties, after being convicted, on his own slip of paper, Baron Graham omitted the name of one prisoner. The nine men were brought up to receive judgment, and the eight whose names were on his paper were severally sentenced to death. They then quitted the bar. The ninth stood in mute astonishment at the circumstance that no sentence was passed on him. The clerk of the court, perceiving the mistake, immediately called aloud to his lordship just as he was opening the door to leave the court, that he had omitted to pass sentence on one unfortunate man. Turning about, and casting a look of surprise at the unhappy prisoner, he hurried back to the seat he had just vacated, and, taking a pinch of snuff—he was one of the most inveterate snuff-takers that ever lived—and, putting on the black cap, he addressed the prisoner in the following strain, making, at the same time, a profusion of bows: "My good man, I really beg your pardon for the mistake; it was entirely a mistake—altogether a mistake, I assure you. The sentence of the court on you is, that you be taken to the place whence you came, thence to the place of execution, and there hanged by the neck until you are dead. And the Lord have mercy on your soul. I do beg your pardon. I'm very sorry for the mistake, I assure you." So saying, he made another bow to the unhappy man, and then quitted the court.

THERE was a lad who, at fourteen, was apprenticed to a soap-boiler. One of his resolutions was to read an hour a day, or at least at that rate, and he timed himself by an old silver watch left him by his uncle. He stayed seven years with his master, and when he was twenty-one he knew as much as the young squire. Now let us see how much time he had to read in seven years, at the rate of one hour each day. It would be two thousand five hundred and fifty-five hours, which, at the rate of eight reading hours per day, would be equal to three hundred and ten days; equal to forty-five weeks; equal to eleven months—nearly a year's reading. That time spent in treasuring up useful knowledge would pile up a very large store. It is worth trying for. Begin now. Do what you can. In after years you will look back upon the task as the most pleasant and profitable you ever performed.

THIS anecdote of old Lord Bathurst will bear telling over again. He used to repeat often, with a smile, that Dr. Cheyne had assured him, fifty years before, that he would not live seven years longer unless he abridged himself of his wine. About two years before his death he invited several of his friends to spend a few cheerful days with him at his seat, near Cirencester, and being one evening very loth to part with them, his son (then Lord Chancellor) objected to their sitting up any longer, adding that health and long life were best secured by regularity. The earl suffered his son to retire, but, as soon as he left the room, exclaimed: "Come, my good friends, since the old gentleman is gone to bed, I think we can venture to crack another bottle."

A PROFESSOR of languages, who was fond of drawing his definitions fine, was one day explaining to his class "that in English check and snub are interchangeable terms, signifying co-extensively fundamental ideas," when one of his pupils interruptingly exclaimed: "I see the point; so, when you want a check for my tuition, I'll tell the governor to give you a snub."

A MAN once took a piece of white cloth to a dyer, to have it dyed black. He was so pleased with the result that after a time he went back to the dyer with a piece of black cloth, and asked to have it dyed white. But the dyer answered: "A piece of cloth is like a man's reputation; it can be dyed black, but it cannot be made white again."

AN Irishman went to see Niagara, and while he gazed upon it, a friend asked him if it was not the most wonderful thing he had ever seen. To which he replied: "Never a bit, man!—never a bit! Sure, it's no wonder at all that the wather should fall down there, for I'd like to know what would hinder it."

WHEN a man's hair stands on end, an ordinary person says his hair stands, but you can't get a doctor to talk in that way. The doctors call it horripilation. This makes the patient's hair stick up worse than ever, but it gives the family confidence in the doctor.

A CONVALESCENT small-pox patient looked in the mirror and exclaimed: "I used to be thought a nice-looking fellow; but what am I good for now?" "I don't know," replied his sympathetic friend, "unless you can be utilised as a thimble."

SINCE it has become generally known that the sciences of cricket and boat-rowing are not taught in German colleges, more English youths are being educated at home than formerly.

WHEN the doctor advised Brown to take care of his health, Brown remarked with a feeble smile that really it was so poor that he didn't think it was worth taking care of.

WHEN a certain bachelor was married the members of the Bachelor Club broke him up by sending him as a wedding-present a copy of "Paradise Lost."

A DANDY in the North had legs so attenuated that the authorities had him arrested because he had no visible means of support.

"Do make yourselves at home, ladies," said a hostess to her visitors one day. "I'm at home myself, and wish you all were."

MAY a man justly consider his wife poetical when she is a verse to him?

CHARLES XII. of Sweden was beleaguered at Stralsund, and it was only his constancy that prevented him from falling into the hands of his enemies. They made great efforts to compel him to surrender, but he stood out till he found an opportunity to escape to Sweden. Meanwhile a large number of bombs were thrown into the city. One day the king sat in a room on the ground floor of a two-storeyed house dictating letters for Sweden to his secretary. The door of an adjoining room stood open. A bomb struck the house, penetrated the two storeys, and fell into this adjoining room, where it burst with a deafening report. A fragment of the bomb flew to the feet of the king, but all this made so little impression upon his majesty that he seemed quite unconscious of what had happened. It was far different with his secretary, who possessed much less strength of mind. He grew pale, his pen dropped from his hand, and he fell back in his chair. The king, who immediately observed that he was not writing, exclaimed: "What is amiss with you? You are not writing." The secretary was in a terrible fright, and could scarcely utter a word. "The bomb, your majesty," he stammered. "What has the bomb to do with the letter you are writing?" quietly answered the king. "Get on, I pray you, with what you are doing."

BEFORE MARRIAGE AND AFTER.

Lover: For one dear word of thine, my sweet,
I'd pour my treasures at thy feet!
Husband: Talk as you will—I've said before,
I'll not allow one penny more.

ABOUT two years ago a coastguardman swam with a rope to a stranded vessel, after even the lifeboat had been beaten back. The surf looked bad enough to stupefy a seal, but somehow or other this brave fellow fought his way through. When he got under the lee of the stranded ship, a man in the rigging addressed him in terms not often used in ordinary life. The sailor said: "Brother, have you come to save us?" The coastguardman answered: "Hold your jaw, and lay hold of this rope."

"TELL me something I don't know," squeaked a silly youth who had been chattering like an ape to his companion for several minutes, greatly to the annoyance of others present. "Well, sir," said a dignified old gentleman, "I will tell you something you don't know. You are a jackass, sir!" When the admiring audience had ceased applauding, the youth who had thus suddenly acquired some valuable information was not in sight.

DUMLEY was making an evening call, and the nice little boy of the family had been allowed to remain up a little later than usual. "Mamma," he said, during a lull in the conversation, "can whisky talk?" "Certainly not," "What put that absurd notion into your head?" "Well," he replied, "I heard you say to papa that whisky was talking on Mr. Dumley, and I wanted to know what it said."

"SHOW me the man who struck Pat O'Docherty," shouted a pugnacious little Irishman at an election; "show me the man who struck Pat O'Docherty, and I'll—" "I am the man who struck Pat O'Docherty," said a big, brawny fellow, stepping to the front; "and what have you got to say about it?" "Och, sure," answered the small one, suddenly collapsing, "and didn't you do it well!"

"Now," said a lawyer, taking his client to one side for private consultation, "you may be hanged, but I'll do what I can for you. You must, however, leave everything to me." "Well, that's cool," replied the client; "they told me before I went into the case that I would have to pay a good sum, but when it comes to leaving everything to you, I might as well back out and let the case go by default."

NOT long ago a Scotch board-school inspector asked the members of a class that was under examination: "What is the cause of the saltiness of the ocean?" Flushed with the discovery that had flashed upon her mind, one little girl raised her hand. "You may tell," said the inspector. "Salt fish, sir!" exclaimed the pupil triumphantly.

A REMARKABLE exploit was performed by a Missouri farmer, who gave his neighbour griddle-cakes and biscuits baked in four and a half minutes from the time the wheat was standing in the fields. This included a journey to and from the mill, sixteen rods distant from the wheatfield.

AN old Highland clergyman, who had received several calls to parishes, asked his servant where he should go. His servant said: "Go where there is most sin, sir." The preacher concluded that was good advice, and went where there was most money.

WIFE: "The flour's out." Husband: "So is my money." Wife: "The coal is gone." Husband: "So is my credit." Wife: "Well, we can't starve." Husband: "Can't we? That's good; I was afraid we should."

"KIND words can never die." How bitterly does a man realise that terrible truth when he sees all the kindest words he ever said in his life glaring at him from his published letters in a breach of promise suit.

AN old man who had been badly hurt in a railroad collision, being advised to sue the company for damages, said: "Well, no, not for damages; I've had enough of them; but I'll just sue 'em for repairs."

"COME, don't be timid," said a couple of silly snobs to two mechanics; "sit down and make yourselves our equals." "We should have to blow out our brains to do that," was the reply.

A CELEBRATED organist slipped off his bench recently while playing a Bach fugue as a voluntary. It was suggested that he ought to be expelled from the church as a Bach-slither.

THE difference between a long and short yarn is very well illustrated by the difference of one's feelings in holding a skein for one's grandmother or for one's sweetheart.

AN old gentleman, having been invited by an acquaintance to go out and see his country seat, went, and found it to be a stump in a large meadow.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTION.

J. W. wishes to know where he can obtain a recitation called "The Convict's Escape."

ANSWERS.

E. J. P. (Camberwell).—We are not aware that there are any "boy students (engineers) in the Civil Service." If you wish to enter a boy as student in the Naval Service, write to the secretary of the Department for Engineering Students, Portsmouth Dockyard. It will probably not be easy to get a boy on the books.

F. ALEXANDER.—The position you describe seems an excellent one for growing and ripening tomatoes, and we hope in due time to give such instructions as will enable you to succeed in your object.

FORLORN.—The verses are by L. E. L., and were originally published in one of the annuals, 1827:

I wrote my name upon the sand;
I thought I wrote it on thine heart.
I had no touch of fear that words,
Such words, so graven, could depart.
The sands, thy heart, alike have lost
The name I trusted to their care;
And passing waves, and worldly thoughts,
Effaced what once was written there.
Woe, for the false sands! and worse woe,
That thou art falsest of the twain!
I yet may write upon the sands,
But never on thine heart again.

FRENCH PASTRY.—"Flan" really means custard, but the term is given to open fruit-tarts. Gouffé says: "These tarts are prepared in two different ways; the fruit can be baked with the crusts, or it may be cooked separately, and put into the baked crusts when about being served." The following is his recipe for "Apricot Flan Tarts": "Butter a ring-shaped open tart-mould, and put it on a buttered baking-sheet; line the mould with lining-paste, and pinch the edge of the paste with pincers; strew the paste with pounded sugar, and place on it some apricots cut in halves; bake in the oven heated to a light brown paper temperature, and when the tart is done, take it out of the mould, brush the edge of the crust over with some syrup, registering 32° on the saccharometer, and put it in the oven for two minutes; when cold, sprinkle some pounded sugar over the apricots and serve."

INQUIRER H.—1. Slang was not uncommon in the days of the Plantagenets, and "Pigeons of Paul's" had reference to the scholars of Paul's. These boys, in return, called the scholars of St. Anthony's Hospital "Anthony Pigs." 2. "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue," from a speech of Burke's on declining the poll at Bristol.

JOHN L. K.—1. You will find a list of all the newspapers published in London in "Dickens's Dictionary of London." It would be impossible to enumerate them here. 2. According to a recent computation, there are twelve thousand one hundred and seventy-five newspapers and magazines published in the United States. Of these one thousand two hundred and twenty-seven are daily newspapers, and nine thousand nine hundred and fifty-five are weeklies.

J. W.—See answer to "Cupid," No. 141.

OLD COCKNEY.—"The Minories took its name from the Cloister of the Minims, or rather Minorettes, nuns of St. Clare. The Minims were certain reformed Franciscans, founded by St. Francis de Paula in the fifteenth century. They went barefooted, and wore a coarse black woollen stuff, fastened with a woollen girdle, which they never put off day or night. The word is derived from the Latin minimus (the least), in allusion to the text: "I am less than the least of all saints" (Eph. iii. 8).

PERPLEXED.—1. The "g" in Weighia rosea being derived from the German name Weigh, should be pronounced hard to be strictly correct, the name Weigh being pronounced "Veigh." The flowering shrub should also be called "Veighia." 2. Yes; in sand, under handglasses. 3. It is not usual to drop the prefix. "Colonel" and "General" are, of course, of higher rank than "Lieutenant-Colonel" and "Major-General." 4. Whether Pilsner-bier be exclusively lager-beer or not is a question for the ale merchant to settle; but lager is the specific name for the mild beer commonly drunk in Germany and the United States, with very slight intoxicating properties. The true analogue to Pilsner-bier would be not Guinness, Bass, etc., but Edinburgh ale, Warwick ale, Dublin stout, London porter, etc. 5. The cement may do for a time, but we think slips of wood nailed outside over the cracks would be more efficacious. 6. Are not the knives you mention those used by the gardener in cutting up the vegetable from the bed? 7. Answer to your former question respecting varieties of pigeons cannot be given on account of the space required for it. You will find most of the information for which you ask in books by Fulton and Tegetmeier. Some of the varieties named by you are so delicate, rare, and expensive, that few persons can afford to buy them.

PUZZLED.—For many centuries Florence was a man's name, and a whole line of counts of Holland bore it as Floris, Florens, or Florence. We believe that the earliest instance on record of the use of Florence as a woman's name is that of Florence, daughter of Hugh de Courtenay of Devon and Margaret Carminio, who lived in the fifteenth century.

THE BRAMBLES IVY.—"Sattaponne" kindly sends the following verses, which we presume are those you require:

Upwards ascendeth, through gates of the west,
Heav'nward the sighing of pilgrims distressed,
Upward, where angels in wonderment fall
Round Him, in Whom is no darkness at all.
Downward, rejoicing, through gates of the west,
Earthward the angels fulfil His behest;
"Onward" they whisper when shadows appeal,
Trust Him in Whom is no darkness at all.

Coming Into a Fortune.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"You will not mention that—that we are richer than before," said Miss Swindon with some nervous hesitation, fearing that her request was a little peculiar.

"Certainly not, my dear madam, if you do not wish it," replied the London solicitor, who had come down to Bamford to complete the transfer of considerable property to the two elderly maiden ladies, who were well-known in the little town as Miss Swindon and Miss Letitia.

"I do not wish it, nor does my sister. We think it would be much pleasanter to go on just in the old way. We would not wish to take anything upon ourselves because Providence has been so good to us."

"My sister means we would not wish to seem different to our neighbours—to be ostentatious."

"That you could never be," said the solicitor, looking with a kindly smile at the gentle-mannered women; "but I understand; you want to do good by stealth, and remain the unknown benefactors."

The two simple, honest faces were covered with blushes. The London man had read their hearts. He pitied their confusion, and returning to a business manner said:

"I believe everything is settled but the bank into which I am to pay the dividends?"

"The Bank of England?" said Miss Letitia, looking at her sister interrogatively.

"We cannot do better, I think," Miss Swindon replied.

"Hardly," said the solicitor. "And now I must say good-morning."

"Not stay for dinner!" said both sisters in surprise.

"I am very sorry I cannot do justice to your hospitality," he said heartily, noticing the vexation in their faces, "but I am not going straight back to London, and if I miss my train at the junction, I shall be delayed a day, so I am sure you will excuse me."

"Yes, to be sure;" and their faces cleared at once, and they were eager that he should be gone.

They stood at the window and saw him get into the fly that had brought him from the railway-station.

"I trust he will be in time," said Miss Swindon.

"I trust so," echoed Miss Letitia, and the sisters sat down, each in her own particular chair, on either side of the window. Each put her hands in her lap, and sat looking at them and nothing else.

The sisters greatly resembled each other, and the likeness was intensified by the fact of their dress being identical in every particular, even to the little gold brooches that fastened the folds of the net kerchiefs they wore round their necks. Their gowns were of serviceable brown stuff, their aprons of black silk, and they wore mittens of the same pattern. Their faces were round, and of fair complexion, with a healthy ruddiness in the cheeks. Their eyes were grey, and the slightly arched eyebrows and hair were of a soft brown, scarcely touched with silver. It was by the appearance of the chin and the little hollow at the temples only that the observer could tell that they were getting old; yet they were past sixty. Their features were homely, and they would have been decidedly plain but for their sweet expression of kindness and simplicity. They were of middle height, and of a comely stoutness for elderly women.

"I feel dazed," said Miss Letitia, after some minutes' silence; "it seems strange to have so very much money."

"So do I," replied her sister, "yet we have known of it for some time, but I feel sure I never realised it until to-day. It is actually mine, now I have this voucher to show that I have all this in the Three per Cents., and I can understand it."

"That is exactly how I feel," said Miss Letitia with a little sigh.

"It is a great trust," continued Miss Swindon, "and I feel almost borne down with the weight of it. How shall we put it to the best use? It clearly is given to us to put to use for others' benefit, because we had enough without it."

"I feel with you, sister, oppressed. I wish we were as before; we could manage the small charities that we understood."

"Yes," said Miss Swindon, with a little sigh for the past that was so irrevocably gone. "We understood our life then; but courage, Letitia, we must do our best. Large means have been given to us. I think the knowledge how to use them will be vouchsafed also. I will hope for the good teaching."

"It will come," answered Miss Letitia confidently. "Every impulse I feel to give, I shall look upon as an instruction—a command."

"Even so we may err by giving foolishly," replied her sister sadly, "but we must keep our eyes open and be keen to note trouble and suffering, and prompt to relieve them. And we will be our old humble selves as long as we can."

She put her hand across the table; the younger woman took it and pressed it warmly, saying solemnly:

"We will."

Hannah, the old servant, who had been with them for more than thirty years, came in to lay the table for dinner. She noticed the despondent looks and expressed a hope that they had not heard bad news.

"No; the gentleman had only come on a matter of business," Miss Swindon answered.

And Hannah felt herself injured, because, as she told herself, her long services entitled her to know everything that happened to the ladies, and they were actually keeping secret from her what the strange man had come about.

So the coming into a fortune made three women sad.

After an unusually silent meal the sisters sat down in their accustomed seats by the window. On the table that stood between them were Miss Swindon's rug-work and Miss Letitia's knitting, but neither of them resumed her ordinary occupation. And Miss Swindon, happening to glance at the pins and the wool, said:

"Dear me, I thought it was Sunday, and that we had forgotten to put away our work last night."

"No wonder," assented her sister, "it is such a strange day."

The two sat silent looking out of the window, over the shrubs that were always kept small that their view of the road might be unimpeded, yet seeing nothing, and full of a vague sense of uncertainty and strangeness. Yesterday they were only moderately well-off, now they were rich.

There was great similarity of thought between them. Living so many years together, and each having a sweet kindness of disposition that led her to give pleasure to the other in all things, they had grown to have the same tastes, the same feelings, and the same view on all matters. And now they were both contemplating the change in their lives in the same manner. They thought of themselves almost as if they were two stranger women, and they saw them living for years in happiness and comfort upon an annuity left them by their father; dwelling always in the same little house of red brick, behind the green railings with the low privet hedge inside, and the small bushes of evergreens; and sitting by the window and looking out upon the few passers-by, knowing many of them, and taking warm interest in everything that concerned them; feeling great respect for some, admiration for others, and compassion for all in trouble, and giving help where need was greatest, and kindness everywhere. Two simple, homely, worthy women, neither learned nor wise. Their wealth came to them and they were puffed up with pride and conceit, they began to think themselves great people, to stand aloof from their friends of the town, to claim friendship with the county families; then they got into stately society, and became shy and awkward, and all their kindness turned to envy and bitterness. And this might be their miserable fate.

In her uneasiness at this mental picture Miss Letitia rose and walked up and down the room; then her sister looked up, and at her mild glance, she resealed herself and her thoughts went back to her parents, and she wondered if they were pleased at the good fortune that had come to them, or whether they knew that it was trouble in disguise, and sorrowed for their children.

"Letitia," said Miss Swindon, coming out of her reverie, and causing her sister to rouse from hers with a start, so deep and long had been the silence between them, "I feel as if everything were unreal to-day, as if I were somebody else almost. Let us go out and look about us. The sight of the old streets and familiar faces will set us to rights."

Letitia rose with a look of bewilderment on her simple face.

"Yes," she replied, "the fresh air will clear our heads. Mine is puzzled with thinking and the great news;" and she gave a little sigh as if the great news were an affliction.

"We are too old for much thinking," answered Miss Swindon resignedly; "we must just go about our usual business, it is all we are fit for, and to make a beginning we will go and buy something—"

"And give it away?"

"Yes," replied her sister with a bright smile; "I am going to buy a dress for Hannah—and you?"

"I don't know—a shawl?"

"The very thing. She has been with us thirty-three years, and should have our first gifts."

When the sisters made their purchases, they found it a delightful novelty not to be limited in price, and a sense of their larger means came to them with pleasant significance. They were tempted to buy many things for many persons, but were restrained by their earnest desire to avoid launching out into any expense, and to be sober-minded and temperate even in their generosity.

"Your mother is better, Miss Temple, I hope," said Miss Swindon to a young girl who stopped to greet her in the High Street.

"A little, thank you," she answered, "but she is very weak and depressed. I hope you will call to see her when you are our way."

"We will come over very soon."

"Keep up your heart, Miss Ellen," put in Miss Letitia; "the fall of the leaf is always a bad time for invalids. Your mother will be better when the trees are bare."

"It will be too cold then," said the girl, with a sad little smile, as she left them.

"The weather is never right for her, she is so ailing. And her income dies with her. And then what shall be done with Ellen?"

Miss Swindon spoke as questioning her sister for her special opinion on the subject.

"Then she will be our charge," said Miss Letitia quietly, as if there could be no doubt on the matter.

"I knew you would say so," replied Miss Swindon with a little exultation in her voice; "I always know your mind."

"I should hope so," replied her sister. "I hope it is always the same as yours."

"Look, Letitia, at that handsome young man with Ellen Temple. Do you know him?"

"No," she answered, looking at the blonde face that bent over Ellen's brown one, "but he seems to think much of her."

"Very much," said Miss Swindon dryly; "perhaps he will take her out of our hands and provide for her future himself."

"We must do something," said her sister; "we can make a great wedding-present at any rate."

And the two women continued talking sociably. They were quite themselves again, now that they were discussing some projected benevolence.

When the dress and shawl were given to Hannah, she was greatly pleased and was reconciled to the old ladies at once, and was quite sure that the business the strange gentleman had come upon had not been mentioned to her, because it was so unimportant as to be beneath her notice.

And so the night closed in upon a happy household.

Autumn had passed and winter was come, and, to all appearance, the sisters were just the same as ever. They had not made the slightest change in their mode of life, but had continued to live comfortably as hitherto, but with due regard to economy. The weather was cold and wet and utterly cheerless, and Hannah suffered from rheumatism, so a girl was hired to assist her, and thus the first change in the little household was made. Neighbours and friends said it was a great undertaking to have an additional servant, with provisions so dear, but there was no sign of care on the faces of the sisters, so the matter was allowed to drop and be forgotten.

When the curate called for their subscription to the coal and blanket fund, he pleaded for a little more than usual because the winter promised to be exceptionally dreary and trying, and Miss Swindon, looking at her sister, said:

"I think we can spare ten pounds."

"Yes," assented Miss Letitia, and on the reverend gentleman looking at them with surprise, the old ladies blushed.

"We have something put by," said Miss Swindon, in deprecation of the charge of extravagance to which she feared she was laying herself open, "and the object of the fund is so good."

"I am thankful you are so generous. I wish there were more like you," he replied, and there was nothing but hearty approval in his voice and manner.

That Christmas Day was a happy one in Bamford, for there were joints of meat and a pudding in many a house that had not known such luxuries for years, and there was warm flannel for the aged, and all the little permitted comforts for the poor in the workhouse.

The old ladies wished everyone to find his lot a little brighter for the Christmastide, and they went about seeking out those in want, and making their little gifts to them with the utmost possible secrecy.

It was again autumn, the sisters had been rich for a year. There was no change in them except in their apparel. The feminine love of soft raiment had instinctively led them, now that price need not be considered, to replace each discarded article of dress with one of finer texture, so now their gowns were of cashmere, and their caps of real lace, and they were contemplating replacing their old furs with muffs and tippets of sable.

"Spending comes so easy," said Miss Letitia.

"Yes," replied her sister with a broad smile, "and I do like to see you look so nice."

Though their garments were of richer material they were still of the same modest style and sober hues, and no Quakeresses could have been more quietly dressed than the two old sisters.

During the past year they had had many disappointments, they had found people covetous and ungrateful, they had been deceived and imposed upon, but they forgot these things quickly, and but one thought and one desire remained with them always—the thought of the suffering of the poor, and the desire to do the utmost good with the wealth that had been confided to them, in trust, as they reverently believed, for the benefit of those in distress.

Just at this time the rector came in one day and told them a doleful story of a coachman who had been out of work for months, since the death of a master he had served for twenty years.

"He is an old man now," he said, "and would like to stay in his native place. I wish I could hear of something for him."

"Could we do with a coachman, sister?" asked Miss Letitia, full of anxiety to provide for the man.

"We have no stables," replied her sister.

"Oh, if that is the only hindrance," said the rector, "I have stables and coach-house quite at your service. I shall never be able to afford anything."

The last few words were said with just a twinge of regret.

This involuntary expression on the part of the rector decided the sisters. They noted the white hair, the kind face, and the feeble form of the minister who had devoted all his strength to his flock, and they recognised that the use of a carriage would greatly lessen the fatigue of his arduous duties among his parishioners, and perhaps prolong his valuable life, as well as provide for the unfortunate coachman, so they gave each other the look of accord that both so well understood, and Miss Swindon said, in her usual quiet voice:

"We will gladly accept your offer, Mr. Holroyd. My sister and myself are getting quite old women, and shall be glad of a drive now and then."

"I was very tired last time we went to Mrs. Temple's," said Miss Letitia; "it will be very pleasant not to be obliged to walk so far."

"A little whitewash will soon put stable and coach-house to rights," said the rector pleasantly, "and Saunders will be delighted to hear of employment."

He was a little surprised, but the sisters took setting up a carriage so very quietly that he felt he had no right to be.

Within a fortnight the neatest of little broughams was in the rector's coach-house, the quietest of horses in his stable, and the steadiest of coachmen living in the rooms over them. And the rector was made to understand, with the sweet tact born of respectful sympathy, that, if he did not make use of them as often as he could, the sisters would be greatly grieved.

The first time the sisters used their carriage they drove over to see Mrs. Temple. It was the second week in September, but the air was still as full of sunshine and heat as in brilliant summer weather. Mrs. Temple lay upon a couch near an open window giving upon a garden, gay with flowers, and closed in by great masses of trees whose foliage was gorgeous with brown and gold and crimson; overhead was a dome of clear bright blue. The invalid was gazing with pleasure at the exquisite scene; she had been educated in the love of the beautiful.

She was a tall, slight woman, with lustrous eyes and lovely complexion, with an innate elegance that nothing could obscure. She impressed her surroundings with something of her own character, and the sisters never failed to feel surprise at the airiness and pretty refinement of her apartment.

"Do not move," said Miss Swindon as she entered, followed closely by her sister; "we would not for worlds disturb you; we only called to see if you were a little better."

The lifted head sank back upon the pillows again, and a delicate hand was given to each in turn as she said, "I am not better," with a little scornful smile that seemed to say it were utter foolishness to expect such a thing.

"The weather is so mild," said Miss Letitia, in excuse of their hope.

"That is indeed a comfort to me. I can have my windows open, and feel the fresh air upon my face, and look at the trees, and the flowers, and the sky. I should like to die just as I am, looking at them all."

"You must hope to get better," said Miss Swindon.

"Where is Ellen?" asked her sister, by way of diverting the sick woman's thoughts.

"My daughter is taking a little walk with a friend." Then, turning to Miss Swindon, she said calmly: "I know my fate. Recovery is hopeless. I am almost dead, but I cannot even die. I am held back by anxiety for my child."

"My dear friend," said Miss Swindon in low, eager voice, "do let me assure you of my care for dear Ellen."

"The man who loves her should take her to himself," she said proudly. "I thank you, but the right is his, and I am held here waiting on the brink of the grave until he does his duty. Was ever woman so cruelly treated?"

She had raised herself from her pillows, and was sitting upright, looking at them with eyes that seemed to burn with indignation. Her haggard face was flushed. A cough came on and shook her attenuated frame, but it did not change the current of her thoughts, and as soon as she could speak she said:

"I am most unfortunate; fate never ceases to buffet me. When what I wish is almost mine, it keeps aloof from me. It is mine, yet not quite mine, and the anguish of this almost possession is intolerable to me."

"Hush!" said Miss Swindon, gently touching her, for the vehemence in her low voice was intense; but she did not heed her.

"This Frank Thornhill is all that I could wish for my daughter's husband, but he does not marry her. He loves her, she loves him, yet he stands aloof. I am almost mad with weariness of waiting for this marriage—this good thing that seems so near me, and yet is so far off. I cannot live, I cannot die; still he is blind to my misery."

"He should marry her," said Miss Letitia decidedly.

A gleam of satisfaction passed over the invalid's face.

"I am glad you think so. He should marry her, but he has promised to wait for his father's consent, and when I speak to Ellen she says she cannot leave me. She need not leave me, but if she were wedded wife I could leave her, and get rest and peace."

Miss Swindon felt a little in awe of the fragile woman who appeared to be kept in this world only by her passionate love for her daughter, so manifest was it that she was ill unto death, but her heart was full of compassion, and she said gently:

"Do you know why his father refuses his consent?"

"Frank evades the question, but I believe it is because Ellen has no fortune. Her beauty and her goodness should be dower enough for any man. I think I will say to him: 'You must marry her or set her free.' Then I should know what to do. I would have said it before but that she loves him."

"Yes, Ellen loves him," said Miss Letitia. "Oh, do let us——"

"I will not," interrupted Mrs. Temple, and she looked at them with proud defiance.

The coughing came on, and when it ceased she lay back on her pillows, looking as if she were already dead. When she revived a little she said gently:

"If we do not meet again, accept my thanks for your kind thoughts of Ellen."

"We shall never cease to love her," said both sisters. They shook hands with the poor invalid, and with eyes full of tears softly left the room, and bidding the maid go in and stay with her mistress until Miss Ellen returned, entered the brougham, and drove nearly home in mournful silence. Then Miss Letitia said:

"They ought to be married."

"Yes," replied her sister; "it must be managed."

After about a quarter of an hour's reverie, Miss Letitia said:

"I will give half."

"Of course," replied Miss Swindon, readily understanding the enigmatical words. "I meant that. We will work together always."

"I knew you would think so," said her sister cheerfully.

"It will require much thought, much calculation," said Miss Swindon. "I do not see my way at all at present."

"Thinking tries my head," said the younger sister. "Much of it confuses me. I like to jump to conclusions, and keep to them."

"I will think for you," said her sister; "only if any thoughts on the subject come into your head tell me of them. They might be useful. I am all in the dark at present."

"And I seem to see it done, finished, now you have taken it in hand, Priscilla," said Miss Letitia with enthusiasm, as she gazed at her sister with eyes full of loving admiration.

"Sanguine girl!" said Miss Swindon, with a little reproving tap on her sister's arm, going back in spirit and manner to nearly forty years ago when her sister had been an impulsive young thing, and she her grave mentor.

"Cilla," cried Miss Letitia, using a pet name that had passed almost out of their memory, "you make me feel quite young again, and bring to my mind the old days, and the old garden, and all the old long ago."

"And Ned," added Miss Swindon. "I wonder if you would have married him if he had not died?"

"We shall never know now," replied Letitia a little sadly. And the two old ladies sat thinking of their young days so long past, yet, curiously enough, seeming to grow nearer every year, until at last the circle of their lives would be complete, and old age and childhood meet.

CHAPTER II.

NEXT day the sisters called on the rector to get some information about Mr. Thornhill. He said he was not personally acquainted with the gentleman, but believed him to be a very worthy man. He thought he was not rich, and remembered having heard that at the time of his wife's death some years ago he had put down his carriage and retrenched in every possible way.

The minister was the servant of the sick and the sorrowful, so as the hour for visiting a dying woman approached, he left them, bidding them make themselves at home as long as they liked to stay. Then the sisters had a little whispered conference, and Miss Swindon, seating herself in the rector's chair before his writing-table, took a cheque out of her pocket-book and carefully wrote in five figures, her sister watching her all the time, then both silently watched the figures get quite dry.

Miss Swindon put on her left-hand glove, pushed the paper in her palm, and carefully buttoned her glove over it. Ever since the sisters had been left alone together, there had been a secrecy and air of mystery about them, and when they heard the carriage at the gate, they went out of the house and along the sunlit garden-path with eyes downcast, and faces heavy and anxious, as if they were conspirators overwhelmed by the burden of their plot.

Even the stolid coachman noticed their strange appearance, and felt bewildered. Miss Swindon entered the brougham—Miss Letitia did not follow, but stood at the door, and said, "God bless you," in a strange subdued manner, then bade Simmons drive right through the town, and walked slowly and sadly away.

Miss Swindon sat wishing it was possible that her errand could be done in such absolute secrecy that no one should know that it was done, wishing that wealth could take to itself wings and fly to the spot she would indicate, and then make itself accepted; wishing that leaves would turn to gold, and not go back to leaves when a new day dawned; wishing that a great chest of guineas could be buried and instantly discovered by a certain person—she never doubted that they would be the property of the finder—wishing all kinds of foolish and impossible things, so that the desire of her heart might be fulfilled, and she herself be saved from giving offence, and from possible failure.

She was ashamed that she herself should ascribe so high a power to gold, that in this, the only serious enterprise of her life, she should be relying upon it as a potency that could scarcely fail her. She feared that she had a low estimate of human nature, as she was looking on money as the lever by which she should succeed in moving a man's determination. Yet it was her sole resource, and she must use it with courage.

Thinking was a slow process with her, and a difficult one, but she was a brave-hearted old lady, and never gave up a thing because it was hard to do. So she thought out the problem that was perplexing her to the end, and decided thoroughly what she would say, but was obliged to leave how she should say it to the chance influences of the moment.

When she passed through the lodge-gates of Thornhill Park, and could see nothing on either side of her but far-stretching sward and trees of many forms and gorgeous colouring, she felt the full beauty of the scene, and realised how tenaciously a man would cling to so fair an ancestral domain, for she had all an Englishman's reverence for land. And it seemed to her that a very good sum in the Three per Cents. was as nothing compared with this undulating grass-covered earth dotted with ancient oak and elm trees.

Mr. Thornhill was at home. As she crossed the hall to the library its size and sombreness oppressed her. She felt as if she had strayed from well-known paths into strange regions, and had lost her bearings; but she roused herself to think only of the end in view, and to recall the means she had planned for its attainment.

She had been announced to Mr. Thornhill as a lady who wished to see him, so he expected some farmer's wife or daughter to plead for further time for the payment of rent already long delayed. He was angered at this surmise, for his need for money was growing desperate.

He glanced impatiently at Miss Swindon as she entered, and disconcerted her a little; but he had a good memory for faces, and felt sure he had not seen hers before, so, with a smile of relief, he rose and courteously begged her to be seated.

She sat down. Her face was pale, and there was a frightened look in her gentle eyes as she gazed steadily at him and said, in a voice low and quavering at first, but gaining strength and steadiness as she proceeded:

"I am quite a stranger to you, and I beg you to excuse my troubling you, but there was nothing that I could do but speak to yourself, seeing what object I have in view. And will you promise that what passes between us shall be strictly private—secret?"

"Certainly," he replied blandly, thinking that nothing of serious importance could pass between himself and the curious old person who looked at him with so much entreaty in her homely face.

"I am obliged to you," she said with quiet dignity. And then her nervousness came over her again as she continued: "I love Ellen Temple very much. She is a very sweet girl. My sister and myself think very much of her."

Miss Swindon saw the lowering expression that came over his face at the girl's name. Her heart sank. But she was not to be turned from a course she had resolved upon by any man's looks. Indeed, this silent opposition rather urged her on, and she said with almost undue emphasis:

"We think her a most estimable young lady, and fit to grace any station."

"I do not dispute it; but permit me to remark that the smallest thing wears a different aspect when viewed from a different standpoint."

"Which means that we look at Ellen from a different level," she said softly. "I did hope that we might have started with a mutual agreement as to Ellen's merits."

"I will concede that Miss Temple is the most perfect of woman-kind, if that will help on our interview."

"I want you to feel it," she replied.

"Feelings do not come at command. My time is occupied. I shall be glad to know what has caused me the honour of your visit," he said, with a courtly haughtiness that she admired, although it greatly flurried her. And when she looked at his severe face, deeply lined with thought and anxiety, she feared that he was a stern, impracticable father, whom no arguments could bring to reason.

"I am come," she said simply, "to try to persuade you to consent to your son's marriage with Miss Temple—her mother is dying, I fear, and she cannot be happy without seeing her daughter united to your son."

She noticed a scornful curl of his lips and a brightening of his eyes, as if he were loftily amused at her daring to speak of his family affairs, and she added, with unconscious wisdom:

"My sister and myself are old friends of the widow and her child, and we thought that perhaps we might have it in our power to make some arrangement that would make the alliance more suitable. We are rich, and it would give us great pleasure to give the dear girl a marriage portion."

For an instant a hope flashed up within him, but died at once. These good women would think much of a few hundreds, he reflected, and they would be of no use to him or Frank.

"You are very good," he replied gently, "and I hope that Mrs. Temple and her daughter know what very kind friends they have, and appreciate them accordingly; but I am afraid the young lady could not make the marriage you contemplate, unless she had considerable fortune. We are old people, madam, and have learned to understand that even the fondest couple must have more substantial diet than love and air, and that the cottage of the proverb is a residence of which they would soon grow weary."

"Yes," she answered, "but—" and she was evidently very nervous, as she fidgeted with the button of her glove.

"There are other reasons also into which we need not enter."

"Would this help matters?" she cried, holding the cheque before him. He gazed at it in astonishment; such a sum on one slip of paper he had not seen for many, many years. "Would this do for the portion of a girl your son could marry? or more, even twice as much we would give that the dying woman might have her heart's desire. We would not palter for a little gold when a soul's happiness is at stake." And Miss Swindon's face glowed with kindly generosity.

She had placed the cheque in his hands, he gazed at it in a stupor of abstraction. What great things it would do! With that to the good, there would be little difficulty in raising sufficient to ward off the threatened foreclosure. He felt as if he were in a dream, waiting to see what would happen next. A sigh attracted his attention. He looked from the paper to the old lady's beaming face.

"You look joyful," he said, and it seemed to him that he was speaking incoherently as in a dream.

"I am," she replied; "for I think you will consent."

He rose, walked to the window, and came back and sat down, quite himself again, except that there was a flush in his face, and he looked a younger and kinder man.

Miss Swindon smiled upon him; she was beginning quite to like him; it came natural to her to like those she benefited, and she recognised that she would be doing good to him, as well as to his son, by her gift to Ellen.

"Do you quite understand what you are doing to part with this?" he said, touching the cheque. "It is a large sum to give in your lifetime."

He spoke earnestly and kindly.

"I well understand it," she said quietly. "My sister and myself are both maiden ladies, we have no kindred, and we live simply. So we can indulge our fancies, and can well afford, each of us, to give Ellen Temple that sum, if it will ensure her speedy marriage to your son. Our only desire is to see happiness in our dying friend's face, and know that she is at peace about her daughter."

"With such a friend as yourself she need have had no fear," he said.

"That is true," she answered; "we promised to take entire charge of Ellen, but she would not hear of it. She was too proud. She said no one should take care of her but her husband. You will let them be married soon?"

"Assuredly, I will not object; but there must be marriage-settlements."

"Do hurry the lawyers; her days are dwindling fast," she said eagerly.

"Have you no man of business? If you have, employ him at once for Miss Temple."

"To be sure. I will write to him to-night."

"I hope he will not persuade you to change your mind."

"He could not do that; besides, he knows that there is enough and to spare."

"Fortunate woman!"

"Yes," she replied gravely, "I am fortunate, most fortunate now that you have agreed to my wishes. I am deeply obliged to you, Mr. Thornhill." Her voice was full of gratitude, and her face of earnest joy, as she put out her hand to him.

He grasped it heartily.

"Your presence has been a blessing to me," he said in solemn tones. "You have saved me and mine from ruin;" and stooping slightly he raised the old hand and kissed it as reverently as if he had been offering homage to his sovereign.

Then he folded up the cheque, and watched her replace it carefully in her glove, saying that it was too valuable to lose. Then he asked the name of his best friend, as he called her, and receiving her card, led her to her carriage, and parted from her with a grateful smile. He went back to his room a changed man.

"Truly," he thought, "that old lady's money will do great good."

Miss Swindon had so many things to think of, that the time passed very swiftly, and she was greatly surprised when the brougham stopped, and she found herself opposite her own garden-gate.

Miss Letitia opened the house-door. A glance at her sister, as she was coming up the garden-path, told her that all was as she wished, and that her sister had been quite successful. She ran down to meet her, the two old faces were full of the most rapturous delight.

"It is all settled just as you said, Letitia. I am to give ten thousand and you ten thousand."

And then she stopped, looking guilty; in her heedless haste to tell her sister the happy news, she had given to the winds her precious secret. She looked down vexed and ashamed of her impetuosity. Miss Letitia looked carefully up and down the road, and all around, then said consolingly:

"I don't believe there is a living creature within sight except Simmons, and he is stone deaf, so it cannot matter."

The two old ladies spent the rest of the day in most interesting conversation, but the letter to the solicitor was not forgotten, and the now useless cheque was burnt. They had still one trouble—would Mrs. Temple hear of their interference in her concerns, and take it in ill part, perhaps go the length of repudiating their friendship altogether?

The second day Frank Thornhill came to thank them, and he brought the information that Mrs. Temple had consented to let Ellen be married in a fortnight.

That evening a note came from that lady, saying that their magnificent generosity overpowered all her scruples, and that she thanked them from her heart, and the old sisters wept with delight at the success of their plans.

Soft and low came the sound of bells to the listening ears of Mrs. Temple. It grew in volume, it rolled and it swelled until the whole world seemed full of the jubilant music.

The ringers pulled with a will, for they knew of the distant listener, and people far away heard the glad melody, and said the bells had never rung so merrily before. Mrs. Temple listened with head lifted from her pillows, and the deep joy in her heart shining in her face.

While the bells were still ringing, the door of her chamber was opened, and bride and bridegroom stood before her couch. She kissed and blessed them. Then she put out her hands towards the sisters, who stood near. She kissed them also, and said that the blessing of the Father of the widow and orphan would abide with them for ever.

Mrs. Temple passed away peacefully a week after her daughter's marriage.

The old sisters live on very happily. They have learned to look upon Frank and Ellen as their own kindred, and their children call them Aunt Swindon and Aunt Letitia.

They are as kindly and as simple as ever, and still do their best to keep secret their generous beneficence.

The Walk.

OVER the old grey arches,
Where the rushing river rolled,
And the willows that sprung where the woodbine clung,
Flashed back the sunset's gold;
Up the hill where the tall green ashes
Stood in majestic rows,
Up the narrow path that ran beneath,
We walked to the old red house.

The laugh and the jest rang round us,
Fast flowed the careless talk;
The question light, and the answer slight,
The mirth of the evening walk;
My hand on your arm lay quietly,
And never a word we said;
Dear, do you forget? I remember yet,
How fast that hushed hour sped.

There was but a glance flashed each from each
As we paused where the violets grew,
Half up the hill—I have mine still,
Though time has dimmed its blue;
There was but a smile—one sweet swift smile—
As we parted at the door,
One long hand-clasp, ah, that strong true grasp,
Shall I meet it never more?

So far apart our pathways,
Since that summer eve have been;
Such joys have been lost, such sweet dreams crossed,
So much we have done and seen!
Perhaps we two shall never walk
Through a sunset hour again;
But I can recall each step of it all,
Is the memory joy or pain?

Book III.

CHAPTER I. BEYOND THE GOLDEN MEADOWS.

THE loveliness of a spring morning is lending light and colour to the earth—such light, such colour, as only comes in the day's early hours, when Nature trembles into waking, fresh and fair with dewfall and sunlight after the long hushed darkness of the night.

The heavens are of hyacinth and gold, save here and there where pearly clouds fold their white wings like sails slowly furled by invisible hands. The sound of a skylark's song is losing itself in a flood of rapture, rising higher, higher, towards that cold pure splendour to which men's souls look up in their prayers—higher and higher, as though the eager wings were racing the eager voice, and both could never tire of the song and the flight.

A man walking slowly through the green lanes paused in the flood of sunlight, and his eyes followed that far-off speck that seemed making straight for heaven's gates, with its own pean of praise as mandate of admission.

He listened as, in some rare moment of life's hurried, frenzied march, men do listen to a sound, a word, a voice from Nature's heart. As he listened, something of sorrow, regret, unrest, touched those mysterious inner chords of the spirit which had begun to vibrate to the subtle sounds and scents surrounding him. He sighed. At the same moment the sigh was echoed by a peal of silvery childish laughter, and starting involuntarily, he looked over the low hedge, and saw in the shining dewy field beyond, as fair a sight as eyes of man had ever beheld.

The field was starred with a thousand golden bells, and the flood of sunlight poured itself in loving intensity on a slight, almost girlish form standing midway between the glittering light and the glittering carpet. On one shoulder perched a child; another clung to her hand, and lifted a laughing face to follow the direction of the other hand, uplifted to the cloudless vault above, from whence the tiny speck that had uttered the day's first greeting was fluttering earthwards once again.

The watching eyes gazed first curiously, then eagerly, then with a flash of recognition that lit up the whole face.

"Is it possible?" he said below his breath, and something within him leaped like a giant force over a space of intervening years, and urged him to pursue it; and, so guided and so borne along, he sprang over the low hedge and stood face to face with a vision that had haunted him more persistently than he had ever known till now.

Midway in the cowslip meadow they met.

A strange meeting for two people who had last spoken to each other in a London drawing-room—last seen each other—Well, the strange cold pang in the man's breast brought back that scene distinctly enough, chilling in some degree the rapture that had been all the first sight of the remembered face had brought.

"How could you recollect me?" she said, her face flushed like a June rose, her eyes—those sweet remembered eyes—bright as stars, only solemn and dark, as surely no stars ever were. "Five years ago. Why, it is an age! Even Madge hardly remembered me. Mrs. Dunbar, you know. Have you seen her lately? How is it you are here?"

"What a string of questions! Am I to answer them all? To begin with, I recollected you at once. I—I—well, I have a good memory for faces. As for Mrs. Dunbar, I have not seen her for two years. I resigned, you know, and have been living here with my mother. She is a great invalid, and—"

Then his voice suddenly broke. Meeting those glorious eyes once more his heart throbbed so strangely and wildly that he grew confused, and forgot even of what he was speaking.

"Are those your children?" he asked abruptly.

"Yes," she said, and looked down with all a mother's adoring pride at the ruffled curls and shy face hiding in the folds of her gown.

But Ivor Grant's eyes had gone to the child perched on her shoulder. Such a beautiful solemn little face, with eyes dark and mysterious-looking as her own. Eyes that sent a strange thrill through the man's heart, as they gave back gaze for gaze in that calm wonder of a child's aroused curiosity, that is so bewildering to grown men.

"What a lovely little fellow," he muttered involuntarily. "He is very like you."

She blushed faintly.

"Is that intended for a compliment? I suppose he is like me, for I am tired of hearing the remark. He is my youngest—just three years old to-day. It is in honour of his birthday that I have brought them out to make cowslip-balls. English country-life is so strange to them. Children in India, you know, have a very dreary existence. I made a point of taking them to the hills every season, or they would never have been as robust as they are now."

She talked hurriedly, with a soft embarrassment of manner that spoke of other feelings behind the surprise of this chance meeting.

Ivor noticed that she had never once mentioned her husband.

"Have you been here long?" he asked in that hurried pause.

"Just a month. My father is your rector now. He came here about four years ago, and when my health gave way in India, and I had to come home, I naturally came here. My husband remained behind. He likes the country."

"And you?"

"Detest it!" Then she laughed. "I am afraid I said that vindictively, but it is really true. The life is idle, useless, enervating. The women are spoilt, the men are, as a rule, too careless and self-satisfied. There is nothing wholesome, genial, inspiring about them, and the climate is odious. Oh, if you only knew the delicious feeling of drinking in air like this after the enervating, stifling months I have endured, shut up in bungalows, treating the sun as a deadly enemy instead of what he is here!"

She drew a long breath; she raised her head, with its dusky, wind-stirred curls, to the glistening sky, and looked up at it with eloquent eyes. Ivor Grant watched her. His ears had been drinking her voice, catching more of its music than its sense, perhaps; but always, like some strange vision dawning and floating before him, he saw the lights and shadows of Madge Dunbar's pretty room, and the queenly, graceful figure leaning against that marble pedestal, and watching him with deep soft eyes.

She was not changed, he told himself. Not changed save that her beauty was of more thoughtful and grave a character, and on her face that tender glow of deeper feeling which comes to a woman's face with the dignity and wonder of motherhood.

The silence brought her back to herself. She lifted the child from her shoulder, and set him down by his brother's side. They made such a pretty pair—the dark head and the gold, the bright face and the solemn—that Ivor's eyes rested with renewed admiration upon them.

"You are going to gather cowslips; may I help you?" he said at last.

She laughed a little.

"What an occupation for a gallant guardsman, and the idol of a world of fashion! Suppose any of your London friends heard you?"

"They would think I was very much to be envied," he said, hiding a deeper earnestness under his light words than ever she dreamt of. "Besides, I am no longer a guardsman. I have exchanged town life for country, and infinitely prefer it."

"Is it possible?" she said, and looked at him wonderingly.

In his face she read great changes. It was handsome as ever, more attractive even than she had thought it the night she gave him that sobriquet of "My Lord Conceit." There was less indolence and languor in its expression, but that sadness, which had puzzled many an observer, had developed itself more strikingly. He looked a man in his prime, but a man who had drunk life's cup to satiety, and wearied of its empty hours long ere such weariness should have touched his years. She felt a sort of wonder, and a faint pity for him stirring her heart as she gazed. Her own youth and its memories seemed a far-back dream; that first meeting with him had been only one episode in her past, and five years had swept it far away into those inner chambers of memory, whence issue ghosts that sometimes gladden and sometimes affright us.

But she was young enough still to enjoy life as it was, young enough to be glad at the scents and sounds of spring, young enough to feel the blood flowing gaily through her veins as she trod the golden meadows, young enough to smile at the grave and watchful face above her with

The untired smile of youth, and bid him come and welcome, if he chose, as she set the baby hands to their fragrant task.

His hands and hers assisted. The little voices grew eloquent, the tireless feet were a joy to watch. Ivor Grant paused a moment in which to wonder how it was that he had lived so many years, yet never found children delightful, or life sweet. Looking at the eager faces, listening to the prattling tongues, seeing all the world in one golden glory of earth and sky, drinking in pure fragrant air, steeping himself to the lips in a new and sweet content, so he passed those brief, bright, morning hours, unasking, unquestioning whence came their brightness and delight.

"Oo is very dood," said the solemn-eyed little Jack to him, as the last blossom had been added, and the great velvety mass was pronounced complete. "Has 'oo little boys at home?"

Ivor laughed a trifle unsteadily, catching Beryl's sunny glance.

"No, my dear, I have no little boys."

"And does 'oo gather cowslips for 'ooself?"

Ivor looked puzzled. Beryl hastened to explain.

"Jack thinks you came out to gather cowslips this morning. Are you usually such an early riser?"

"Me dets up veverry morning with mummy," pursued the little fellow, desirous of giving out his limited stock of information, now that he had made friends with the tall stranger.

"He can't dress himself," said Cyril, the eldest of the little lads. "Mother has to dress him. He didn't like the ayah, and we sent her back."

"Come!" cried their mother, swinging the great fragrant ball to and fro, and cutting short their confidences. "Who can catch? 'Tisty, tosty, fair and forty; one, two——' Ah, Cyril has it."

A shout of triumph, as the boy ran off with his treasure, pursued by the toddling feet of Baby Jack, rang over the meadow.

She turned to Ivor, laughing still.

"How children renew one's youth! It does not seem so very long ago that I too was running wild in just such meadows as these, as happy, as free——"

She paused abruptly. Her face grew crimson.

"I sometimes think," she went on hurriedly, "we don't make children's lives as happy as we might. They are so short, and they ought to be so fair—just like a dream of gladness to look back upon. The cares and worries come soon enough."

"You, at least, should have none," said Ivor impulsively.

Her eyes drooped. Over the beautiful face came a shadow, like a cloud on a summer sky.

"Is anyone exempt?" she said, with an effort at her former lightness. "Doesn't Longfellow say:

"Into each life some rain must fall?"

We may be happy if we only get showers from time to time, not one persistent deluge."

The children were far in advance. She began to move forward in order to rejoin them. He walked beside her, scarcely conscious that he was doing so.

"I—I hope that you will come to the Court and bring the little fellows," he said at last. "My mother is too great an invalid to go anywhere, but she will be delighted to see you, I am sure, and so will my uncle."

"You are very kind," she said with a faint hesitation. "Yes, I will come. I should like to see your mother."

"When will you come?" he persisted. "To-morrow?"

"I can hardly tell," she said with that soft, serious smile that at times touched her lips. "There is no immediate hurry, is there?"

"No, only—there is no reason why you should not come; and while the weather is so fine——"

She laughed outright.

"The weather has, of course, everything to do with it. Well, perhaps I will come to-morrow; and now, don't let me take you farther out of your way. It is a long distance back to the Court."

She stood still and gave him her hand as the little lads came dancing up.

He took it reluctantly enough, yet not daring to withstand her wishes.

But long after that graceful figure had passed from sight he stood leaning against the stile where she had bidden him farewell, lost in thought so deep that he forgot the very passage of time, groping his way along a path of possibilities into the maze of a new and startled future, yet never asking himself what had come into his life with so sudden and so sweet a joy, or what dangers and sorrows might lie beyond this range of golden meadows.

CHAPTER II. "I DO NOT LIKE 'GRASS WIDOWS.'"

THERE are moments when memory quickens life into a sweet and perfect joy, bringing out from the treasure-house of its past such rich and varied stores, that only to pause and think them over is delight enough.

Ivor Grant's heart exulted in such memories as he went homewards through that fair spring world. He knew nothing of the reason of such feelings. It is very seldom that we pause to investigate the why and wherefore of joy at its outset. Not until the feeling has long passed its borderland of content do we question its origin, and then it is often too late for reason to utter her warning voice against the sophistries of self-deception.

Ivor Grant, walking with the firm, free step of youth and strength, his head bared to the cool breeze, his eyes drinking in the beauties of Nature, marvelled that life hitherto had seemed so monotonous and wearisome a thing. It seemed joy enough now only to live on a day like this; to revel in golden sunshine—in the boundless wealth of health and freedom; to feel this sense of power and mastery swelling in his heart, to meet all sights and sounds with a dreamy pleasure of eye and ear.

He passed between the hedgerows, upon whose banks the foot of Spring had paused, leaving imprints delicate and fanciful as herself, and the tiny blossoms and the tender, pale young shoots had gained a beauty he had never noted before. He plucked some frail white violets, and half smiled as he placed them in his breast. So strange it seemed that he should note or care for the beauty of the timid, modest things. And yet to-day everything had beauty, everything had fragrance, and as he stood on a slight eminence and caught from there the accustomed sight of the Court's grey turrets and vast woods, he thought to himself the old place had never looked so fair.

It was long past the usual breakfast-hour when he reached it, so he took his meal in solitude ere going to pay his morning visit to his mother.

It was true what he had told Beryl Marsden. She was a great invalid and rarely left her own rooms. Yet it puzzled Ivor as it had puzzled her physicians what could be this mysterious complaint that was slowly sapping the springs of her life, leaving her day by day paler, frailer, more worn, yet wringing from her no complaint of pain or murmur of weariness; only she clung to her son, and looked for his presence with yet more passionate absorption than of yore; and he, noting this, yielded to her wistful if unspoken desire, and gave up London life and his profession, and had settled down at the Court.

He had been shocked at the change in her. Outwardly calm and self-reliant as ever, yet, to the keen eyes of love, a deep undercurrent of suffering was apparent. Suffering which denied itself outward expression, which sought no sympathy or alleviation, but all the same was there in its woe and in its mystery, to trouble and perplex him more and more as the months rolled slowly by.

As he entered her room this morning, something in his face—a new brightness, a light of hope, and youth, and joy, long strangers to its natural indolent quiet, struck her keen eyes. The very tone of his voice in greeting was in some way different—more tender, more gentle, yet with an undercurrent of absorption that told her in a moment something had happened.

Being a wise woman, she asked no questions, confident that if anything had to be told she would hear it, a better way of dealing with men—if women would only believe it—than any attempt to force confidence or obtrude curiosity.

And the news came very soon. He had taken the white violets from his coat, and was putting them in a little vase of water.

"There's a breath of spring for you!" he said joyously; "I wish you could go out and enjoy it for yourself. By-the-bye, I met an old friend of mine out this morning, and I've asked her to call on you. I knew her in London years ago, and she married and went out to India"—this spoken very hurriedly, like a lesson learnt by rote, of which he was eager to rid himself. "She's come home on sick leave, or something, with her children. Jolly little chaps! I've asked them all over here to-morrow."

Mrs. Grant raised her eyes in faint astonishment. Certainly nothing in this story to account for Ivor's unusual excitement ; a grass widow with a family of spoilt, pettish, sickly children, such as all Indian children were. The only strange thing was that Ivor should interest himself about them at all,

"I have no objection to their coming," she said languidly, "but you must do the entertaining, my dear. It is impossible for me to bear the noise of children in my weak state of health. As for the mother—well, women from India are so objectionable."

"She is not," said Ivor quickly. "I think you will like her."

Mrs. Grant made no answer. She was looking at his face, trying to read in it something deeper than his words.

"Is she young?" she asked carelessly.

A slight shade of astonishment crept over Ivor's face.

"Ye-es," he said hesitatingly, "I suppose so. Women's ages are always difficult to guess."

"And her husband is not with her?"

"No, thank goodness! I mean," he added, colouring furiously at the slip, "he prefers India to England—always did."

Mrs. Grant was silent, and silence sounding somewhat ominous to Ivor in his present state of feeling, he launched forth into further explanations, dwelling chiefly, however, on the children—a fact which rather surprised his mother, who, up to the present epoch of his existence, had never discovered that he possessed any particular liking for juvenile torments.

"I am afraid you will find them very troublesome," she said at last. "We have nothing here to amuse them."

"I don't think they want much amusement," said Ivor. "At least, the little chap doesn't. I never saw such a solemn little face in my life, and his eyes—they make one quite afraid; they are so big, and pure, and penetrating. I'll show them the picture-gallery, and there's the old nursery, you know, and cartloads of my broken toys treasured up in its cupboards, and then they can ride the pony. Oh, they'll enjoy themselves, never fear."

"I never saw you so much interested in children before," said his mother somewhat dryly. "These must be quite out of the common."

Ivor was standing by the window, looking out at the bright, sunny landscape. Between an opening in the trees he could catch a glimpse of a dark red-brick building, above which rose the slender spire of the old church. The red-brick building was the rectory. He was wondering how it was he had never noticed it so distinctly as now.

"I know, my dear boy," continued his mother somewhat hurriedly, "that life here must be very dull and monotonous. I often tell you I wish you would run up to London for the season as of old. It would give you some amusement, some distraction, some brighter society than my dull self."

"I won't listen to such heresies," said Ivor laughingly, and he turned from the window and looked with loving eyes at the pale worn beauty of her face. "You dull! The idea! Don't talk nonsense. I've settled down into a country gentleman. My life contents me infinitely better than that old life of dissipation, excitement, unrest. I have pleasant friends and neighbours, plenty of sport, gaiety, books. What in the name of all that's rational should a man want more?"

"A wife, perhaps," said Mrs. Grant, smiling kindly. "But you seem to have no inclination for matrimony."

"No," he said with sudden gravity; "none whatever."

"And yet it would be better for you to marry," continued his mother thoughtfully. "You would be happier—safer."

"Safer," interposed Ivor abruptly, as she paused. "What is it you fear for me, mother mine?"

"Nothing as yet," answered Mrs. Grant slowly. "Only—only—well, Ivor, my dear, I do not like grass widows."

Snowdon House.

PART VI.

THE doctor sat for an instant with knitted brows, as though the brief announcement from the Red Lion inn was highly unpleasant to him, as indeed it was, and might have sat still longer, but that he was roused by his eye falling on the second, and as yet unopened letter. The sight of this did not appear to soothe him; he evidently recognised the writing, for he uttered an angry exclamation as he opened it, which was repeated more than once while reading it.

This was a much longer communication, containing some enclosures, while its contents clearly puzzled and vexed the doctor. He read it through, and re-read it, exclaiming as he finished:

"What does she mean by this? What has it to do with us? I must say something to silence her."

He had not a great while to indulge in these reflections, having to be at Snowdon House to welcome home his daughter and her husband. Dismissing these communications from his mind, therefore, as far as was in his power, he went over, and was soon in consultation with Ezra to see that all was ready, and then the carriage—the new one, of course, with the ponies—was seen approaching from the railway-station. Then it entered by the lodge-gates, and in another minute the doctor had lifted his daughter from the vehicle, had kissed her, had shaken Wayre by the hand, while he bid them both "Welcome," and wished them a long and happy abode in their married home.

Wayre looked cheerful and fresh, as became a bridegroom; Agatha, too, had improved by the trip, and a troubled, anxious expression of the eye, with which the doctor was only too familiar, had disappeared, or greatly diminished. For an instant she looked with an enquiring glance at her father, as though she saw something in his face that was strange to her. He noted this glance, and assumed a smiling demeanour, talking freely and jestingly, although he was, in reality, extremely anxious to say a few words to her. This, however, was not easily to be accomplished; first there was the luncheon, then they went together over the grounds, to see what minor improvements Dr. Fulham had effected.

Everything was approved of, Agatha especially being pleased with what she saw. Mr. Wayre, who was highly satisfied also, suggested a trifling alteration in one place, and the doctor left to fetch Ezra to join in the consultation.

"This is something new," said Mr. Wayre as Fulham disappeared, "this little wooden shed at the end of the stable. I wonder what it is for?"

So speaking he went towards the place, a newly-painted and evidently newly-erected extension of the stables. He paused for an instant, and ejaculated:

"Ah, that is the weak point. I see where those fellows climb the fence, and will have it altered. I am greatly mistaken if I did not see one of them lurking on the other side but an instant back."

Muttering thus, he went to the door of the little shed, which was secured by a bolt on the outside, Mrs. Wayre watching him with a slight smile, as though amused at his curiosity.

He drew the bolt, audibly wondering the while for what reason the shed had been erected. The fastening, which was stiff with new paint, at last gave way, and Mr. Wayre pulled the door open. As he did so a tremendous brute sprang past him with a fearful snarl—Wayre was half hidden by the door—and to his horror flew directly at his wife.

A piercing shriek from Agatha was scarcely uttered before she was thrown to the ground with a terrible shock, and the brute seized her by the arm, growling angrily the while.

"Good Heaven! It is the new dog!" cried Wayre. "My wife will be killed before my eyes. Help, help!"

He rushed up to the savage beast, and with his light cane slashed it across the head, then tried to seize it.

His strength and his weapon were in vain, but just then—not a quarter of a minute had elapsed since the escape of the hound—just as the doctor and Ezra saw from the lodge what had happened, and hurried forward with shouts, a man dashed past Mr. Wayre, uttering a tremendous oath, and flung himself with such desperate force against the brute as to throw it down quite clear of the lady, but falling heavily himself.

In an instant the gigantic hound turned upon its assailant, and, as the horrified spectators could see, buried its fangs in his shoulder or neck.

The man was armed with a large clasp-knife, with which he struck the dog several times; the reddened hue of the blade and the hand which held it showing with what effect these blows were dealt; while his other arm was actually forced in between the jaws of the beast, in order to loose the choking gripe on his neck.

Those who stood round could see, but at first they could not help. Not only had the doctor and Ezra come up, but a couple of men at work in the grounds were attracted by the shouts; one of these was armed with a pitchfork, the other with a spade, but not a blow could be struck, so incessant were the turnings and changes of the man and the brute.

The women-servants had come also, and lifted Mrs. Wayre from the ground; she had not quite fainted, although she was helpless and unable to stand. She refused to be carried into the house, but watched the struggle with agonising interest.

At last—it was all comprised in a very small space of time—one of the men saw a chance for a blow, and buried the prongs of his weapon in the body of the hound. With a desperate yelp of rage and pain, the creature turned on this new assailant, and on the instant the first man, who lay gasping beneath him, and whose features were utterly undistinguishable from the blood and clay besmearing them, seized the dog in turn by its throat, gripping it as only despair can gripe, and again and again struck with his weapon behind the shoulder. These last blows were fatal; the animal staggered unsteadily a pace or two, fell, and all was over.

The men helped the stranger up. The doctor had recognised him at first, and would have done so had he been thrice as much disfigured as he really was.

Dr. Fulham was not a kindly man, or a just one, and his first wish on recognising the stranger who had saved his daughter, was that the struggle might be fatal to him.

It was clear that this ungrateful wish would be nearly if not completely gratified.

"Bring him into the house!" cried Wayre. "Luckily, my good fellows, here is a doctor on the spot. Jenny, go first; get out the brandy and plenty of linen-bandages; tear up sheets or shirts, or anything. Steady, my boys—steady! He is very faint. That's right, Agatha! Keep the smelling-salts to his nose. You are a made man from this time, my brave fellow, so keep up your spirits!"

With encouraging remarks such as these, the man was assisted into the house and laid on a couch, while the doctor prepared to examine his hurts.

He had first turned to his daughter, but she, although pale as death, and trembling so that she could not stand, refused his help.

"I am not seriously hurt," she said, as well as she could speak; "the few wounds I have Mrs. Crake can dress, but see to him, father; for, if my judgment may be trusted, your greatest skill will hardly save him."

Thus adjured, the doctor turned to the stranger—no stranger to him—and, as we have shown the doctor's mind in its harshest and most unamiable phases, it is only fair to say that now he did all that skill and experience could suggest to aid the wounded man.

With the help of his assistants the stranger's face was bathed and cleaned, his neck and shoulders, where most of the injuries had been inflicted, laid bare, and the wounds—which were frightful in their extent and number—dressed; the housekeeper's room at Snowdon House supplying most of the appliances required.

By the aid of a little brandy and other stimulants, the man, who had never been entirely insensible, revived, moved his head slightly, and spoke.

"Now then, men!" exclaimed Dr. Fulham, addressing the two assistants, "go and get yourselves a good meal in the kitchen; Mrs. Crake will see that you have the strong ale, and Mr. Wayre will see that your wages for this day's work are liberal."

The men's eyes glistened at the various provisions of this speech, so agreeably suggestive to their minds, and with rude bows turned to leave the room.

"Stay!" continued the doctor; "Mr. Ezra, you will please go with them first, and show them where to drag the carcass of the hound. Mrs. Crake, you will be good enough to see that the men have plenty to eat and drink of the best—but not too much. Jenny, we shall not want you any longer; you have been a good girl, and shall have a new dress for Christmas."

As he spoke thus he held the door of the room open in his hand, so that Ezra and his wife could hardly linger, although, to judge by their looks, they fain would have done so. There was no help for it, however; they went, the doctor closed the door, and, unperceived, turned the key in the lock so as to prevent its being furtively pushed ajar, then returned to the group.

"Would it not have been as well to keep Mrs. Crake?" said Wayre in a low voice; "we may want some assistance with this poor fellow, who seems recovering himself a bit."

"No," replied the doctor in the same tone; "I can do all that is necessary, and the fewer we have around him when he begins to talk the better."

Wayre assented, presuming that the doctor knew better than himself, and certainly entirely misunderstanding the reason for this precaution.

Mrs. Wayre, whose arm had been dressed by the housekeeper—if Mrs. Crake were entitled to that appellation—went to the man, lifted his head gently in the direction in which he seemed struggling to move it, and then adjusted his pillow so as to enable him to lie comfortably. The man's face changed in expression while she did this, showing that he had completely regained consciousness, and his eyes followed her every movement with a fascinated, almost a terrified look. Wayre noticed this, and to break the spell exclaimed:

"Come, my lad, you are all right now. I shall not forget your bravery, make sure of that; while I have breath to draw, you shall have a friend."

"You mean that, do you?" was the odd reply of the stranger; he spoke feebly and huskily as yet, but the tones were, for all that, horribly familiar to the doctor, who strove to nerve himself for what he feared was coming; "you mean that, come what may?"

"Why, of course I do," returned Mr. Wayre with a smile; he thought the poor fellow was hardly himself as yet; "I shall never forget your bravery, I tell you, for it saved my wife from death. That is ten times more than if you had saved my own life."

"Is this your wife, then?" exclaimed the man, rising with an unexpected effort to a sitting posture; "is this Dr. Fulham's daughter?"

"Yes, that is my wife," replied Wayre, "and as you have just guessed, Dr. Fulham's daughter. This is Dr. Fulham, who has so cleverly bound up your hurts."

Mrs. Wayre looked on, somewhat puzzled by the stranger's manner, but with a smile too; Dr. Fulham's face was hidden as he bent over his instrument-case.

"Oh, I know him," exclaimed the man, "and I know you, as you will see. But I never thought to find this to be Dr. Fulham's daughter."

"Don't talk any more just now, there's a good fellow," said the doctor; "you will do yourself harm. I am the more anxious about him," continued Fulham, turning to Mr. Wayre, "because I know something about him, and because it was by me that the dog was locked in the new shed; of course I could not foresee what would happen."

"No, of course you could not, doctor," said the man with a broken yet bitter laugh; "you would not have done anything of the kind if you could have guessed what would happen—we know that. Never mind the doctor's fears, Mr. Wayre, but look in my face and tell me if you ever saw me before. I ought to be ashamed to look you in the face, and I have been; but my time is running short now; I want you to know me and forgive me."

"No," returned Mr. Wayre after a short pause, during which he had scanned the face of the speaker closely; "no, I do not think I ever saw you before."

The man looked at him with a curious smile, which seemed more nearly allied to tears than to laughter, and indeed his eyes were moistened.

"I—I am sorry for that," he said; "I was in hope that although many a long day had passed since you looked on my face—an ill-boding face to you, I own—and though you thought I was dead, you might have recalled my features."

"Thought you were dead!" exclaimed Wayre, and a half-alarmed expression stole over his face; "why should I have thought you were dead?"

"Because——" the man gasped, and then turned so ghastly pale as to seem on the point of fainting.

The doctor forced a small quantity of brandy between his lips, and said in a low tone:

"Do not excite yourself. I will tell him who you are."

"No, you will not!" exclaimed the man, rallying with a great effort; "I don't trust you enough, doctor. You have deceived me again, or I should be known. If I did not feel that I have met my death this morning," he continued, addressing Wayre, "I might not have the courage to say what I do now. I am your worthless outcast son, Saul Wayre; a convict, a bad man in every way, but yet with enough of good in him to be glad he was killed in serving you."

"Saul Wayre! You my son Saul, who has been dead so many years!" cried Wayre; "your eyes and your voice are like his—but it is impossible. I would give the world to prove what you say to be the truth; but I know he is dead."

"Give me a little more brandy, doctor," said the man; "I can't afford to sink just yet. Send for Ezra, father, he knows enough to put me in prison for life, and would do it; but he can tell you I did not die when you suppose, and I can defy his malice now."

"I can perhaps save some trouble, and shorten this painful scene," interposed Dr. Fulham, "if I say that this poor fellow made the same statement to me a short time back, and that I have ascertained by enquiries from Ezra Crake himself the fact of your son's existence for years after you believed him dead. Ezra did not know the motive for my enquiries; it would not have been safe to trust him. I should have spoken to you in your son's behalf this evening, if this unfortunate event had not occurred. He is in need of assistance."

While the doctor was speaking, Wayre had been earnestly gazing at the stranger, and either he recalled the once familiar features to his memory, or what he heard convinced him, for with the tears starting from his eyes, he placed one arm round the neck of the man, and clasped the uninjured hand in his own—one hand was swathed in bandages.

"My boy!" he said. "I know you now. I recognise you. I have dealt hardly with you, Saul; a selfish and unkind parent have I indeed been; but I entreat your pardon now, and for the remainder of my life will do all in my power to atone for the past."

"Do not speak of asking pardon from such a wretch as I have been," returned Saul with a faint smile; "what I have suffered, I have brought on myself; but you will not let my wife and children want?"

"They shall be near and dear to me always," replied Wayre; "and so shall you, Saul. Do not speak so despondingly, you will soon rally from this weakness, and we shall have many days of peace and happiness together."

"It is kind of you to say so, and the hearing it repays me for everything," said his son with another faint smile; "but I tell you I know I am a dead man."

"You shall not talk any more now," said Wayre; "we will send for your wife—she shall nurse you, and she shall be as a sister to my wife—the woman whom you saved from a horrible death this day."

Agatha came forward with a friendly smile, and said a few words expressive of her gratitude to him, and her desire to see and know his wife, who should be, indeed, as a sister.

"No, she will not—she cannot!" exclaimed the man. "It is not out of spite to you I speak, for I like your look—nor out of ill-will to the doctor, although I distrust him; but I must say it. I tell you, father, I saw this young woman married, about half a year back, in Saltmere Church, Cheshire, to a man named Alfred Dane, a clerk at some factory in the country, I don't know where. Don't believe me, but search the register. Look! she does not deny it!"

Agatha did not deny it, indeed; for with one bitter moan, she clasped her hands before her eyes, and fell helplessly into a chair.

Wayre himself clutched at the sofa by which he stood, and appeared as though about to fall, while Dr. Fulham, who was as astounded as his friend, half drew a letter from his pocket; but thrust it back.

"Agatha, my wife—Agatha!" at last gasped out Wayre, "what does this story mean? It is false! it is a delusion, I am sure; but say so, deny it, and I am satisfied!"

"Ask no questions for an instant!" exclaimed the doctor; "they have both fainted, and unless we obtain help, you will have a more serious business on hand than ever."

He threw open the door as he spoke, and his shouts brought all those who had at first been there. The two labourers and Jenny were sent back.

"You, Ezra, and your wife, are old enough to keep silence, if required," said the doctor hurriedly; "especially you, Ezra."

"If he dares to breathe a word, I will shoot him with my own hands!" cried Wayre.

Ezra looked amazed at this extraordinary beginning, as well he might.

"Now then, Sukey," continued Fulham, "help Mrs. Wayre upstairs. She has been taken ill, and has fainted."

"I am only too conscious of all that has passed," suddenly interrupted Agatha; "I will hear the rest."

"Silence, Agatha, if you are not mad!" exclaimed the doctor fiercely. "I can settle all this difficulty without you."

"You shall not," returned his daughter. "I owe to Mr. Wayre, to my generous husband, to him who has trusted me—I owe to him the truth."

"If the truth be what I have just heard," said Wayre huskily, "I do not dread any evil there may be in store; I shall have felt the worst."

Saul had now slightly recovered, and, in defiance of the doctor, insisted upon speaking.

"It must all come out, then!" exclaimed the latter; "this is your master's son, Ezra, Mr. Saul Wayre, who was supposed to be dead. You will not recognise him, I dare say, because—"

"But I do!" cried Ezra with a start of surprise; "I will swear to him anywhere. That is Saul Wayre."

"I am sorry to be obliged to give you such pain, father," began Saul; "but it is right for me to tell you what I know."

"It is only a just punishment for my conduct," said Agatha. "No, father, I must not be silent now. What has been said of me is true"—Wayre groaned, and buried his face in his hands; he was seated now near his son—"I can only ask forgiveness on the plea that I meant to do my duty by Mr. Wayre; that his constant kindness had won more than my goodwill, and that I had parted for ever from Alfred Dane."

"Forgiveness!" echoed Wayre, looking up; "you have that, and my constant love, Agatha, whatever you may have done. Yes, though you have wrecked my life, I forgive, but can never forget you. Yes, it was cruel—it was cruel to— But I will never reproach you."

"Stop!" exclaimed Fulham, as Mr. Wayre rose from his seat, while Ezra and his wife prepared to assist the injured man from the room; "hear me for one minute. Agatha may have married this man, I did not know it; but she seems to admit it—yet, even if she did, she was a free agent on the day she married you, Luke Wayre, and you must not judge her too harshly."

"Prove what you say," returned Wayre, "and you will see whether I am a harsh judge or not."

"She was a free agent, I say," continued the doctor; "for this man, Alfred Dane, died in Canada before her union with you, so at the worst she only concealed her previous marriage. I do not speak without proofs—there they are." The doctor threw upon the table a letter and several papers; Agatha's astonishment at his words and actions being, perhaps, greater than that of the others. "There," continued Fulham, "is the letter from an unfriendly person taunting my daughter with her supposed liking for an unworthy suitor—as this Alfred Dane appears to have been—urging the claims of another person, and telling her that all hope of her ever again seeing the first-named has vanished, for that he was dead, and enclosing the certificate, which a comrade who was with him had sent home."

"We must get this—your Mr. Saul—to lie down," said Ezra, "or he will be fainting again. Then if the doctor knows where his friends are, we will fetch some of them."

A glance at the wounded man showed that Ezra was right, so with the aid of Sukey and Mr. Wayre, Saul was removed into one of the bedrooms.

Fulham and his daughter were left together while these were absent; Agatha sat with her face averted, and silent, until the doctor said:

"Directly Ezra Crake comes down he shall fetch this poor fellow's wife. I know where she lives. I will not say anything to reproach or trouble you now, Agatha, but will try to make use of the means so wonderfully put into my hands. I have no right to find fault, as I know my own conduct—"

He was interrupted here by the entrance of Ezra, to whom, in a few words, the doctor communicated his wishes, and added that for his own sake Ezra had better not bear malice against Mr. Saul at present. In reply to this, Mr. Crake shook his head gravely, and said he wasn't the sort of man to upset a dyin' fellow-cretur, even if he had done him any wrong, and then casting a wondering and enquiring look at Mrs. Wayre, but not daring to utter the questions which rose to his lips, Ezra went his way.

Scarcely had he gone, when a loud knock was heard at the front door of the house.

"I will see to this," exclaimed Fulham; "we can have no triflers here to-day."

He was at the door almost as quickly as Jenny, but the visitor was a person of whom the doctor could not easily dispose, for it was Mr. Darley, the confidential solicitor of Mr. Wayre.

"What is this I hear in the neighbourhood?" cried that gentleman. "Mrs. Wayre torn to pieces by a wild beast, and two if not three persons killed in her rescue? What wild beast was it? Who is killed?"

"Please to come in, Mr. Darley," said Fulham, a sudden idea inspiring him; "although you have heard an absurd exaggeration, matters are serious enough to make your presence welcome."

With his curiosity in no respect diminished by this unexpected speech, Mr. Darley followed the doctor into the presence of Mrs. Wayre. In her presence, also, Dr. Fulham told the whole story of her marriage as he had just heard it, without a shade of reservation; the situation was too threatening to allow of his paltering with it.

The lawyer listened with a grave face, and at the conclusion Agatha broke out into a passionate declaration, in which she owned her fault, submitted herself entirely to the will of Mr. Wayre, and entreated the lawyer to believe her assurance that she had meant to make a good and true wife, and that she had parted from Dane for ever.

"Upon my word this is a strange story—two strange stories, indeed; but I will only think of your daughter's at present, Dr. Fulham. She is still Mrs. Wayre, you know, if her first husband died when you say; at any rate it would be difficult—I think impossible—to set aside her marriage, even though performed in a wrong name. I am glad I came in; I will go up now and speak to Mr. Wayre. Hallo! here comes Ezra, with, I suppose, Mrs. Saul, who has so unexpectedly turned up."

The lawyer was right, Ezra had just driven up in a fly with Mrs. Saul, who was at once taken to the room where lay her husband in so precarious a state.

Great as the sensation which the struggle with the savage hound and its results was certain to create in a provincial town, it was nothing compared to the strained excitement, the eager expectancy, which was felt in reference to the other transactions which were but partly revealed, and about which curiosity was so unsatisfied. That some wonderful changes had taken place at Snowdon House, everyone was certain; that several strangers were there, was known also.

It was known, also, that Mrs. Wayre was staying with her father in Bridgeley, because she had been nearly torn to pieces by the dog, some averred, while others knew it was because her husband had been so dreadfully injured in trying to save her. It was certain that not only Dr. Z—, of Bridgeley, but a great surgeon from London, was in attendance at Snowdon House, while Mr. Wayre was never seen by any of the many eyes which watched for him.

At last, and this was ere many days were over, a hearse, with mourning-carriages, drove into the grounds at Snowdon House, and then the news flew instantly all through Bridgeley that Mr. Wayre's only son was the man who had killed the great dog; that he had lost his own life in saving his father's wife; that he had been absent and supposed dead for many years; that it was his funeral procession which was now passing to the cemetery, and that his wife and children had been taken into favour by Mr. Wayre.

Ezra was perhaps responsible for the circulation of this really correct version of the facts. He had faithfully kept counsel until speaking could do no harm. Be this as it may, Saul Wayre's troubled career was ended, and he was on this day buried in Bridgeley Cemetery. No one outside ever knew—save, perhaps, Mr. Darley—all that had taken place at Snowdon House since the terrible day of which we have spoken so fully.

All that has to be told is that a carriage, containing Mr. Wayre and his lawyer, drove up to Dr. Fulham's door as those gentlemen returned from the funeral ceremony, but only the first-named alighted, Mr. Darley awaiting his return in the vehicle.

Mr. Wayre exchanged a few words with the servant who admitted him, and then went straight to the room where, alone and dejected, Agatha was seated.

She started up as he entered, clasped her hands upon her heart, and half uttered an ejaculation.

"Agatha—my wife!" exclaimed Wayre. "I have heard all. I have learnt the whole history of your unfortunate engagement. Trusty messengers have been into Cheshire on my behalf, and I know—as I have always felt—that you were to be pitied, not to be blamed. I hope I have not shown myself harsh or unkind in my dealing with this unfortunate affair, but if I have, I ask you to forgive me, to join me again, to be once more my wife."

"Is it possible!" gasped Agatha. "Can it be true that you will still forgive me—will blot out all the past, and receive again—"

"As I hope to be forgiven myself," said Wayre as Agatha paused. "My own trespasses are neither so light nor few that I dare sit in judgment upon others. My life will be lonely, void, and blank unless you return to me, Agatha. Shall it be so?"

She strove to say something, but a wild burst of hysterical sobbing interrupted her speech, and had not Wayre sprung forward and caught her in his arms, she must have fallen.

Snowdon House was almost immediately announced as being "To Let," while Mr. Wayre disappeared at once from Bridgeley, as did Mrs. Wayre, and then Dr. Fulham. A large forfeit was paid to Dr. Z—, whose business was not sold, after all, but Dr. Fulham established himself, as was afterwards known, in a practice in an out-of-the-way suburb of London.

Ezra Crake and his wife remained in charge of Snowdon House until a tenant was found for it, and then they took a cottage in a village a few miles from Bridgeley, but Ezra's taciturn, sullen temperament was not one from which much information could be hoped, and nothing was ever learnt from him.

Therefore it is possible that nothing more would ever have been heard in Bridgeley of Mr. and Mrs. Wayre but that a family from the town went, by some rare chance, to spend a holiday in the South of Europe, and brought from there the news that that lady and gentleman were residing there. This was so long after the events already detailed that he was described as being almost white-haired and somewhat feeble, while his wife had become a middle-aged matron, apparently devoted to her husband, who, on his part, was never happy but in her company. They had three children, the eldest of whom, a girl, had just left school to live at home; the others, two boys, were also at home for their holidays when the Bridgeley people were in the vicinity.

At another town, a dozen miles or so along the coast, there dwelt—so the excursionists found—another family, also named Wayre, a widow lady and her two children. These lived a very quiet and retired life, but yet interchanged frequent visits with the family at the larger town.

The excursionists had not much opportunity of learning details by personal intimacy with Mr. or Mrs. Wayre, who, indeed, appeared to be somewhat difficult of approach by their own country-people, but they gave it as their opinion, from all they could learn, that "these other persons" were the wife and children of Saul Wayre, who was killed at Snowdon House. It was then recollected in Bridgeley that a good deal had been said about this person's widow and family, and that a great deal of mystery existed about them. So the good folks of the town decided that the great deal which had been said was true, after all, and that these really were the widow and children referred to.

And in believing thus the good folks were right.

A Lover's Questions.

Why do I love you, sweet? I cannot tell;
Yet you may rest assured I love you well.
Is it because of your sweet smiling face?
Your charming figure, with its constant grace?
Your winsome ways?—I'm sure I can't say whether
'Tis one of these, or all of them together.

Why do you love me, sweet? I have no grace,
Of charm of figure I possess no trace;
I've never heard my features merit praise,
I own a total lack of winning ways.
What are those hidden virtues you discover
In your most constant, yet unworthy lover?

A Terrible Journey.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

JACK HALLIDAY, one of the best fellows in the world, had invited three or four of us from the Temple to spend a portion of the Long Vacation with him on the delightful river W—, near the best portion of which, piscatorially considered, our host had rented a cottage for the summer.

"Hail calm acclivity, salubrious spot!" one of us exclaimed, as we drove up from the station (a distance of three miles) in the landlord's comfortable little dog-cart, and espied the cottage, deep embowered in the trees; adding less poetically, however: "I say, old man, what a find!"

"Yes," replied Halliday, "but, for Heaven's sake, keep it dark! I don't want (if you must quote Browning, I'll cap your line) 'tourists to find the coign of vantage out and vulgarise things comfortably smooth.' The place was once a roadside inn, but I suppose the licensed victualler's trade was not found to prosper when once the railways began to assert themselves. Since then it has been taken by two former servants of the Duke of Dash (there's his place over yonder). Roe and his wife are capital people; he knows all the best 'holes' in the river, and she's as good a cook as you'll find in the county."

By this time we had arrived at the front-door. I will not weary my readers by a detailed description of the nook—the like of which has been seen by all of us at one time or other during our travels. Suffice it to let me ask you to 'figure to yourself,' as a Frenchman would say, a house which left the prevailing impression on the mind of Virginia-creeper, wisteria, and sweet-scented jessamine, of old oaken beams crossing the brickwork in sections and bi-sections—a style of architecture called, if I mistake not, Ballusk—of gable-ends and diamond panes, high wainscotings, curious settles, cunningly carved withal, and bits of stained glass bearing fragments of the cognizances of the noble family who lived at the "big house" when The Feathers was yet a flourishing concern. It was, indeed, a "find."

"Now, boys, what do you think of doing?" cried our host, after our traps had been deposited in our various rooms. "What I propose, if no one has any objection, is this: play lawn-tennis (there's not half a bad ground here, and it's rather bright for fishing); have a sort of late dinner, or early supper, or whatever you like to call it, at nine, and wind up with a chat, a smoke, and a rubber at whist, not unassisted by some prime Glenlivet, which—along with one or two other good things—I have taken the precaution to bring with me. To-morrow we can try the river, and in the afternoon we'll go over the duke's place; there's to be a harvest-home, and a balloon-ascent, and all sorts of things, so you'll be able to observe the manners and customs of the natives to your hearts' content. Do my plans suit you?"

"Capitally." "Nothing I should like better." "Suit me down to the ground," we answered variously.

"Come along, then;" and Halliday led us through the kitchen-garden to what had once been the bowling-green, but was now the lawn-tennis ground. There we chose sides, and played sett after sett, till we were fain to pause and drink claret-cup until such time as we had recovered breath to play again. This programme we adhered to with little variation till the sun no longer lent us the light of his beams, and "so to supper."

How we did eat, to be sure! How the trout of Jack's own catching disappeared! How the mutton-cutlets, set round with mashed potatoes, vanished; and the rabbit-pie of the landlord's shooting—the rabbit I mean, not the pie—took to itself wings, and was pursued down our throats by Manzanilla and seltzer, and later by Chambertin, and Larose.

But all mundane pleasures—dining being the least soonest exhausted—have their end. After a talk, in which the words "Red-spinner" and "May-fly," were not unfrequently heard, a hand at whist, and a "wee nippie" of the justly vaunted Glenlivat, candles were sought, and a move made for bed.

I cannot tell why, but somehow I found it impossible to compose myself to sleep that night. Was it the strange bed, over-fatigue, the heavy dinner-supper, or all three combined? Whatever the cause, the effect was certain. Try as I would I could not sleep. So, thoroughly entering into King Henry's feelings on a similar occasion, and anathematising the dull god in no measured terms, I resolved to get up and solace myself with a pipe. The oak chair in which I ensconced myself I found to be ingeniously but uncomfortably carved; the room felt close; the moon was shining smilingly outside; why not go for a stroll? No sooner was the idea conceived than acted on. Putting on a thick tweed coat and trousers, I noiselessly descended the stairs, and in a very short time found myself in the open. How cool—how delightfully cool the air felt after that stuffy but picturesque old bed-chamber! Where should I go? Through the kitchen-garden, past the lawn-tennis ground, and out by the postern. This was fastened by but a single bolt, and the next moment I was in the roadway. One path is as good as another where no definite object is in view, so taking the first that came handy I soon perceived that I was walking towards the big gates of Leafden, the Duke of Dash's—pointed out to us only a few hours ago by Halliday. Presently I came face to face with the massive iron-work. At the side stood a smaller gate, which, rather to my surprise, yielded to a turn of the handle, and—no other obstacle impeding—I strolled deliberately into the ducal domain.

Sauntering along the broad, elm-lined avenue, I involuntarily struck to the right, passed down a path shaded with yew-trees, and suddenly found myself on a large open space of three or four acres square.

In the centre of this plateau lay an object which I could not clearly define. It resembled a pear of colossal proportions, standing nearly upright on its stem, while from the stem itself ran what looked like a huge snake. Determined to find out for myself the true nature of these extraordinary appearances, I boldly stepped into the arena. Hardly had I done so when I heard a voice proceeding from the other side of the pear.

"Take care!" said the voice. "Don't come too near that side; the balloon may alue round."

The pear then was a balloon, and the snake of my imagination the piping conveying the gas from, probably, the duke's private gas-works. How stupid of me not to have guessed! Of course, this was the balloon which was destined to ascend the following day for the edification of the country yokels. This was doubtless the reason the smaller gate was open—to allow the professional aeronaut to enter and make final arrangements undisturbed by the rustics, who would by daylight crowd every portion of the grounds.

Again the voice spoke:

"I'm glad you've come, though; the men who promised to be here at twelve have of course left me in the lurch, and I've had to do most of the filling myself."

I had by this time walked round to the spot whence these words proceeded, and saw before me a man of rather below than above the middle height, but thick-set, with broad shoulders, and a bright eye.

"I'm not the professional aeronaut," my unknown friend went on to inform me; "I'm only a 'scientific gent' as M. Dupin's assistants love to call me. Truth to tell I'm an astronomer. I've been anxious for some time past to make night observations from a balloon, but unfortunately have not the means to hire one. The duke, who has more than once befriended me, has been good enough to allow me the use of M. Dupin's, promising at the same time to defray all expense in case of injury to the aerostat."

"But shall you be back in time for the fête to-morrow?" I asked.

"Doubtless."

He said this with a queer expression I could not then translate.

What bitter cause I had later on to understand his full meaning!

"Can I help you in any way?" I asked politely.

"You are very kind; if you act under my directions you will be rendering me a service. See, the balloon is nearly inflated; in another ten minutes I shall be ready to start. Hang that lamp to the hoop above the car; it will be out of reach of the gas there; coil that rope neatly—see that the grapnel is firmly attached. Place those bags of ballast at the bottom of the car—I'll see to the instruments myself. Now, please, help me to detach the piping and prevent any further escape at this end of the tube, and all will be ready. By the way, should you like to accompany me?"

Now to ascend in a balloon was one of my pet ambitions. I had read more than one work on aerostatics, and longed to experience for myself the sensations and adventures which I had as yet only enjoyed at second-hand in the writings of Glaisher, Flammarion, and De Fonvielle. But to trust myself with a man whom I had never seen before, who might, for aught I knew, be the veriest tyro in aerial navigation, was quite another thing. It was, therefore, with some degree of doubt I asked:

"Have you ever been in a balloon before, sir?"

"Ever been in a balloon before!" he replied, repeating my words in a tone almost of pity. "Considering I have owned a machine myself, and used to make frequent ascents years ago, when I was better off than I am now, you need have no fear of my capabilities as balloon navigator, if that's what you're thinking of."

Certainly the cool and workmanlike manner in which he was preparing for the start went no little way towards reassuring me.

"I should like to go, but—"

"And I should like to have you as a companion. Come!"

"You will make but a short ascent?" I queried, "for I am staying with friends, and I should not like to embarrass them by my absence."

"Oh, make your mind easy on that point also; we shall not be up long."

Again that queer expression. What did it mean? Nothing, no doubt—only my fancy. I had a great mind to risk it. I would.

"Well, have you made up your mind?" he asked for the last time.

"I have."

"You will go?"

"Yes."

It is a fine, clear night, though somewhat dark, for a bank of clouds has by this time obscured the moon's rays. All is now ready, and I am directed to quickly jump into the car, while my new friend, without a moment's delay, follows my example. The cords holding us to mother-earth have been detached from their fastenings; for my consent to accompany the astronomer has altered the condition of things; my extra weight, added to that of the bags of ballast with which the car is plentifully supplied, holds us to the ground without any further attachment being needed. It is now only necessary to throw out nearly as many pounds of ballast as correspond with my weight, and the balloon will then be almost of the same weight as its own volume of air. With careful exactitude my companion begins to throw out the desired quantity of ballast. Presently a muttered "We're off!" breaks the silence. The balloon is in motion.

Very slowly and majestically we rise, without a plunge or a bound.

But, as many of my readers are no doubt aware, the sensation of ascending is not that of motion of the aerostat itself. The enormous gas-filled bag seems, for the first few moments, to remain perfectly stationary, while the planet which we inhabit appears slowly to be sinking down, down, till the trees look like shrubs; the rivers, brooks; the houses, little cots. Yet another short space, and the shrubs are spots; the brooks, threads of silk; the cots, dolls'-houses.

When next I venture to look over the edge of the car I no longer see the earth, for we have passed into a stratum of cloud. My companion throws out a few handfuls of ballast to compensate for the depression consequent on the difference of temperature caused by passage through the cumuli, and in a few moments the scene again changes.

We are now in the presence of the pale-faced moon. Perfect—almost unearthly—stillness prevails. I have a feeling that we two souls are alone in a place I was never in before. I am conscious of my utter littleness, for I know that I am an inhabitant of the world of space—space transcending imagination; never, never-ending space!

After we had sailed about twenty minutes, as I should guess, I began to grow reconciled to the novelty of the situation. Hitherto I had occasionally felt a little sick as a current of air caused the balloon to oscillate and drive us before it at what I should compute a speed of between ten and sixteen miles an hour. But now the machine seemed to slacken its pace and at last become almost stationary. I positively enjoyed the situation.

Up to this not a word had been exchanged between my companion and myself. He had been busying himself in various ways; now throwing out handfuls of ballast, now seeing to the lamp, now glancing at the barometer to ascertain the different altitudes. At last, however, he sat down opposite to me and broke the oppressive silence thus:

"Never been up in a balloon before, I suppose?"

"Never."

"Queer place, isn't it?"

"Yes; but I rather like the sensation of aerial sailing. At what altitude are we now?"

Detaching the lamp, and placing it at the farther end of a board which he had laid across a portion of the car for the use of his instruments, but still far out of danger from the gas, my companion read the glass.

"Barometer reads 20·3 less, that means we are 10,560 feet above the earth's plane."

To me it sounded a fearful height. Another pause.

"Are you a man of many ambitions?" suddenly asked the scientist.

"Well, not very many," I replied. "One of them has certainly been gratified by this balloon excursion."

"Ah," sighed the other, "I have only one."

"You are lucky. May I ask what it is?"

"To reach the planet Neptune."

"And why not?" I answered, laughing at his joke. "It's only a matter of a billion miles or so."

"You know something of astronomy?" enquired my friend eagerly.

"I fear I have only a smattering of the science."

"I have made it the study of a lifetime, sir. Neptune—as perhaps you know—is the farthest visible planet, and is distant from the earth, roughly speaking, 2,950,000,000 miles; though it is not always quite so far by a few million."

"We won't quarrel about a few millions!" I remarked jocularly.

"Very well, then," continued the astronomer, scarcely heeding my interruption, "supposing this aerostat were travelling at the rate of forty miles an hour, we should reach Neptune in one hundred and thirty-one years."

"So soon as that!" I replied, smiling.

"The distance is nothing, as you say, compared to that of some of the 'fixed stars,' whose light, travelling at the rate of 192,000 miles a second—that's speed, if you like—has only reached us now; or, to put it more plainly, in the form of the familiar illustration, supposing their light began to travel at the time when Abraham was about to sacrifice Isaac, it would but have reached us now."

"They must be very far off," I rejoined prosaically; for indeed I was not following my companion's calculations very closely.

"They are," he replied with conviction. "Now, our great difficulty in reaching Neptune would be the fact that on the planet we have just left we are allotted a span of but seventy years of life, while to reach the star in question, we should require one hundred and thirty-one. This puzzled me a good deal at first. But I have overcome the obstacle."

"How?" I queried, beginning to enjoy my witty friend's remarks—evidently a keen and practised humourist, for he did not seem to be conscious of the fun he was creating. An invaluable man for a dull dinner-party, I thought.

"Thus. Before ever we had exhausted our ten lustrums, we should be in the attraction of planets in which the span of life is far greater than that granted us in our own; consequently we should be governed by the condition under which life exists in those worlds. In effect, we should be like naturalised citizens of planets, whose laws—What are you laughing at?" he suddenly demanded.

"At you. You are one of the most entertaining fellows I ever met."

"I am not used to be laughed at, sir."

"Then you must have lived among Scotchmen all your life."

"You are an impertinent fellow."

"Why so, pray?"

"For laughing at me, sir."

"I thought by so doing I was paying the greatest compliment to your amusing calculations."

"Amusing calculations!" repeated the other, aghast.

"Come, don't look so serious. I presume you don't mean to say you were in earnest while elaborating to me your astounding schemes?"

"In earnest!" almost shouted the man opposite. "What in Heaven's name is your meaning? Do you suppose I have spent years upon years of my life in the working out of my great scheme to be told I have been joking? Are you mad, or do you suppose—"

For a moment my heart seemed to refuse to beat—I could not draw my breath. Open-mouthed I gazed at the other as he stood over me, for he had risen during the last few words. His eyes met mine. One look was enough.

They were those of a madman.

The horror engendered by my situation was such that I seemed unable to grasp it in an instant. One by one each fresh horror rose before me, and stood spectre-like confronting me.

I was in a balloon, of the navigation of which I knew nothing.

I was hundreds—nay, thousands of feet above the earth.

Shout as I would no living being could hear me, save one—my companion, a madman!

What should I do? There could be but one course to pursue—pacify him and humour him to the top of his bent.

Still I stared, afraid to move, for the man's hand was slowly making for a knife at his side, and I was fearful lest the least stir on my part should be construed into a movement of attack. My head was thrown back, and thus I sat on the narrow seat of the car, my eye steadily fixed on his. I know not for how long—it may have been but a few seconds, it may have been an hour. I had lost count of time. Some means of pacifying him must be had recourse to. This caused me to recover from my stupor, and my hitherto benumbed thoughts began now to flow rapidly and freely. I drew a long breath—and smiled—absolutely smiled. When a man knows "his time" has come, he is calm. I had no hope of reaching earth alive, though I meant to try. I smiled, and slowly spoke—in the moment I had devoted to thought I had considered what to say.

"I—I fancy we have misunderstood each other, sir. When I laughed, I foolishly believed I was meant to do so. I did so in my deplorable ignorance, in the same spirit in which the House of Commons laughed when Stephenson broke to them the intelligence that his traction-engine would travel ten miles an hour. I did not deem it possible to reach the planet Neptune, so I laughed. 'Tis the way in which new theories are received. Will you forgive me?"

"If you apologise," he muttered, still with his hand on his knife.

"I do indeed, sir, most humbly."

"Well, I suppose you knew no better. Let us be friends."

Eagerly seizing my late opponent's outstretched hand, I shook it warmly, and to my intense relief observed him resume his seat. For the present I was safe.

He continued:

"My name, sir, is Professor Grantly. You may have heard of me in the world of science." I bowed. "Yes, sir, the astronomers were jealous of me, pretended I was mad, and had me confined in an asylum; but I escaped last night, and intend to be even with them one day."

Again he handled his knife as if it were an old friend.

Then Grantly's story of the duke having lent him the balloon was evidently not true. He had doubtless come upon it by an accident, probably while the assistants were at supper in the duke's hospitable servants'-hall, and had determined to utilise it at once.

"I have indeed heard much of you, sir," I replied in my most conciliatory tone, "and shall esteem it an honour if you will further enlighten me on an astronomical system which, I understand, you have made entirely your own."

This ruse would give me time to think over, as rapidly as possible, the best means of ultimately saving myself. I was still in imminent peril, for were it my companion's fancy to try and reach the far-distant planet, he would allow the balloon to rise till we arrived at such an altitude that numbness, stupor, and death would soon ensue. I pretended to be listening to the poor fellow's flights of imagination, which, now that he considered he had met with a congenial spirit, were poured forth with abundance of fantastic force, in which fact and fancy were mixed together in inextricable confusion. But all the time, "How can I escape?" was the refrain of my thoughts. "How can I escape?" became an inward cry, as monotonous as was the "I can't get out" of Sterne's imprisoned starling. At last I fancied I had solved the difficulty, and cautiously felt my way.

"Yes," I said when he paused once for breath, "I believe I have grasped your scheme. Your plan for existing when deprived of the atmosphere surrounding our earth is more than ingenious—it is masterly."

"You see the correctness of my calculations?"

"I do."

"You will travel with me, then?"

"It will be my privilege."

"You will not tire of my companionship in a journey that will extend probably over one hundred and thirty-one years?"

"In your society," I replied, "I shall ever experience both pleasure and intellectual profit."

"Dear friend," the poor fellow murmured, and took both my hands in his and pressed them.

Now was my time.

"But—" I began, and my voice shook so that I could not proceed, for I knew how much hung on the manner in which my words would be received.

"But?" he repeated dubiously.

"I don't think you will object to my 'but' in this instance. Before accompanying you to Neptune I should like first to return to earth."

"Eh?"

"I happen to be in possession of an extremely powerful five-foot astronomical glass."

His eyes sparkled. The bait was taking.

"Where is it?" he asked.

"At my house, very near the spot where I first had the pleasure of meeting you. Now, if you will do me the favour to descend I shall be but a very short time fetching the glass and collecting a few necessities for so long a journey. We then can mount into the air again as soon as you please."

I had spoken, what would be his reply?

"See, I myself own a most powerful telescope. I doubt if your instrument is superior to mine."

So saying Grantly handed me a roll of foolscap-paper pasted at the edges to keep it cylindrical in form. I was irresistibly reminded of the maniac in the Bedlam picture of the "Rake's Progress." I could have smiled had the situation not been so truly tragic. Gravely I looked through the roll of paper, and returned it to him.

"No," said I decisively, "your glass is less powerful than mine. I can barely descry with it the continents and oceans on Mars, while with the aid of mine both are clearly defined."

"You have this telescope at home near where we ascended?"

"I have."

He wavers—he is sorely tempted. Have I won?

My hope flickered for a moment. With the next it died.

"I fear we shall have to dispense with your instrument for the present. We shall be losing time if we descend."

He spoke as firmly and decisively as I had done a moment ago.

"But out of a hundred and thirty years, what is one hour?" I pleaded.

It was vain, for, even before I had finished speaking, the madman had seized a sand-bag, a large portion of the contents of which he threw over the side, and from an almost stationary attitude we began to mount higher, higher, into space.

Gentle means had failed. Could I not compel him to let me descend? Every second was precious. I began my newly-conceived scheme at once.

"Professor Grantly, I intend to descend. I am growing faint. The excessive altitude to which we are rising is beginning to tell on me."

"I regret your faintness," he responded, "but I cannot do as you wish."

"You refuse to allow me?"

"I do!"

"Then, by Jove, I'll make you!" I exclaimed, foolishly losing all self-restraint.

"What!"

He uttered this one word only, but shall I ever forget the significance he threw into those four letters? His meaning was as plain as if he had said:

"You mean mischief, do you? I have had tussles with my keepers before now; I'm not afraid of one with you."

Grantly's ejaculation was the last word spoken. What took place afterwards was in complete silence, save for the scuffling caused by the encounter itself and the heavy breathing of the combatants.

We were both of about the same height, though Grantly's shoulders were broader than mine. Against this I put the fact that I was his junior by six or seven years, and, besides, was a man of more active habits than one who had been used to the scant exercise afforded to the inmates of an asylum. Yet to compensate for lack of exercise, the man was possessed of the super-strength that comes to the insane in moments of paroxysm. Added to this, he was armed, and I was not. All told, I feared the odds lay with him.

I made these rapid calculations while we glared at each other during the few seconds before that terrible fight began.

I think Grantly was confused as to what to do first, whilst I had a fairly-settled plan of attack. My idea was, first, to get the knife out of his hands by any means possible—to stun him would be best; next, tie both hands and feet with the rope to which the grapnel was attached, and then make for the valve-line—in front of which he sat.

I was certain the knife was the only weapon the maniac had about him, or he would have shown signs of the possession of some other. A revolver, for instance, he would at once have used as the easiest method of dispatching me. For that the man meant to kill me admitted of no doubt.

I said my antagonist seemed confused and uncertain what to do, and I believe I was right in my surmise; his first move being evidently the result of a momentary mad impulse. Suddenly, with the rapidity of thought, and the fury of a wild beast, he bounded from his seat, and let fly at me with the knife. Instinctively I threw my head on one side—I had not time otherwise to parry the blow; the point descended, striking me with great force on the shoulder, piercing the thick shooting-coat I wore, and penetrating the flesh to the bone. The blow was meant for my head. Fortunately I was too quick for him.

A strange thing now happened.

As the madman flew from his seat to strike, a portion of his coat swung round, came in contact with the lamp lying at the farther end of the instrument-table where it had remained since Grantly had last read the barometer, and was dashed to the ground.

To my other perils was now added the dread of a conflagration.

If the ignited paraffin once came in contact with the gas from the balloon—but the result would not bear even contemplation.

To extinguish the flames must now be my first consideration. Fortunately they were not large, for there appeared to be but little oil in the lamp, which no doubt belonged to the balloon-assistants, and was never intended for the purposes of an ascent. The wound I had received was not of so serious a nature as might have been anticipated; the thickness of my coat had stood me in good stead. Luckily no bones were broken. My two hands, therefore, now flew to Grantly's wrist ere he had time to strike again, and lifted the knife he still held, bodily out of the wound. I felt the blood flow as I did so, then exerting the brute strength that was rising in me to the utmost, I flung myself on him with such fury that had his head come in contact with anything but the rope supporting the car, it must have been stove in. I fell on top of the man, still keeping tight hold of the wrist that held the knife. I soon recovered myself, however, and began trampling on the flames. It was a difficult task to extinguish them, for the little pointed tongues were quickly lapping wherever the oil had run. In another moment the car would be on fire! Rapidly—breathlessly, I trampled, and with each tread a tongue became silent. The fire was getting under. Again I exerted my efforts to the utmost, and this time they were crowned with success. In a few moments I had trampled out the last flame. The fire was out.

But we were now in total darkness, save for the fitful gleams of the moon.

The peril of fire over, I returned to the work of forcing the professor to drop the knife. I knew the best method of accomplishing this was to bend his wrist at such an angle to the arm that the sinews were rendered powerless to retain a hold. Bearing this in mind, with my right hand I seized the madman's across the knuckles, while with my left I secured a firm grip of his arm a little above the wrist. None of this time, however, must it be supposed that Grantly's left was idle, for blow after blow fell on my face, body—anywhere he could see an opening to strike, while with his teeth he bit at me like a dog. His blows and bites only served to madden me, and for the moment I felt strong as the insane.

Holding the arm and hand in the manner I have described, I now managed to make a lever of my knee, and pressed the arm upon it till the wrist broke! The knife fell to the ground. Even now, in the anguish he must have been enduring, my antagonist did not utter a sound.

The exertions I had undergone were beginning to tell their tale. I felt the blood from my wound slowly trickle down my arm, and I knew that each moment I was growing less capable of sustained conflict. Would he even now get the better of me? The knife lay harmless at our feet, yet I dared not stoop to pick it up; for the maniac, swift as thought, had jumped on to the seat to gain the advantage of a higher position, and, no doubt expecting that I would stoop for the weapon, had raised his heel, ready to drive it into my skull the instant I made the movement.

I saw his move, and at once was up beside him on the seat. Thank Heaven! the ropes were strong, or they must have gone with the extra strain. As it was, the balloon lurched so heavily that, for a moment, we were both in danger of being precipitated into space. Steadying ourselves, however, we maintained our stand.

The time had come to bring the battle to a close. The decisive blow must be struck by one or other of us. For my part I had determined what to do if I had but the strength left to carry out my plan. Nothing else would serve. I must throw the man over the edge of the car!

Whether Grantly divined my purpose I cannot tell, but, with as little premeditation as when he made his first onslaught, his left hand—the right was, of course, disabled—flew to my throat. His grasp was like a vice, he was pressing his knuckles savagely into my windpipe. I struggled for air—I was choking.

For the second time a trick I had been taught in my athletic days came to my assistance. Interlacing the fingers of one hand with those of the other, I lifted this bar of flesh high above my head, and brought both hands down simultaneously with such force upon my enemy's outstretched arm, that the limb fell helpless to his side. The victory was mine.

Not an instant, not a half-second was to be lost. I must put the man altogether hors de combat. I summoned up all my remaining strength, and with my left I dealt him a crushing blow between the eyes. Again the ropes saved him, and half-stunned he sank to the ground. With no more delay than it takes to recount, I dragged the prostrate form to the side. A last supreme effort and I hurled the man over the edge.

After that I found myself lying in a heap, inert, exhausted, at the bottom of the car.

But my dangers even now were far from over. Suddenly occurred a contingency which in the hot excitement of the fight I had never once calculated on. The balloon, I fancy, had been very slowly sinking during the combat, for no ballast had lately been expended. The moment, however, the machine was relieved of Grantly's weight, I became conscious that the balloon with a furious bound was tearing upwards at incredible speed, rolling and plunging as it rushed through the air. I had not the strength to reach up to, much less pull, the valve-line. Instantaneously the atmosphere grows more rarefied, I experience a dryness of throat, a numbness is overcoming me. I try to move my limbs, I cannot, I am losing consciousness, I—

No, I will not die!

By sheer force of will I raise myself sufficiently to crawl along the bottom of the car till I am close to the valve-line. I stretch out my hands towards it, but my fingers barely touch the cord. My hands are too nerveless to hold it. Can nothing be done?

Yes, one last resource is left me.

I strain my neck towards the rope and seize it with my teeth. Thus I hang to it with my whole weight. Oh, Heavens! it moves—the valve opens!

The upward flight is arrested.

So rapid, however, has been the ascent, that the resistance of air at first prevents the gas escaping through the top; it is forced, therefore, through the lower aperture, nearly blinding me in its egress. But the loss of gas soon causes the aerostat to stand still. Now it hovers in mid-air—now begins the descent. At first slowly, then faster and faster. I am reviving as we near the earth. If I ascended rapidly but a few moments back I am now in imminent danger from the increased velocity in the opposite direction. I shall be dashed to pieces unless I ease the machine of some of its weight. Without a moment's hesitation I fling overboard the improvised instrument-table, together with all that stands upon it. This has the desired effect, and we slacken speed; still even now we are descending too rapidly to be safe. We are but two hundred feet off the earth, which has the appearance of heaving upwards to meet us. By a gleam of the moon I can see directly under me a sheet of water. I hear a splash—the balloon scuds over the surface—a second after I experience a shock, then a blow, and—I remember nothing more.

Naturally, it was some time before I recovered from the mental and physical shock which I had sustained during that "Terrible Journey."

But that a lunatic, answering in all respects to the professor, had on that evening escaped from a neighbouring asylum after hearing of the proposed balloon ascent, and had been no more seen, and for the marks of the struggle which still remained upon me, I should scarcely have believed in the reality of my adventure, but have cried:

Oh, I have passed a miserable night,
So full of fearful dreams—of ugly sights,
That as I am a Christian, faithful man,
I would not spend another such a night
Though 'twere to buy a world of happy days.

The Editor's Note Book.

HE would be a bold man, who, without some more accurate knowledge of the country and its people than is possessed by most of us, should venture authoritatively to say that the policy of our Government, in forcing Egypt to retire from the Soudan, is likely to be beneficial or otherwise to the Khedive and his subjects. But it must not be forgotten that great sums of money and many lives have been expended in the attempt to put down the Soudan slave trade, and that all this will have been wasted if the country is to be abandoned altogether to the tender mercies of the local chiefs.

To those, however, who look upon a British Protectorate over Egypt, to put it in the mildest way, as being desirable, Mr. Gladstone's order to the Khedive to withdraw from the Soudan will be very welcome. Even the Premier's proverbially "open mind" must see in time that we cannot order a foreign Government about in this manner, unless we are prepared eventually to take all its responsibilities upon our own shoulders. The worst of it all is that our Governments, of whichever party, are too fond of trying to please everybody, and consequently hesitate and doubt until some unexpected disaster forces their hands.

It is quite time that somebody should tell us what we are in Egypt for, what we propose to do there, and how the business, whatever it may be, is to be carried out.

MEANWHILE, the ingenious Mr. Labouchere thinks that the majority of Englishmen "would be delighted to learn that our relations with Egypt are those which exist between us and Nova Zembla." The majority of Englishmen, I believe, perfectly recognise the fact that our road to India, China, and Australia is through Egypt, and that consequently we have interests in Egypt which we have not in Nova Zembla, and which must be protected.

ACCORDING to Mr. Henry George, all the difficulties and complex problems which are the result of an advanced state of civilisation are capable of solution in a very easy manner. As Mr. Labouchere, who presided at the meeting of the Land Reform Union which was held last week in St. James's Hall, tersely put it, this gentleman's panacea is simplicity itself. All he demands is that the State should re-enter upon its rights to the soil of the entire kingdom, and that the landlords should be expropriated without compensation.

WHY landlords should be served in this way any more than railway shareholders or fundholders, or any other capitalists, does not quite appear, any more than why a man who has just bought land with the savings of a life of industry should be turned out and ruined because his neighbour has inherited his property from a long line of ancestors. That great landlords contribute an inadequate amount to the public revenue in the shape of taxation may be admitted, though even then it may fairly be urged on the other side that rents are regulated in proportion, and that, if landlords had to pay more, they would demand more.

By some mysterious process of reasoning Mr. George has persuaded himself that, if the State became the universal landlord, it would be possible to pension all our widows, to dower all our daughters, to give to every man over a certain age enough to live upon for the rest of his life, and to abolish poverty and its miseries altogether and for ever. In plain truth Mr. George's arguments differ in no way from those of many Socialists and Communists who have preceded him, and his gospel is not—as Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Michael Davitt, and the rest of the other people who support him affect to believe—either new or original.

THE Nihilists are busy again in Russia, and the horrible descriptions in the papers of the sufferings of such of their body as are perishing miserably in the prisons of the Czar are more likely to urge them to fresh acts of vengeance than to frighten them into submission. The murder of Colonel Soudeikin has been followed by the issue of a number of warnings to other prominent officials, and there will, it may be feared, be some terrible work by-and-by.

MEANWHILE, the Czar and his ministers make no sign, the promised reforms seem to be as far off as ever, and things are "kept dark" as much as possible. Sitting on the safety-valve may be exciting, but is sure to lead to disastrous results in the long run.

It is natural enough that gentlemen like Mr. Samuel Laing, the Chairman of the Brighton Railway Company, should object to the Railway Commissioners, and should be desirous of getting rid of a tribunal, the object of which is to protect the public against those offences of omission and commission of which Railway Companies are so constantly guilty. But it is not likely that either Government, Parliament, or public will be deluded by any of the arguments which Mr. Laing and his friends bring forward.

ONE point which stands out very prominently from amid the confusion and dust of the correspondence which has followed Mr. Laing's letter to the Times, is the extraordinary superiority of the arrangements of the railways north of the Thames to those whose traffic is with the south. The Brighton, so far as the actual Brighton service is concerned, is the best of the latter, but the managers of the North Western, the Midland, and the Great Northern seem to look upon their duties to the public from quite a different point of view to that which obtains on the other side of London.

THE Corporation of the City of London have given notice of a Bill which is to be brought into Parliament next session, and which has for its object the regulation of the supply of water to the metropolis. Besides regulating the dividends and financial arrangements of the Companies—which certainly require some very severe overhauling—the Bill seeks to give every consumer the right to require the Water Company to supply him with water by meter.

THIS is a most important point, in that it is impossible to see why the consumer should have to pay an arbitrary price for water any more than for gas, and that, under the present system, consumers and Companies alike lose severely by reason of the unavoidable waste. If everybody paid for the water he used and no more, there would be no waste at all; and if there were, the loss would fall on the careless consumers, and not on those who were more careful. The system on which water is at present supplied to London is perhaps the most illogical and expensive which perverted ingenuity could have devised.

MR. FRANCIS GALTON wants everybody to keep the history of his family posted up, with a view of enabling "parents to appreciate the various hereditary influences converging upon their children," and offers five hundred pounds in prizes for the best family records which may be sent him before the fifteenth of May. How the information is ever to be utilised I do not quite see, but the preparation of the records will no doubt amuse a good many of the elderly aunts who are great authorities in the histories of their families, and cannot do anybody any harm.

WHATEVER of exaggeration there may be in the letter to the Times, which complained of the insufficient, and in many cases absolutely disgusting, sleeping accommodation provided for the footmen in some of our fashionable districts, there can be no doubt that there is too much actual truth in it. Servants are habitually put to sleep in places which no sanitary surveyor would license, and it seems to be forgotten that fever, if it once breaks out in a house, cannot be confined to the servants' quarters, but will inevitably find its way even into the very best bedrooms. There is often a great deal more dangerous overcrowding in a well-to-do house full of children and servants than there is in any common lodging-house.

SOME of the papers the other day contained a thrilling description of the pranks of a mad engine-driver in charge of a train from Brest to Paris. Next day the story was flatly contradicted, and described as a hoax. The day after that again the Daily Telegraph made it the text of a sensational leader. What are we to believe?

THE catalogue of the exhibition of works of the old masters, now being held in the rooms of the Royal Academy, affords an amusing commentary on Lord Coleridge's astonishing doctrine that the authorship of works of art is a matter of fact, and not of opinion. The painters of several pictures are described as "unknown," but, if Lord Coleridge and those members of the Academy who agreed so unreservedly with Sir Frederick Leighton's positive dicta on the Belt trial are right, surely there can be no difficulty in assigning them to their proper authors.

MR. HENRY IRVING'S success in Chicago appears to have been enormous and complete. Whether they are less critical or more impressionable out West than in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia may be open to argument, but there is no doubt that the impression which Mr. Irving has produced in Chicago is far greater than that which his acting has made anywhere else in the States. I shall be very curious to see the result of his return visits to the northern cities, but, from what I hear, I anticipate a most brilliant close to the tour.

I HEAR excellent accounts of the pantomimes this year, and their success is, in almost every case, phenomenal. Drury Lane, in particular, is crammed twice every day. "Claudian" also has resulted in a financial success which is quite on a par with its artistic triumph, and, indeed, theatrical business all round is remarkably good. Some friends of mine applied for stalls at five theatres, one day last week, and could not be accommodated at any one of them.

THE illnesses of Mr. Frederick Clay and Sir Arthur Sullivan immediately after the production of their new operas have been made the text of a good deal of talk about coincidences, but there is, after all, not much coincidence in the matter. Both gentlemen have been for some time in indifferent health, and both have been considerably overworked. It is not at all astonishing that the result should have been in each case much the same. Sir Arthur is rapidly mending, I am glad to say, but Mr. Clay's illness is of a more serious character, and his progress towards recovery is, unhappily, very slow. C. D.

Club Gambling in the Last Century.

["SOCIETY" being a good deal exercised just now about certain club-gambling scandals, the following description of the state of things which obtained in the bad old times towards the close of the last century may be re-printed with advantage.]

The Cocoa-Tree Club in St. James's Street had its origin in a Tory chocolate-house of Queen Anne's days, and assumed the higher form of a club in 1746. Members of Parliament and persons high in life belonged to this club, which, it used to be said, exercised a very important influence on the course of politics. In those days, Members of Parliament were not always above taking a bribe, and many of the Cocoa-Tree gentlemen were only too easily induced to accept bank-notes for two or three hundred pounds each, when the Ministry, hard pushed, were obliged to resort to such a device to obtain support; and the Peace of Fontainebleau is alleged to have cost the Government in this way twenty-five thousand pounds.

Gambling also went on to a fearful extent at the Cocoa-Tree. Horace Walpole relates, in 1780, that a Mr. O'Birne, an Irishman, won a hundred thousand pounds from a young Mr. Harvey. "You can never pay me," said O'Birne. "I can," replied the young fellow; "my estate will sell for the amount." "No," said the Irishman, "I will take ten thousand, and we will throw for the odd ninety." They did, and Harvey won. At most of the fashionable clubs of the last century gaming was carried on in the most reckless manner. In the club-book of Almack's there is this note: "Mr. Flynn, having won only twelve thousand guineas during the last two months, retired in disgust, March, 21st, 1772." To lose twenty thousand pounds in one evening was not unusual. Generally, ten thousand pounds in specie lay on the table. A curious account is given of the way these desperate gamblers used to equip themselves for the sport. They took off their embroidered coats, put on frieze garments, protected their lace ruffles with pieces of leather, shaded their eyes with broad-brimmed straw hats adorned with flowers and ribbons, and wore masks "to conceal their emotions!" That suicide was not an unfrequent result of such high play can hardly be wondered at. Lord Mountford, a member of White's, where the gambling was fearful, got so terribly involved, that he determined to ask for a Government appointment, and failing that, to take his own life. He did fail, and after asking several persons what was the easiest mode of dying, invited some friends to dinner on New Year's Day, having supped the evening before at White's, where he played at whist until one o'clock in the morning. A fellow-member drinking to him a happy new year, "he clapped his hand strangely to his eyes." In the morning he sent for a lawyer and three witnesses, made his will with great deliberation, and then asked the lawyer if it would stand good though he were to shoot himself. The answer being yes, he said, "Pray stay while I step into the next room," and then, retiring, shot himself dead. According to Walpole, three brothers, members of White's, contracted a gambling debt of seventy thousand pounds, while Lord Foley's two sons had to borrow money to such an enormous extent, that the interest alone amounted to eighteen thousand pounds a year. The same vivacious chronicler of the manners of his times gives an almost incredible account of Fox's love of play and dissipation. In the debate on the Thirty-nine Articles, on February 6th, 1772, he spoke very indifferently, which, Walpole says, was not surprising under the circumstances. "He had sat up playing hazard at Almack's from Tuesday evening, the 4th, till five in the afternoon of the following day. An hour before he had won back twelve thousand pounds that he had lost, but by dinner-time, which was at five o'clock, when play ended, he had lost twelve thousand pounds. On the Thursday he spoke in the above debate; went to dinner at past eleven at night; from thence to White's, where he drank till seven the next morning; thence to Almack's, where he won six thousand pounds; and, between three and four in the afternoon, he set out for Newmarket. His brother Stephen lost eleven thousand pounds two nights after, and Charles ten thousand pounds more on the 13th; so that, in three nights, the three brothers, the eldest not twenty-five, lost thirty-two thousand pounds." Captain Gronow relates that, about this time, Lord Robert Spencer and General Fitzpatrick were allowed to keep a faro-bank at Brookes's, and that the former bagged, as his share of the proceeds, one hundred thousand pounds; after which he never again gambled. George Harley Drummond, the banker, only played once in his life, when he lost twenty thousand pounds to Brummell, and was obliged to retire from the firm. In the first half of the eighteenth century, ladies of title kept gambling-houses. An entry in the Journals of the House of Lords, dated the 29th of April, 1745, shows that Ladies Mornington and Cassilis claimed privilege of peerage in resisting certain peace-officers in doing their duty, "in suppressing the public gaming-houses kept by the said ladies"; but the claim was not allowed.

Betting also was indulged in at the clubs with as much frantic zest as play. Anything served as an excuse, and sometimes the occasion of the bets were so shocking that men of the least decency would have shrunk from associating them with any form of amusement. A man dropped down at the door of White's, and was carried into the house; immediately the betting harpies were staking large sums on the question whether he was dead or not; and when it was proposed to bleed him, those who had taken odds that life was extinct, protested against such a course, on the ground that it would affect the fairness of the bet. Bad as this was, there was a worse case still, for which Walpole is again the authority. If true—though one would fain believe it an invention—it is sufficient to leave a stain of murder on the very name of White's. A youth betted fifteen hundred pounds that a man could live twelve hours under water. He accordingly hired some poor wretch, probably in a most desperate plight, and sank him in a ship. Both ship and man disappeared, and were never heard of more. Walpole adds that these miscreants actually proposed to make the experiment a second time. It is a singular fact that Lord Mountford, whose suicide we have just related, betted Sir John Bland that Beau Nash would outlive Colley Cibber, and that both the persons, the subjects of the bet, survived the bettors, and that Bland, as well as Mountford, died by his own act.—All the Year Round.

Fashions.

CINDERELLA parties are now so universal that more attention is given to simple evening dress than ever before; and one or two manufacturers have turned their attention to this special branch of trade. "The Lancashire Witches Dress Fabric Manufacturing Company," in its very name suggests materials for fancy dresses—printed sateens, zephyrs, indigo and Turkey-red stripes, serges, costume-cloth, and cashmeres, all cheap and pretty. Good inventive powers to design the styles necessary are alone demanded in addition. There is quite a mania abroad for what ladies call scientific dressmaking. Some of these home masterpieces, which we have been permitted to inspect, seem to have run very unscientifically out of shape afterwards, owing to the wretched linings employed by ultra-economists. The Lancashire Witches linings are worth mentioning to these benighted beings who, in nautical language, "lose their ship for a ha'porth of tar." Many evening-dresses are made with short trains to fasten on to walking-skirts, and one sees a great number of these demi-toilettes at Cinderellas. Theoretically, all these loose trains are lined with silk, but practically the cost is prohibitive, and the Lancashire Witches sateen, which is light and close, without any stiffening, answers exceedingly well for the purpose. As there is economy in taking a quantity of any manufactured goods, the broché sateens, which are so pretty, will come in for next summer's wear.

COLOURED velveteens are in greater demand than ever for young people, and the beautiful shades of garnet, ruby, and geranium light up by candle-light brilliantly. Some pretty children's frocks of ordinary white flannel, trimmed with bows of bright ribbon, have brought about friendly relations in many nurseries, where the morning after a party was made penitential by the discovery of spots upon the best dresses. Now the flannel goes to the laundress, and there is a reign of peace and good-will. For parties of a more pretentious character than children's or calico balls, those for grown-up people showed tulle and very thin gauze as the most popular materials, but these are for those whose youthful feet require no rest, and who need not sit down. A wallflower cannot afford to indulge in such perishable fabrics.

THE waterfall back to tulle skirts is still popular, but with modifications. It brings us back to the days of the Second Empire in France when crinoline was in vogue. The Empress Eugénie wore neither steel nor horsehair to support her dress, but had thirty skirts of white tulle, one worn over the other, giving a beautiful cloudy effect. The waterfall backs of this season consist of a succession of tulle skirts, the lowest one the longest, and each one shorter, until the last is only about twelve inches long.

THE fronts of the dresses are also covered with tulle, dotted all over with chenille spots, artificial leaves, berries, little rosebuds, or glass beads. Large white globular beads, known as "dewdrops," are, very naturally, the horror of the dressmaker, because of the time demanded for sewing them on. As the thread cannot be taken from one dewdrop to the other, each bead is fastened separately by passing the needle and thread through it and the foundation, and tying the thread in secure knots. Chenille spots are really made of plush, cut out and gummed on. Leaves are attached in the same manner. To prevent the gum daubing the dress, each leaf must be washed over the back with gum and left to dry. It is thus made adhesive, like a postage-stamp, and affixed accordingly. To put tinsel upon a fairy's or other dress for a fancy-ball the same method is employed.

FOR evening dress the silk-embroidered ornaments are much used. They are now quite familiar to every one, being machine-made embroidery, cut out, and ready to be applied to the surface intended. These are sometimes seen upon the tulle waterfalls, and, it is almost needless to add, upon the fronts likewise of the skirts, as well as upon the bodices. A square-cut bodice has a puffing of tulle laid round as trimming, with a chain of embroidered flowers nestling in the tulle all round the square, or the pointed corsage.

OSTRICH-FEATHERS are no longer only within reach of the very wealthy since ostrich-farming has been taken up and carried out successfully by our Australian colonists. The very long and very costly feathers are still only to be had from the birds in a wild state. From those in captivity the shorter ones are obtained, and these are by no means expensive. Plumes of three short feathers are worn looping up evening-dresses; and since high shoulders came into fashion plumes can be placed at the top of the arm. Brides' dresses have for a long time required some novelty, some change from flowers only, and white ostrich plumes have been eagerly appropriated by the dressmakers.

BROCADE in every material, especially in silks, satins, and velvets, is as much a favourite as ever. The first price seems a little startling of a rich material, but by being used very plain a few yards go a long way in a dress. The plain tunic front when of brocade soon grew shabby from the strain upon it. To avoid this the front is made of straight breadths and half pleated, which is a new improvement on the old plain skirt. Take the centre breadth and make a broad box-quill in front, the centre being about twelve inches wide, and folding in only sufficient at the two sides of the pleat to conceal the seam which joins the next breadth. Leave a space plain of about six inches, and at each side arrange a second box-pleat half the width of that in front. This will bring the front almost to the back where the draperies meet it, so that the rest may be left plain. This triple box-pleated skirt is a tunic which is merely hemmed round the bottom, and falls over the under-skirt, round which the frilling or pleating which edges the skirt is sewed. The pleats are fastened to the waist-band at the top, and kept in place with a tape sewed at the back about half-way down, flowing loose the rest of the way. The effect of the skirt when finished is that of one large quill in front, and a small one at each side.

THE only novelty in dress-bodices is the panier-vest. A full vest commences at the throat, being gathered in at the centre of the bodice.

Instead of being gathered in and ending at the waist, it falls loosely down upon the skirt, the ends being turned under, and looped up to right or left side. Some of the panier-vests fall farther still, and are incorporated with the skirt draperies down at the knee. Fur vests are one of the most comfortable introductions of the winter, brown otter, seal, and squirrel being used, none of which are expensive furs, and but little is required for the front of a dress-bodice. That shoulder-capes will be worn for some time longer there is little doubt. Since the furriers found it possible to make the circular capes more closely fitting to the figure by having the sleeves quite a distinct feature, and inserting them high and slightly on the shoulder, the question seems to have settled itself. All kinds of substantial materials are also used, plush, velvet, brocade, and seal and astrachan cloths.

LADIES who delight in knitting and crochet, and at this season work up large quantities of wool, fleecy, double berlin, fingering, and the lighter kinds, have begun to make shoulder-capes for invalids and elderly people to wear in the house. People who are sensitive to cold often breakfast in their bedrooms because the sitting-rooms warm but slowly in this season. A crochet shoulder-cape has none of the deshabillé appearance characteristic of the shawl, and is equally easily laid aside when the occasion for its use has passed. For breakfasting in bed a shoulder-cape is delightful, but the mere circular does not maintain its position, the inserted sleeve being quite essential to comfort in wearing.

SMALL capes of fur which are not quite so large as a visite, have had the name of "Lesbos" given them. When made of seal they are elegant but costly muffles. The shape is that of a shawl, with points behind and before. At the waist behind it is drawn in with a thick seal cord, attached to the back, brought to the sides, and on to the front, fastening with the cord tied, the ends being finished with handsome pendants, balls of sealskin. A fringe of seal-tails, each one as thick as a leech, borders the Lesbos all round. The visite is comfortable, but not by any means graceful. It is a short dolman, reaching a little below the waist, large open sleeves falling over the arm and hand, lined with handsome plush or satin. Visites are made in sealskin, sable, otter, martin, skunk, astrachan, and bear-skin. Pale-brown bear, known as golden bear, is the revival of the old fur of which our grandmothers had gigantic muffins and very long round boas. Instead of boas, long flat ends are worn on a great many shoulder-capes, and are known as "stoles," the term being borrowed from ecclesiastical vestments to which they bear the very most distant resemblance, if it can be said that there is any. As it is rather unbecoming to some figures to have the cape cut straight across in front, showing the dress-bodice, the stole ends are a good compromise, and very suitable for matrons.

As we have already passed through the most severe months of the winter, those in which damp is most likely to be experienced, many of our fur capes, jackets, and trimmings are showing atmospheric influences, and, especially with bear-skin, the long hairs are becoming matted in bunches. The remedy is in having the fur combed frequently with a metal comb in front of the fire. The lady's-maid who knows her business will never allow her mistress's fur to have this matted appearance; but it is in the power of every lady to make her fur last twice as long in good condition by regular combing. A comb costs a few pence.

WHITE fichus seem to have become an absolute necessity for evening wear, but the vest form is the most useful, as it completely covers the front of a bodice. Lace drawn at the throat, and again at the waist. Soft silk, both white and coloured, is employed for these full vests, and the edge frilled round with cream lace, a double tucker of the same being added to the neck of the dress.

Sold!

A WELL-KNOWN San Francisco citizen now prowling, not to say growling, through Europe, writes the following touching experience:

I had been for about half an hour, sitting on the deck of one of the miserable little "packets" that ply between Dover and Calais, and exasperating my fellow-passengers by refusing to join in the carnival of sea-sickness going on around me, when a ruddy-faced, white-whiskered, bluff-looking individual who had been eyeing me for some time, stepped up and said:

"Beg pardon, I'm sure, but are you really the American?"

"The American!" I replied; "there are several, I believe."

"Oh, of course, to be sure. I meant the one on board. I saw 'George B. Blank, San Francisco, California, U.S.,' painted on some of the baggage, and I picked you out right away as the owner." And the stranger inspected me from head to foot with as vivid a curiosity as if I'd been a wild man of the woods.

"Well," I finally exclaimed, "I am an American. What can I do for you?"

"Why—er—nothing—that is—no offence, I hope, and you are a Californian, too?" he said, rubbing his hands as though he had indeed met a rara avis. "Ever scalped by the Indians?"

"I think not," I replied.

"You've scalped some of them, though, haven't you?" persisted my inquisitor.

Concluding that inasmuch as I was in for being made a side-show of, I might as well indulge in some of the circus poster sort of thing, I looked my questioner calmly in the eyes, and replied:

"Some twenty-six or seven, I forget which; I have the tally nicked in the handle of my other scalping-knife; I carry only one bowie in this country. So seldom one runs across any fun over here, you know."

"Killed many white men?" asked the stranger, who appeared to be actually quivering with excitement and curiosity.

"Only eight or ten," I replied carelessly. "You see, in California there is a sort of close season now for shooting white men. 'Tain't like the good old man-for-breakfast times. A fellow is only allowed to gun around promiscuous-like four months in the year. So it's hard work to keep one's hand in, don't you see."

"Well, I declare," said the apparently stupefied man with the chop-whiskers; "how about Chinamen?"

"Oh, we kill Chinamen all the year round—when they are fat," I explained. "But then there is lately some sort of an ordinance making it a misdemeanour to shoot a pigtail unless he is on the shady side of the street, or gets in your way. Folks are getting too particular over there, for a fact."

"Ever been divorced?" finally said the stranger, whose eyes were now sticking out like pegs on a hat-rack.

"Nine times, I think," I said. "In fact, I intended to have been again when I passed Chicago on my way over, but the train only stopped eleven minutes, and there wasn't time enough to rush it through—takes twenty-two minutes, you know."

I thought this had knocked him out, but after a few minutes' bewildered cogitation he returned to the charge once more.

"Is it really true that all Americans wear chest-protectors, and eat nothing but pie?"

"Well, you see, the fact is that Americans are, as you know, such a frightfully busy people that they haven't time to sit down and eat a square meal, like you English. They must have something portable—something they can carry about with them and nibble on the sly. I tell you, sir, it looks like business when you see forty or fifty men all hanging on a strap of a street-car with one hand and eating pie with the other."

"I should rather think so," murmured the stranger.

"As for the chest-protectors," I continued, "they are really nothing more than pockets suspended round the neck, and large enough to carry a whole pie, which it keeps warm at the same time. A good hot mince-pie stowed away in this manner not only imparts a gentle and grateful warmth to the entire system, but keeps a whole day's rations always within reach of the wearer. Grand idea, isn't it?"

"Well, I'm blessed!" said my paralysed interrogator, gazing at my childlike and ingenuous face with profound awe. "Would—er—would you oblige me with one of your cards?" he said. "I want to show it to my family, or they'll never believe a word of this—never. Thanks—here's mine."

As I stepped, chuckling, into my own compartment, I glanced at the card of the stranger. It read: "Julius K. Judkins, San Francisco, California."

I have spent about eight hours a day looking for that man ever since.

An Old-Fashioned Oracle.

WE have recently come across a most quaint and curious old book, bearing as its date of publication, the year 1754. In its yellow time-stained pages we find the queerest mixture possible of moral maxims, and bills of fare, dissertations on the benefits of learning, instructions in the arts of writing and "arithmetick," models of familiar letters, and (most interesting of all to the housewifely mind) elaborate instructions as to marketing, and many very curious old recipes for the making of certain dishes, whose very names take our thoughts back to the days of our great-grandmothers.

The title is not as short as it might be, but we give it in full, as it explains in a measure the motive and contents of the whole book. With queer long s's, a superabundance of capitals, and a pretty admixture of crimson lettering, the title runs thus: "Madam Johnson's Present: Or the best Instructions for Young Women, in Useful and Universal Knowledge, with a Summary of the late Marriage Act, and Instructions how to marry pursuant thereto."

On the same page are given eight several heads, specifying the various divisions of the book, and beneath them again, comes this naive little notice: "The Compiler, Madam Johnson, in order to make this Book come as cheap as Possible to the Purchasers, has out of her Benevolence fixed the Price at 1s. 6d., bound, though it contains double the Quantity that is usually sold for that Sum."

Even allowing that one shilling and sixpence meant a great deal more in 1754 than in 1884, we must yet admit that the amount of miscellaneous information contained in "Madam Johnson's Present" is wonderfully cheap at the price.

After disposing of the then new Marriage Act, which had been passed in March, 1754, Madam Johnson gives a most curious "Estimate of the Expenses of a Family, in the Middling Station of Life." As we read it, in this extravagant age, we cannot but compare it mentally with what must be the real expenses, in the present day, of a middle-class family, and we are struck by many odd items, such as "Cloaths of all kinds for the Master of the Family, £16; cloaths for the Wife (who cannot wear much, nor very fine laces), £16." Farther on we are told, "the Maid's Wages may be £4 10s." What would our modern cooks and housemaids, or even more modest general servants, say to that?

With regard to the return of hospitalities, Madam Johnson has evidently a frugal mind, for she only allows £4 a year, for "Entertainments in Return for such favours from Friends and Relations." In those days, when the Second George was king, no gentleman could shave himself, even in "the middling station," so, perhaps, it is not wonderful to find 7s. 6d. allowed for shaving, per quarter; but we fail to see why "Cleaning Shoes" should cost 10s. a year, unless the maid, with her wages of £4 10s., should consider herself too superior for such menial work.

"The Bills of Fare for all Times of the Year, and also for Extraordinary Occasions," read rather strangely to our modern notions; in fact, the names of some of the dishes would convey no impression whatever to the mind of a nineteenth century cook. We quote, with the spelling of a hundred and thirty years ago, a bill of fare, which is given "for a Gentleman's House, about Candlemas." It is divided into four courses, after this fashion: "First Course: Pottage with a Hen, a Chatham Pudding, a Fricassee of Chicks, a Leg of Mutton with Sallad. (Garnish your dishes with Barberries.) Second Course: A Chine of Mutton, a Chine of Veal, a Lark Pye, Two Pullets, one garnished with slices of Orange. Third Course: A Dish of Woodcocks, a couple of Rabbits, a Dish of Asparagus, Westphalia Hams. Fourth Course: Two Orange Tarts, one with Herbs, a Bacon Tart, an Apple Tart, a dish of Bon Chriten (bon chrétien?) Pears, a Dish of Pippins, a Dish of Pear-manes." Large indeed must have been the appetites of that gentleman's household, "about Candlemas."

The "Dissertation on the Benefits of Learning" is not so entirely out of date as are the bills of fare, but there is one comic little passage, in which Madam Johnson informs her readers that "The letter 'K,' at the end of a word, always requires the letter 'C' before it, as in Arithmetick, Logick, Rhetorick, but in adjectives ending in 'k,' such as tragic, comic, dramatick, it is now customary to throw the 'K' out, and write them tragic, comic, dramatic."

There are many hints which a housekeeper of the present day might do well to heed, in the "Instructions for the Judicious Choice of all Kinds of Provisions," but there is one piece of advice to which the modern buttermilk might possibly object. "Don't trust wholly to your Taste," says Madam Johnson, "when you go to buy Butter, but try in the Middle, and then you can't well be imposed on, if your Smell and Taste be both good."

Next follows "The Compleat Cook-Maid," in which there are some recipes which read as if they ought to taste deliciously, notably the cakes of all kinds, the biscuits, creams, and "divers sorts of jellies"; but there are certain other recipes, whereof the very names are exceedingly uninviting, and among the latter are "Hog's puddings with almonds" and the same delicacies, "with Currants," and a "cake-soup of veal-glue, to be portable in boxes."

One very odd concoction is solemnly entitled "A Gravy that is not expensive," and as we find among the chief ingredients, water, small beer, onions, pepper and salt, grated lemon-peel, walnut or mushroom liquor, butter, and flour, it may be safely predicted that this gravy will not only be cheap, but also nasty.

In the "Tarts of Divers Kinds," when two recipes are given, we are induced to try the second method rather than the first, by such an alluring heading as "To make these Tarts still in a more agreeable way," and it is curious to find in all the recipes where wine is used frequent mention of such drinks as Sack and Rhenish.

The recipes for creams of various sorts are very interesting, although the way of testing the heat, suggested by Madam Johnson, might offend some fastidious persons. Speaking of her Lemon Cream, she says: "When any scum arises, clear it off, and when 'tis as hot as you can just bear to put your fingers in it, pour it out into little glasses."

Cheesecakes are given in great variety, including those known as almond, saffron, "mackaroon," and lemon cheesecakes, but after these, we come to some dishes which are now quite obsolete, namely, "wigs" (which seem to have been very rich buns), "syllabubs," and "flummeries." Three separate recipes are given for the syllabubs, and three for the flummuries.

For the amusement of those of our readers who may chance to be at all curious as to the cookery of the last century, we subjoin verbatim two of these recipes.

"To Make Whipt Syllabubs.—Grate the peel of two lemons into a quart of the thickest and best cream you can get; add thereto half a pint of sack, and the juice of two Seville oranges, and half a pound of the best loaf-sugar. Pour your ingredients into a broad pan, or deep dish, and whisk them very well. Have in readiness by you, some red wine or sack, that has been sweetened to your palate, and put what quantity (more or less) as you think convenient, into your little glasses, then, as the froth rises from your whipping the other ingredients, take it off with a spoon, and put it gradually into your glasses till they are as full as they can well hold. Take notice. These syllabubs will not keep long, and therefore, make but little more than what you propose shall be eaten in a few days."

"To Make French Flummery.—Beat half an ounce of isinglass, very fine, and stir it into a quart of the thickest cream you can get; let it boil for about a quarter of an hour over a gentle fire, but take care to keep it stirring all the time. When you take it off the fire sweeten it with double-refined sugar to your taste, and add to it an equal quantity of rose and orange-flower water; a spoonful of each will be sufficient. Then strain it off, and pour it into basins or cups, or what you please; as soon as 'tis cold, turn it out on plates. This makes a very handsome side-dish. You may add wine, cream, or cyder to it, when you eat it, as you please, and sweeten it with loaf sugar to your palate. When you serve it up to table, lay baked pears all round your dish. Flummery thus made not only looks pretty, but eats very agreeably."

With an odd sort of ready-reckoner, entitled "Tables, ready cast-up," and a "serious exhortation to maid-servants in regard to the regulation of their conduct, with short prayers and hymns for their devotional exercise every day," Madam Johnson brings her book to an end, and we come back to our own times, from this glimpse of old-fashioned ways, keenly sensible of the contrast between an English-woman's notions in 1754, and our modern ideas of cookery and house-keeping.

Household Gardening.

WHENEVER the weather is mild, and the ground moderately dry, the planting of fruit and ornamental trees of all kinds, also Roses, with evergreens and deciduous shrubs, should be proceeded with, and if the work be done well they will be almost certain to flourish, provided the soil and position are favourable for their development.

Many persons who do not possess kitchen-gardens—that is, a plot of ground for the cultivation of the culinary products of the soil—regret that they have no means for growing fruit-trees, as a lawn and shrubbery borders occupy the whole space attached to their residences.

This is undoubtedly the case in thousands of instances, and especially in the environs of cities and towns, where, practically, all the ground is in front of the villas, or if at the back it is too limited to be turned to profitable account, hence it is preferred to have it attractive in appearance.

Very frequently the oblong enclosures attached to town and suburban residences are devoted chiefly to a lawn as the central portion, with or without flower-beds, the border all round, more or less wide, being occupied by shrubs and trees of an ornamental character, while we often find a row of standard Roses planted at intervals in the lawn near to and parallel with the walk that surrounds it. An arrangement of this kind where everything flourishes satisfactorily is usually very enjoyable.

FRUIT TREES ORNAMENTAL.

We wish to show, in the interests of those who covet a few fruit-trees and yet have no suitable place, as they think, for growing them, that they may regard not a few of them as ornamental trees, and hence plant them with evergreens and other shrubs for beautifying their borders. A few trees, which by their compact form, attractive flowers, and handsome fruit, are adapted to the purpose in question, may be usefully noted at this the right time for planting.

QUINCES.

A few weeks ago the various purposes to which this fruit is devoted, and several methods of preparing it, were published in this Journal. Since the appearance of that excellent article some persons will almost certainly be impressed with a desire to possess a Quince-tree, but scarcely know where to plant it. Let them plant one as an ornament wherever they have room for a tree of moderate growth.

Some persons there are, no doubt, who are not acquainted with the character and appearance of a Quince-tree, and a brief description of this tree will, therefore, not be unacceptable.

The Quince is closely allied to the Pear, to which it has some resemblance, in the form of the fruits especially, yet is abundantly distinct by their deep yellow or orange colour. The tree is also much dwarfer than the Pear, being of a bush-like habit, with slender branches more or less pendent. It is, in fact, rather a graceful tree, and decidedly ornamental.

The leaves are rounder than those of the Pear, and of a darker green above, but nearly white below. Thus, when moved by the wind, the sudden, almost dancing, alternations of colour have a singular effect.

The blossoms of the Quince are very bold and beautiful; they are larger than those of the Pear, and, being also later, have what those of the Pear have not—an ample setting of foliage, rendering the trees highly attractive.

The fruits are large, some of them nearly round, others pear-shaped, and when almost bearing down the branches in the autumn, have a very striking appearance. They have a strong peculiar odour—too powerful, indeed, to be agreeable to the majority of persons, yet by some enjoyed.

The Quince is not an indigenous tree, but is a native of the South of Europe; yet, according to Pliny, it found its way there from the island of Crete, and eventually became naturalised. It is, however, quite hardy in this country, but the fruit does not ripen well in cold northerly districts. It is extensively grown in the South of France, and the peasants prepare a marmalade from the fruit called colignac. In fact, the term "marmalade" is derived from the Portuguese name of the fruit—marmelo. The botanical name of the tree is Cydonia vulgaris.

Quince-trees grow well near towns, and are especially well adapted for moist soils; indeed, like willows, they appear quite at home by the sides of streams or watercourses; therefore, if there is a damp position in an orchard or shrubbery, where other trees do not grow satisfactorily, it may be well to try a Quince, which in all probability will flourish.

The best variety to plant, and that usually prepared in nurseries, is the Portuguese. Those who already possess a tree, and desire to raise more, may do so by inserting cuttings of the young wood in the open garden in autumn, making them eight inches long, and planting, in a slanting direction, six inches deep, and in twelve months they will be rooted. Young Quince-trees thus raised are largely used as foster-parents for Pears, which are grafted on them, and thus earlier-bearing trees and finer fruit are produced than on stocks that are raised from the kernels of Pears. Viewed in this respect, the Quince is a tree of considerable importance and very substantial value. Grown for its appearance and its own fruit alone, one or two trees will suffice for most gardens.

THE MEDLAR.

Like the Quince this is an ornamental tree, and quite worthy of a place in the shrubbery border. It is a compact moderate-sized tree, with large and rather rough leaves, more or less downy, and produces its conspicuous flowers freely towards midsummer.

The fruit is round or oblate, dark-green in colour, and varies in size from one to two inches in diameter. It, however, very rarely ripens on the tree, but has to be stored until incipient decay sets in. This is known as bletting. It has a texture and flavour peculiarly its own, and is much relished by many persons. The Medlar is regularly used as a dessert-fruit in the families of the affluent, and any person may have a supply who has room for a tree, for it will grow almost anywhere in moderately fertile soil. There are two varieties in cultivation, that known as the Dutch being the larger and more extensively grown, but the smaller Nottinghamshire Medlar is perhaps of better quality. Those who have room for two trees may plant one of each; if only space for one, perhaps the first-named will give the greatest satisfaction.

THE LOQUAT.

This, the Japanese Medlar, is far less common than the preceding, and can only be grown against walls in the southern counties of England, or under glass. It has very handsome dark-green ribbed foliage, much larger than that of the Laurel, and produces clusters of fruit like small apricot-coloured Tomatoes, but quite round and smooth. It has a rich vinous flavour, totally unlike that of any other fruit.

It is just a century since this tree, Eriobotrya japonica, was introduced from Japan to Paris; from thence it was sent to Kew, and was eventually distributed in gardens. Trained to a south wall or building it has a very distinguished appearance, and is always cherished by those who possess it, not for its fruit, which is not often produced there, but because of the comparative rarity of the plant and its bold fine evergreen foliage. Those who have a very warm position and desire something that is not common to train against a wall, may plant the Japanese Medlar or Loquat, procuring a small plant in a pot, and planting it towards the end of May. The other trees above referred to may be planted at any time before March, but the sooner they are placed in the ground the better.

We have some other ornamental fruit-trees to notice, but the small space at present at our command must be devoted to more tender plants.

GERANIUMS IN ROOMS AND CELLARS.

Thousands of the popular bedding plants which had made flower-beds bright last summer were taken up in November, placed in pots and boxes, and stored in dark or light places as room could be found for them. Some of these plants were cut quite down, leaving nothing but a few stumpy stems, while others were only lightly pruned, but had all the large leaves removed.

Such plants, if wintered safely and well managed, answer admirably for planting in beds and window-boxes another year.

If the soil in which the roots were placed has been kept moderately moist, fresh young shoots will now be springing from the stems. These will be white on those plants that have been kept in a dark place, and must be gradually removed to the light, so that the shoots will steadily assume a green colour; if left in the dark after they are an inch long, many of them will decay.

A few of the plants may have died, or portions of them. The former it is, of course, no use keeping longer, while the decayed portions of the latter should be at once cut off with a very sharp knife, dressing the wounds with a little powdered charcoal, or, tailing this, fresh lime; the plants may also, if the soil be dry, have a good watering, not wetting the stems, but thoroughly moistening the soil, as young roots will now be issuing from the old ones, and these must be kept fresh for the support of the growths. The leaves will then soon unfold and healthy plants be produced. The temperature of a dwelling-room or ordinary greenhouse will be quite sufficient for them, but care must be taken to prevent injury by sudden frosts reaching them through the glass.

Odds and Ends.

THE early patroness of Burns, Mrs. Dunlop, of Dunlop, had an old housekeeper, a sort of privileged person, who had certain aristocratic notions of the family dignity, that made her utterly astonished at the attentions that were paid by her mistress to a man in such low worldly estate as the rustic poet. In order to overcome her prejudice and surprise, her mistress persuaded her to peruse a MS. copy of "The Cotter's Saturday Night," which the poet had just then written. When Mrs. Dunlop enquired her opinion of the poem, she replied, with a quaint indifference: "Aweel, madam, that's vera weel." "Is that all you have to say in its favour?" asked the mistress. "Deed, madam," she returned, "the like o' you quality may see a vast in't; but I was aye used to the like o' all that the poet has written about in my ain father's house, and atweel I dinna ken how he could have described it only other gait." When Burns heard of the old woman's criticism, he remarked that it was one of the highest compliments he had ever received.

PRINCE KRAPOTKINE, while staying in Geneva, observed that wherever he went he was followed by a spy. His mind was soon made up as to his course of action, and upon the first opportunity that presented itself he walked up to this man and dealt him a whack on the side of the head that almost felled him. "Here, my friend," the Nihilist prince went on, putting a louis into his hand, "if you make any outcry this is the maximum amount that I shall be fined. You may as well have the money as the public treasury. Take it, and whenever you want a louis, come to me!"

A CLERGYMAN at Cambridge preached a sermon, which one of his audience commended. "Yes," said the gentleman to whom it was commended, "it was a good sermon, but he stole it." This was told to the preacher. He resented it, and asked the gentleman to retract what he had said. "I am not," replied the aggressor, "very apt to retract my words, but in this instance I will. I said you had stolen the sermon. I find I was wrong, for, on returning home and referring to the book whence I thought it was taken, I found it there."

THE story has been related of Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, that once, in his active political days, he attended a party caucus at which there was only one man present beside himself. He promptly elected the other man chairman, had himself appointed secretary, and then transacted all the business in hand; and when he made out the credentials of the delegates chosen, he wrote in them that the delegates were elected at a "large and respectable caucus"—"because," he explained to the chairman, "you are large, and I am respectable."

A SUBSCRIBER writes to an editor: "I have a horse that has lately suffered from periodical fits of dizziness. Please answer through your valuable paper, and let me know what I should do with him. I'm afraid he'll get worse if something is not done soon." The editor replies: "Our advice, based on a careful perusal of 'Every Man His Own Horse Doctor,' would be to take him some time when he is not dizzy and sell him to a stranger."

A STORY that is good enough to be true is going the rounds about Mark Twain and Sergeant Ballantine. Mark failed to answer a letter of the sergeant's, and after waiting a reasonable time, the latter was so exasperated at not receiving an answer, that he sent Twain a sheet of paper and a postage-stamp as a gentle reminder. Mr. Clemens wrote back on a post-card: "Paper and stamp received. Please send envelope."

AN ignorant but well-meaning individual, who for want of a better man had been appointed a magistrate in a rural district, declared on taking office that he should always endeavour to deal out justice without fear or favour. "In short," he said, in conclusion, "I will take care while I am on this bench to act neither partially nor impartially."

WHEN Judge Hale, who had been a fierce swashbuckler in his youth, sat in judgment upon one of his former boon-companions, he took advantage of the retirement of the jury to ask the culprit in the dock sundry questions touching their old associates. "They are all hanged, my lord," answered the knave, "except you and me."

A PATIENT called on a well-known physician. "What is your complaint?" asked the doctor. "I don't know exactly, but I don't feel well; the fact is, doctor, I work like an ox, I eat like a dog, and I sleep like a dormouse, and yet I am always ailing." Doctor, dryly: "If I were you, I would see a veterinary surgeon."

A GENTLEMAN in Brooklyn, celebrating the birth of a daughter on the day of the opening of the bridge, proposed to call her Victoria, in honour of the Queen's birthday, whereupon a friend suggested that a more appropriate name would be Bridget.

A LITTLE boy asked his mother to talk to him and say something funny. "How can I?" she exclaimed. "Don't you see I am busy baking these pies?" "Well, you might say, 'Charlie, won't you have a pie?'" That would be funny for you.

ONE of the difficulties of life—talking to a deaf person in an omnibus. One of the pleasures of life—taking off new boots and putting on old slippers. One of the rarities of life—a woman thoroughly satisfied with her daughter-in-law.

A MALICIOUS old bachelor says that there is a musical society in the next villa to his residence, which is thirty years old, and that "several young ladies have belonged to it ever since its commencement."

"THOSE birds flying over yonder are aquatic birds, I suppose?" asked the young man in the seal-brown suit of the captain of the steamer. "No, they ain't," was the scornful reply. "Them's ducks!"

"MY wife's sister in Ireland is dead, and she's wearing mourning, and she thought it'd be more appropriate like to use black tea for awhile now," wrote a sympathetic brother-in-law to his mother.

OLD Mrs. Pinaphor hopes that no more lives will be sacrificed in the hunt for the north pole until some persons go out there and ascertain whether such a pole really exists.

A MAN having bought a thousand cigars, was asked what he was carrying. "Tickets to a course of lectures to be given by my wife," he replied.

IN the "Life of James Nasmyth," the great engineer, there is a story which he heard from his father. A master tailor, in a country town, employed a number of workmen. They had been to see some tragic drama performed in a booth at the fair. While there, a very slow, doleful, but striking air was played, which so took the tailors' fancy that for some time after they might be heard slowly whistling or humming the mournful ditty, the movement of their needles keeping time with it. The result was that the clothes which should have been sent home on Saturday did not come until Wednesday, and young gentlemen who had intended to rouse the envy of their sex, and the admiration of the ladies, were compelled to postpone their triumphs. The music had done it; and so the master tailor, being something of a philosopher, sent his men to the play again, having previously arranged with the musicians that they should only hear quick, merry music. The result was that a lively tune took the place of the mournful air, and the tailors' needles moved with their former rapidity.

A CRITICAL observer makes this sensible remark: "A woman's glove is to her what a vest is to a man." Precisely when a man is agitated or perplexed he at once attacks his vest button, thus giving occasion for certain very expressive slang phrases. A woman's vest does not admit of this sort of "pulling down," but her glove is always a source of inspiration and a refuge from any embarrassment. She smooths on the fingers, rearranges the button, drags out the wrinkles, looks critically at the fit, and does a dozen little things with her gloves, that betray or allay nervousness and sustain the truth of the above quotation.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in speaking after Lord Hartington with regard to our foreign relations, made an admirable joke in the opening of his speech. He said that the great cataract of invective to which the Government had been exposed, and to which Lord Hartington had referred, reminded him of the criticism passed by a Yankee publican on Niagara, who, after attentively regarding for some time the mighty rush of waters, said it would be all very fine if it were not "for the poverty of the material."

MR. PEET, a rather diffident man, was unable to prevent himself being introduced one evening to a fascinating young lady, who, misunderstanding his name, constantly addressed him as Mr. Peters, much to the gentleman's distress. Finally summoning up courage, he bashfully, but earnestly remonstrated. "Oh, don't call me Peters—call me Peet." "Ah, but I don't know you well enough, Mr. Peters," said the young lady, blushing, as she playfully withdrew behind her fan.

ONE of the first recollections of Mary Somerville, the celebrated astronomer and mathematician, was of an evening when, as her little brother lay on the floor he suddenly jumped up, crying, "Oh, mamma! there's the moon running away," while every one hastened to the door to behold the fiery course of the celebrated meteor of 1783. The event may possibly have had something to do with the shaping of her career.

WINDOWS with sashes that draw up and come down are called guillotine windows by the French. Any man who has ever had one of these windows come down on his thumb will appreciate the happiness of the French name. But a man who has scalped himself by drawing in his head too suddenly against a descending frame will want the name changed to scalping-knife.

A COUNTRY paper contains the following curious instance of mis-punctuation: "Lord Palmerston then entered on his head, a white hat upon his feet, large and well-polished boots upon his brow, a dark cloud in his hand, his faithful walking-stick in his eye, a menacing glare saying nothing."

"I SEE you are taking an umbrella to school this morning," said a gentleman to a little girl on her way to school one rainy and windy morning. "Oh no, sir," sweetly responded she, as she clung to the handle and went scudding past; "it is taking me."

AN attorney, about to furnish a bill of costs, was requested by his client, a baker, "to make it as light as possible." "Ah!" replied the attorney, "that's what you may say to your foreman, but it's not the way I make my bread."

Audine.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

WHEN John Buckle was landlord of The George inn, in the village of X—, on the high-road between Canterbury and Sandwich, the old house did a roaring trade, not so much on account of its accommodation or excellent fare, which were probably not superior to what was offered by the rival establishment, The Bell, opposite, as for the personal qualities of John himself.

He was a type of a fast disappearing race of English bonifaces, big, burly, cheery, fond of sport, fond of good living, and, best of all, fond of his fellow-men. Guests at The George were sure of a hearty, unaffected welcome, of moderate charges, and of sound liquor, and many a traveller preferred to put up under its roof to going farther with the chance of faring worse.

But when poor old John died, and the new landlord took possession, the fortunes of the place seemed to a great extent to be wafted over the way. He was a surly, ill-tempered fellow named Martin Lock; one of those men who, much as self-interest and circumstances demand it, find it impossible to keep a civil tongue in their heads, who are distrustful and suspicious of everybody and everything, who seem to derive satisfaction from the knowledge that every man's hand is against them, and who most assiduously cultivate the science of successfully maintaining their own hands against everyone else's.

He was a stranger to X—, which in itself was a fact sufficient to nullify a large amount of whatever personal excellence he might have possessed—at least, it was so at the time of our story, some twenty years back, when our rustic population, in spite of the changes which were being rapidly wrought around it, still preserved its fondness for and its prejudice in favour of old names and old familiar institutions.

And he was not only a stranger to X—, but he was a mysterious stranger. None of the carriers or travellers knew him, his dialect was not of the country, and from the deep bronze colour of his evil face he was popularly and vaguely supposed to have come from "over the seas." At this period, the first madness of the Californian gold-fever was on the wane; the mother-country was crowded with big bearded fellows, who had gone out a few years previously as penniless outcasts and adventurers, and who had returned wealthy men.

So Martin Lock, who, as might be supposed, was pretty generally talked about, was put down as a retired gold-digger, although it was a mere surmise on the part of the more intelligent of the population, as he never opened his mouth about himself nor threw out a hint as to his antecedents.

That he was wealthy was beyond a doubt, and the fact of his being wealthy made it appear all the more mysterious that he should have chosen to settle down as an innkeeper in a retired Kentish village, instead of building himself a villa and cutting a dash with a well-dressed wife in a carriage and pair, as did such diggers who possessed the knack of sticking to their hard-earned gains.

So the custom of The George went over to The Bell at a rate which would have alarmed most landlords and brought down the thunder of their brewers on their heads, but which did not seem to affect Lock in the smallest degree. One fact alone prevented it from disappearing altogether.

To a small degree your rustic public-house frequenter, to a greater your carrier, and to the highest your bagman, have an eye to the circumstances surrounding the attention paid them. Hodge's beer tastes all the sweeter if it is drawn for him by a decent-looking girl or a smiling hostess, and he appreciates the distinction conferred to an extent greater than his boorish manner and animal appearance would warrant us in believing; the carrier, upon whose long, dreary daily or bi-weekly journeys the only sun that shines is the smile of the waitress at his favourite inn, looks forward to it as an event in his day; whilst the bagmen—well, all that need be said of them is, that they are terrible rogues amongst pretty faces.

Well, there was a very pretty girl at The George. She was not exactly a barmaid, nor was she a servant, yet her duties partook of the nature of both. Who she was remained as much a mystery as the identity of Lock. She had come with him to X—, and seemed to be the only human being who could make the slightest headway with him, although many a modern bar-lady would have tossed her head and have been out of the house long before at the way in which he occasionally treated her. Her name was Audine, and, had she been a plain-looking lass, she would have been probably known as Audine; but as she was bright-eyed and dark-haired, with a complexion like the peach, and a matchless figure, she was generally known and addressed as Miss Audine. Moreover, there was an air about her which savoured of something above the ordinary country ale-house barmaid, and this was noted by the rustics, who are keen observers of character and manners. She was quiet, rather reserved, and although she had a better right to flaunt her feathers, and put on frills, than any other girl on the road, there was not a trace of boldness or coquetry about her. She called Martin Lock uncle, and as his niece was accepted by X—.

Reserved and quiet as was Audine, it could not be expected that she should be suffered to flourish like a beautiful flower in the full sight of everyone, without causing a general desire to marry her. Half the young fellows in X— and the country round were openly in love with her, and the other half consumed their passion in secret. She received all sorts of mysterious missives and messages scrawled in every style of hieroglyphics the rustic fist could perpetrate, which epistles, when intercepted by her uncle, as they were frequently, were indignantly torn up and thrown into the fire; sheep's eyes were cast at her from all parts as she sat in The George pew on a Sunday, and upon one occasion when in coming from church she happened to drop her prayer-book, there was a most unseemly struggle amongst her admirers for the honour of picking it up. Even the bagmen, fresh with all the chaff and small-talk of the great metropolis, could make no impression upon her; she was always polite and smiling, and, without encouraging them in the least, she sent them away charmed, puzzled, and miserable.

One young fellow in the hardware line, not daring to propose to her straight off, had an interview with Martin Lock in his private parlour. Lock's answer was abrupt and decisive:

"Look here, I guess she's going to marry well, or she don't marry at all. She's a right to marry a gentleman, and she's got to. That's so."

A year passed, and yet Audine remained unmarried. Martin Lock, failing in his endeavour to find his ideal of a husband for Audine, looked about for a substitute. He pitched upon Ben Tyrrell, a farmer of about thirty-five years of age, who, although not such a stranger at X— as he was himself, was not a native of the soil, but hailed from Chilham or Chartham, or one of the villages the other side of Canterbury. Ben Tyrrell had long wooed Audine, and was a fine respectable fellow, such as any country wench would have jumped at for a husband. He was well educated, had seen something of the world outside the British Isles, and although he was said to have been a Jack-of-all-trades in his past life, he'd settled down and was now a prosperous farmer with as good a future before him as any English farmer could hope to have.

So it was arranged between the two men that Audine was to be Mrs. Tyrrell. Audine herself had no voice in the matter, and amongst the crowd of her admirers had failed to distinguish Ben, but she was a minor, and was in such duty bound to respect and obey her uncle's will, that Martin never questioned her adhesion to any proposal he might make. This new aspect of matters was soon made plain to the people of X—.

The landlord of The George did what he had never been known to do before—asked Ben frequently in to tea and supper, was a constant guest at the farm, drove out with him during closed hours on Sundays—Audine accompanying him in every case—and at times even assumed an appearance of joviality and good-humour—stern joviality and grim good-humour, it is true, but still an air very different to that which sat upon him ordinarily.

Yet Audine showed no signs of change in manner. People met her alone with the young farmer on early spring evenings, but they noted that she seemed listless and preoccupied, whilst he did all the talking.

She greeted him and spoke to him just as she greeted and spoke to other folk. People began by calling him a fool for not bringing matters to a definite conclusion, and ended by describing her as a haughty, overbearing girl, who did not know what was good for her.

Martin Lock saw all this too, and had words with her frequently upon the subject of her indifference. Then he told her, without any mincing of matters, that he had destined Ben Tyrrell to be her husband, and that she had better submit with the best grace possible.

He was utterly confounded when she gave him as answer that she did not love Ben Tyrrell, and that she would not marry any man she did not love.

Such extraordinary obstinacy on the part of a humble country damsel appeared inexplicable both to Martin Lock and to the inhabitants of X— generally, who were ignorant of the real state of affairs, which may be briefly summed up in the explanation that Audine's heart was already given away.

Audine, upon whose shoulders fell the principal burden of domestic work at The George, and the entire burden when Martin Lock was drunk, which was about three times a week, had business to attend to which took her out of doors, as well as business which kept her indoors.

Amongst other little duties was that which necessitated a daily journey to and from the farm which her uncle rented, for the purpose of bringing in fresh dairy-produce. The way to this farm was a pleasant one across the fields, and Audine looked forward to this daily walk as the brightest part of her day.

One typical April morning—a morning of sunshine and tears, of light and darkness—she was crossing the fields, her basket filled with butter, and eggs, and fresh greenstuff on her arm, unconsciously singing the old West Country rhymes about the cuckoo, beginning :

In the month of April
He opens his bill,

when there came up behind her a heavy black cloud, which, just as she had reached the most open and exposed part of her journey, sent down its contents in a pitiless shower. Audine was but lightly clad, and, with the thinnest of shoes on her feet, and a heavy basket on her arm, was fairly caught.

She started to run. Misfortunes never come singly, for she caught her foot in a root, fell, and sent the basket with its contents flying several paces ahead of her. To pick herself up was an easy and immediate matter, bruised and mud-stained as she was, but to collect and replace the eggs, and butter, and salad was more difficult, especially as the rain was coming down in sheets. So she did what most other little maidens would have done under similar circumstances, put her knuckles in her eyes and had a good cry, more from terror as to the reception she would meet with upon her arrival at the inn, than from grief at the catastrophe.

In this she was interrupted by the voice of a stranger :

"What a chapter of accidents ! I saw you going along, and I would have bet anybody what they liked that you wouldn't get across the field before the rain. Let me help you."

She looked up and saw a young man, light-suited, brown-faced, and bearded. She was about to decline all assistance, but his coat was off in a minute, and before she could recover her surprise and speak a word, was fastened around her shoulders. Such remnants of her load as were not irretrievably broken or disfigured he had replaced in the basket, which he slung over one arm, whilst he offered her the other.

Had any other young man in X—offered her his arm, a polite but firm refusal would have been the result, but in this case Audine—the impenetrable, cold, emotionless Audine—took it with a blush and a smile. Had she been asked why she took it she could not have answered. A judge of woman's nature would have said that the honest grey eyes, the open face, and perhaps, most of all, the low decisive tone of voice in which the few words were spoken had something to do with it.

Anyhow, here was a scene for her uncle or Ben Tyrrell to have witnessed—Audine tripping across wet fields, arm-in-arm with a stranger in his shirt-sleeves, she wearing that stranger's coat !

"Well," said her cavalier after they had proceeded some steps, "it doesn't look like an ordinary April shower. I vote we pull up under those trees there until it's over. In spite of the coat, you're getting awfully wet, and as for your feet—why," and he looked down at the little pair of shoes plashing through the dripping grass, "I don't think it's much good my offering you my boots, they'd be so big that you'd take in water at both ends."

At which Audine laughed as she had never laughed at anything said by a man before.

So he led her to a clump of trees, wherein, despite the rain, red-breasts, throats, blackbirds, and nightingales were singing their little souls out as they only can in April.

There was a silence for a few minutes as they stood beneath the trees. At length the young man said :

"I say, you don't mind telling me who you are, do you ? It seems so odd for us two to be standing here together and not to know anything about each other. I might be an ogre for all that you know."

"I don't think you're that," said Audine. "The ogres I've read about don't lend coats to wet girls. Besides, you don't look like one."

The accent and the voice in which this was said contrasted strangely with the dress of the speaker, which was rough and almost primitive, so her interlocutor looked at her.

She continued :

"My name's Audine."

"Audine ! What a pretty and strange name ! It isn't an English name. And what comes after Audine ?"

"Lock. I live at The George."

"At The George ! That's just my luck—I'm at The Bell. I was told to go there because people said that the landlord of The George was so rough and uncivil."

"He's my uncle," said Audine, looking with her dark eyes into the young man's face.

"Is he ? By Jove ! I'm awfully sorry for what I've said, then. I'm always putting my foot in it. But, of course, I didn't know it. Do you forgive me ?"

"Of course I do, sir," said Audine, blushing.

"Oh, don't call me 'sir,' I hate it, for I'm only a vagabond."

"A vagabond !" exclaimed Audine, looking at him with surprise, and, from her knowledge of vagabonds, doubtless thinking him a very superior one.

"Yes, I'm a vagabond. I'm an artist, and I'm stopping at The Bell ; but I shall, of course, change my quarters."

"And come to The George ?" said Audine, with more impulse than she could command.

"Yes ; then I'm going to Sandwich, and then I shall loaf about until my time's up, and I must return to the mill."

"To the mill ! But I thought you said you were an artist, sir ?"

"So I am, madam. Here's my book. Wingham, old Sessions House ; Charing Palace, church, old house ; Leeds Castle, Maidstone, Ightham, the Mote House, and so on. Some day they'll appear in colours, and perhaps will be sold, and perhaps not."

"But where's the mill you were speaking of, sir ?" asked Audine.

"Oh, the mill ! Poor innocent little rustic maiden ! The mill means where I work, and returning to the mill means returning to work."

"But artists don't work, do they ? I thought they did nothing but go about and paint trees and beautiful ladies, and wear long hair and smoke pipes."

"Artists don't work ! Don't they ? And as you've told me your name, I'll tell you mine—Cray, Roland Cray. But—but you must call me Roland, and—and I must call you Audine."

There was none of the impudence of the bar-swaggerer in the way this was said ; and if Audine looked as she had never looked before, it was because she felt as she never had felt before.

"And now the rain's stopped," he continued, "although so far as I'm concerned I wish it would go on all day."

"But I must get back," said Audine, "for I'm very late, and uncle never takes excuses."

"Very well, I'll go with you," said Roland.

"I—I think perhaps you'd better not," stammered Audine ; "people talk so here—that is, if you don't mind."

"Well, suppose they do, Audine," said the young man ; "better to talk of us than of half their petty gossip and scandal."

"Yes ; but they would make this gossip and scandal. I know them, perhaps, better than you do," said Audine.

"So they would, by Jove !" said Roland reflectively. "And I won't go. But I say, Audine, I shall change to The George."

"I think you had better not," she replied ; "I don't think you'd like it."

"Well, anyhow, I shall see you again, sha'n't I ?" said the young man. "Do you pass here regularly ?"

"Yes."

"At this time ?"

"Yes."

"And you won't mind if I do ?"

"No."

"All right then."

And for the first time in her life Audine bowed in response to the lifting of a gentleman's hat.

"There's something about her," said Roland Cray to himself, as he watched Audine's active form cross the stile and take the road to the village, "that fetches me. She doesn't look a bit like the girls hereabouts. By Jove ! if she were dressed up wouldn't she take the shine out of a lot of the ladies who come to the mother's house at Stratford Place ! Let's see. It was ten minutes to eight when I met her. It's now ten minutes past. And twenty minutes has done what twenty years haven't been able to do. I suppose I'm making an ass of myself. I can't hope to marry her, at least not with the consent of the mother, who'd as soon I'd marry a Turk as a barmaid. Heigho !"

And he strode back across the fields, murmuring the music of the name Audine.

Every day they met, every day Roland Cray's expedition to Sandwich was put off, every day the links which bound him to Audine were strengthened. Audine, who had been crushed under the sway of a tyrannical relation almost all her life, expanded in the sunshine of a man's genuine admiration and love, and came out in all her true nature. And just as she was the first woman who had ever made a genuine impression upon the young artist's heart, so was he the only man in whose person and character she could see anything like an ideal—for, rustic maiden as she was, she had formed an ideal, not from gossip or books, but from simple reflection about what ought to constitute a good man.

Meanwhile, it was not likely that these daily meetings could pass unnoticed in X—. Ben Tyrrell saw them together more than once, Martin Lock knew of it, took the trouble to find out who and what Mr. Cray was, and was satisfied. Ben Tyrrell raged, and resolved to bring matters to a conclusion one way or the other, without any further delay.

So one afternoon, when the bar was more than usually deserted, he said to Audine :

"Miss Audine, I think you are acting very cruelly and unjustly towards me."

"How?" asked Audine in surprise.

"You know that I love you, far above any one else in the world, and you know who I am and what I am, and what you'd be if you—if you were my wife," replied Ben. "And I do take it mainly to heart when I see you a goin' about with that young stranger there at The Bell. Mebbe he's a gentleman, I don't say he ain't, but I ain't knocked about the world for the best part o' thirty years without knowin' something about gentlemen and their goings-on, specially with young girls."

"I don't understand you, Mr. Tyrrell," said Audine, rather frightened at the earnestness with which her suitor spoke. "I—I really don't know what you mean."

"In course you don't, or you wouldn't be a doin' what you are," said Ben. "You think he loves you, don't you?"

"I know he does," replied Audine quietly.

"You think it's nat'ral like for a young gentleman to go and fall in love and ruin himself for life in ten days?"

"Ruin himself for life! What do you mean, Mr. Tyrrell?"

"What do I mean, Miss Audine? This is what I mean. That young chap's got rich friends, and he lives in a big house up in Lunnun, and he knows all sorts o' fine folk, and do you think he's a goin' to cut himself away from all that just to marry a country bar lass? For, Miss Audine, I love and I respect you, but that's all you are."

"A gentleman wouldn't look me in the face and tell me one thing if he meant another," said Audine.

"No, a gentleman wouldn't, Miss Audine, but mebbe you've heard on the wolf in sheep's clothing?" said Ben; "and nine out o' ten of these gentlemen are nowt but wolves in sheep's clothes. He says he loves you, and means what he says—for a bit; then when the fun gets a bit stale he'll be off."

"He won't!" exclaimed Audine, roused from her usual calm by Ben's words. "Ro—I mean Mr. Cray, is a gentleman, I know he is, and I love him."

"And you don't care a pin for me—that's it, ain't it?" said Ben, half sadly, half savagely. "'Cos I've got corduroys, and he's got tweeds; 'cos I smoke two inches o' clay, and he smokes paper cigars; 'cos I ain't got the gift o' the gab, and he can talk by the yard; 'cos I ain't handsome, and he is. Curse him! that's what done it!"

"No, it is not, Mr. Tyrrell," said Audine; "if he was ever so ugly I should love him all the same."

Ben made no reply, but stood doggedly striking a knot in the floor with his stick.

"I think you'd better take me, Miss Audine," he said presently, "or else—"

"Are you threatening anything, Mr. Tyrrell?" asked Audine.

"No, no, not yet," he answered.

"What do you mean—not yet?" she said.

"Not unless I am obliged—"

"But do you think I should accept you even if you were obliged?"

"I know you would."

"Then I would not, Mr. Tyrrell, for I am engaged."

Ben looked up, gave a low whistle, and went out.

That evening he came to the inn, and, acting upon his privilege, walked behind the bar to Martin Lock's little sanctum. Martin was smoking before the fire, a glass of toddy at his elbow, and nodded coldly as Ben entered.

"Come to talk about Audine," said Ben.

"Talk away," said Martin.

"Can't make no impression upon her," said Ben.

"Ain't surprised at it," said Martin.

"Ain't surprised at it!" repeated Ben. "You ain't surprised at me not bein' able to make no impression on her? Why, you don't mean to say you—"

A horrible suspicion crossed his mind that Audine's uncle had gone over to the stranger.

"Well, I've got to marry her," said Ben.

"So you have. Many folks has got to do things they don't do," said Martin immovably.

"But I must," said Ben, his temper rising.

"Must's a queer word, Ben Tyrrell," said Martin, looking at him for the first time.

"Yes, and it's a ugly word for some folk," said Ben musingly.

The eyes of the two men met. There was the faintest possible appearance of uneasiness in those of the landlord.

"What do you mean?" he said at length.

"What I say," replied Ben: "Audine's got to be my wife, and you've got to help me."

"She's engaged to the young artist."

"Don't care—she's as good as engaged to me by you."

"That's a lie."

"It isn't. Look here! are you going to help me to get her?"

"No, I ain't. Get her yourself."

A strange expression came across the face of Ben Tyrrell—an expression which was only there when he was thoroughly put out and roused.

He rose quietly, took up his hat and stick, and said :

"I give you till to-morrow morning, John Wildie."

The pipe fell from the landlord's mouth, his face turned deadly pale, his teeth chattered; for a moment he seemed paralysed, then he jumped up and hastened to the door. Ben Tyrrell had gone.

"John Wildie!" he hissed to himself. "How did he know that name!"

CHAPTER II.

"How did he know that name?" Martin Lock continued to repeat to himself as he slammed the door of his sanctum, poured himself out a stiff glass of spirits, and threw himself into a chair.

"I don't know him; I never set eyes on him before, that I can remember. Is it likely he knows—?"

His train of thought was interrupted by the entrance of Audine. She sat down at the little table and opened her workbox.

"Never mind that, lass," said Martin in an unusually dulcet tone; "I want to talk with you."

Audine shut the workbox, and drew her chair nearer to that of her uncle.

"You're engaged to Mr. Cray, aren't you?" he began.

"Yes, uncle," replied Audine.

"Yes," continued Lock reflectively, and then, looking up suddenly he said: "You must break it off."

"Break it off, uncle!" exclaimed Audine; "I cannot—see, here is the betrothal-ring."

"Take it off and throw it in the fire," said Martin coldly. "Look here, where would you have been without me?—what would you have been?—either dead, or worse than dead, I guess. Very well, then, in return for what I've done for you, I ask you—nay, I command you, to marry Ben Tyrrell."

Audine was silent, but her lips were quivering. Martin continued:

"He's a good fellow, and he'll make you a good husband. He's well off, and I'm well off. Between the two you'll be able to live like a lady."

Still Audine was silent, but a tear trickled down her cheek. Martin went on:

"It's of the greatest importance to me that you should marry him. Do you know what ruin and disgrace mean? In course you don't. Well, ruin means being turned out of house and home; disgrace means—well, never mind exactly what it means, but in my case it means the very worst that can happen to a man."

"Uncle!" sobbed Audine.

"Yes," resumed her uncle, "and all that'll happen, you can bet your bottom dollar on't, if you don't chuck away that ring and say you'll marry Ben Tyrrell."

"I can't, uncle—I can't," said Audine in a scarcely audible voice. "I do not love, and I never could love Mr. Tyrrell. Would you have me swear in the church that I would love and honour him, and all the time be telling a lie? Uncle, I love you, and I would do anything for you—anything but that. Let me go away, so that nobody need know anything about me. Then you could not come to ruin and disgrace."

"I can only get out of it by your marrying Ben Tyrrell," said Martin; "if you go away, whether to marry or not, I'm bound to be ruined and disgraced. Audine, you must marry Ben Tyrrell."

"Uncle, I will not," said Audine, and left the room.

"Curse you, you shall!" muttered Martin,

He half maddened himself with drink that night, and saw Audine no more.

The next morning Audine started on her walk to the farm as usual. She was surprised to find Roland waiting for her at the stile, his knapsack on his back, and his stout walking-stick in his hand.

"You are not going away, Roland?" she said in a faltering voice.

"Only to Sandwich, sweetheart," he replied. "I've been putting off my visit there for so long, thanks to you, you little puss, that unless I make up my mind at once and start, I shall never get there."

"But you are coming back?" said Audine, as she linked her two hands over his arm.

"Of course I am," replied Roland, laughing. "Why, you are surely not learning to be distrustful already? I shall be back to-morrow, or the day after at the latest."

"To-morrow! the day after!" sighed Audine; "that seems like never, and I have so much to tell you. I am so unhappy."

"Unhappy, dearest!—why?" said Roland. "Tell me everything, as you ought to, for we are betrothed, Audine, and there should be no secrets between us."

So Audine told him all that had taken place upon the preceding day between her and Ben Tyrrell, and between her and Martin Lock.

When she had finished, Roland said:

"Never you mind, darling, they're only telling you all this to frighten you. At least the man Tyrrell is, but I thought your uncle was in our favour."

"So he was, until last night," said Audine, "and then he was quite different. I don't know why it is, but I feel as if something was going to happen—something dreadful, I mean, and much more now that you are going away. You know, Roland, I have nobody but you to care for me, or to advise me, or protect me."

"Oh, send all these little fears out of your pretty head," said Roland. "Just think a moment. How can your uncle be ruined and disgraced by your not marrying Tyrrell?"

"I don't know, Roland," replied Audine. "I'm only a country girl, and I can't understand men's business."

"Well then, depend upon it it's nothing but a plot of theirs," said Roland. "Your uncle's beginning to fight shy of your acquaintance with me. He probably thinks I'm doing what too many fellows do—carry on with a girl, and then when they've amused themselves enough, throw her over and break her heart. But I'm not that sort, Audine, and you don't think I am, do you?"

"No, Roland," answered Audine. "You are the only man I ever loved or ever could love, and I would take your word against the oath of the world."

"That's right," said Roland, kissing her; "and now that you believe me in general things so far, believe in me in this particular thing, and don't think about it any more. When I come back I'll have a talk with Mr. Lock, and if I don't bring him round to our cause I should be a bigger fool than I think I am. And now here you are at the farm-gate, and I strike right away over there, so good-bye, my darling; if I don't come back to-morrow you shall have a letter."

With one long embrace he left her, and she watched him growing smaller and smaller in the distance, as his swinging stride carried him in the direction of Sandwich. Then her heart sank, and she felt utterly desolate.

When she reached the inn, her uncle and Ben Tyrrell were in close conversation in the bar-parlour. They looked significantly at her, she thought, and ceased talking. Then her uncle, turning to her with the nearest approach to a winning smile that he could assume, said:

"Audine, Ben and I reckon we'll have an afternoon's pleasuring in the fine weather, so after dinner you can look spry and have the house shut up; and we'll take the yellow gig and go to Richborough. A little fresh air won't do you no harm, and as you ain't ne'er seen the old place, I guess you'll like to go with us."

If it was only for the sake of being anywhere near Roland, and for the chance of seeing him, Audine would have jumped with joy at the prospect, and so readily assented. Richborough she knew was near Sandwich, and Roland would be pretty sure to tramp over to the old Roman fortress for a bit to sketch.

The very politeness and urbanity of Martin Lock would have aroused suspicions in the mind of a girl better versed in the ways of the world in general, and of men in particular, but to guileless Audine it was an omen full of joy and happiness. They had yielded to her, and had planned this trip on purpose to give her the pleasure of being near Roland.

Yet how could they have known that he was in Sandwich? Audine was not much in the habit of putting any two and two together except in the matter of giving change to customers, or she would have thought of this.

Roland Cray was sitting that evening in the commercial-room of the Cinque Ports Arms at Sandwich. His feet were on the fender, his pipe was in his mouth, and although ostensibly he was engaged in perusing the Kentish Mercury of the week before last, his thoughts were in the meadows with Audine.

Making all allowance for her innocence and simplicity, the more he thought over what she had said to him, the more he became suspicious that, after all, there might be some serious cause for her fears. If Ben Tyrrell had actually threatened Martin Lock with ruin and disgrace, he must know something about him which neither Audine nor the rest of the world knew, and this something must be important, or the landlord of The George would not have veered round so suddenly in his attitude towards himself and Audine. Roland knew, too, that there was a mystery about Martin's Lock's past life; but the world, after all, is a very small one, he thought, and very few mysteries remain unsolved until the end of time. He rather regretted that he had left the girl in such a state of mind and under such circumstances, and, although the evening was far advanced, had half made up his mind to start immediately back to X—, when a visitor entered the room.

"Hullo, Liscombe!" exclaimed Roland, as he rose to meet a young man of about his own age. "Why, who would have thought of meeting you at such an out-of-the-way corner of the earth?"

"Well," said his visitor, "I might say the same of you, old fellow."

"No; I'm an artist, and it's part of an artist's business to be out of the way, just as it's all a lawyer's business to be in the way as much as possible," returned Roland, laughing.

"I'm here on business," said Liscombe.

"So am I," said Roland; "and now, as we haven't met since our Swiss walk, make yourself comfortable, and we'll have a talk about old times. It's quite a godsend to meet with an acquaintance. You see I'm reduced to read the week before last's Mercury, but it's quite as amusing as half the twaddle which is sent up with our toast and eggs in London."

So the two young men drew their chairs together round the fire—for, although April, it was an English April—and were soon running over old ground again, re-telling old stories, laughing at old jokes, with all the enjoyment of long-separated friends.

"You haven't been idle, I see, Cray," said Liscombe as he turned over the pages of Roland's sketch-book. "I suppose swell London will be going into raptures over some of these 'bits' when they are duly invested with their garb of paint, and deck the walls of Burlington House. That's a pretty bit—'Old Grammar-School, from the Meadows.' Sandwich is awfully like the old Dutch towns on the shores of the Zuyder Zee. But I see you haven't confined your efforts to still nature. What's this? 'Study for Amaryllis.' Pretty face, by Jove! And again, 'Amaryllis in Sunshine'; and yet again, 'Amaryllis in Cloud.' Is this a pictorial Amaryllis, or is there such a one knocking about here? If so, she must be a solitary exception to the general rule of East Kent beauty."

And looking up he saw that Roland was blushing.

"Oh, you wicked old rascal," he said; "you're here on business, are you? I see it all. Artless rustia beauty, cherry lips, black eyes, raven tresses, and all that. Enter to her, susceptible young Londoner, wooing study in the fields, sun going down behind the old tower, etc., etc. By Jove! Cray, I believe my chaff is true."

"So it is," said Roland, "perfectly true. She is a pretty girl, I can tell you, and she's every bit as good as she is pretty."

"And are you really and seriously smitten, or is it just a passing fancy which will fade as soon as she's out of sight?" asked Liscombe.

"I'm betrothed to her, old fellow," said Roland gravely.

"Betrothed!" exclaimed his friend. "And what will mamma at Stratford Place say, and your sisters, and cousins, and aunts, with crests, and pedigrees, and swell carriages?"

"Don't know," replied Roland; "haven't told them."

"But who is she?" asked Liscombe, "if it isn't a rude question."

"Well, old fellow," replied Roland, "I know you, or I wouldn't tell you, and I can depend upon you for keeping it dark. She's the niece of an innkeeper at X—, about ten miles from here; but, mind you, she's no more like an ordinary rustic bar wench, much less a London buffet lady, than I am to Hercules."

"Bad simile," said Liscombe; "for in making things square at home you'll have a labour as great as any of those undertaken by that muscular pagan. And is her name really Amaryllis?"

"Is it likely?" said Roland. "Rustic folk don't christen their babies Amaryllis, or Chloe, or Phyllis, nowadays; no, but her name's just as uncommon. I'll bet you a new hat you don't guess it."

"Done," said Liscombe; "my business brings me in connection with as curious a name as I ever heard. What do you say to Audine?"

Had a bombshell exploded in the room, Roland could scarcely have been more surprised.

"Yes, yes," he said, "that's it; how by all that's wonderful did you know it?"

"Guessed it—that's a new hat for me," said Liscombe; "but I say, old fellow, joking apart, this is a much more extraordinary business than you think it is. I've astonished you by fixing straight off on the name of your lady-love, but as you've confided your business to me, I'll confide mine to you, and if that doesn't astonish you still more, I'll forego the new hat. But it's dry work talking, and as you haven't had the decency to ask me what I'll take, I'll ask you—what's it to be?"

"Beer," said Roland; "I never drink anything but beer, especially when I'm on the tramp in country districts where the spirits are poison and the wine certain disease."

So two tankards of beer were brought—tankards of famous Sandwich ale, than which there is no better drink in England; the young men re-lit their pipes, and Liscombe began:

"About twenty years ago a rich middle-aged man named Charlton went out to 'Frisco, gold-prospecting on behalf of an English company of which he was a director; when at 'Frisco he fell in love with an American girl, and married her. By the union there was a child, but in giving birth to it the mother died. Charlton went on to the gold districts, taking the child with him. He got as far as Red Gulch Camp, Calaveras County, and then he disappeared, and nothing has been heard either of him or his child since. The name of that child was Audine."

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Roland; "then perhaps——"

"Wait a bit," said Liscombe. "Well, Charlton, as I have said, was very rich, and hadn't a relation in the world but this child, Audine, and by his will, which had been deposited with my father's firm, as his solicitors, all his property was left, in a codicil sent home from 'Frisco, to this child. But nobody knew what had become of her. All enquiries both at home and in California failed to bring any information; we advertised in the papers, and had no replies. Meanwhile the property—all invested money—was kicking about without an owner. By the merest chance in the world, one of our clerks, whose friends live somewhere down Canterbury way, heard that there was a very pretty girl at one of the inns on the Sandwich road, named Audine, that she passed as the niece of a man named Martin Lock, and that no one knew who he was, or where he had come from, although it was said that he had been a miner. Well, of course, this wasn't much of a clue, but I was sent to find out all I could, as a lot of 'next-of-kin' claims were being sent in for the property of old Charlton, and here I am."

"Well," said Roland, "it's a most extraordinary affair, and it is still more extraordinary that you should have tumbled across the man of all men best qualified to help you in the person of an old chum. Look here, what time is it? Half-past eight. I've already had half a mind to walk back to X—to-night, I vote we do so, and clinch the matter, if there is a matter, at once. It's a fine night, and I'm a little anxious about something."

"Very well," said Liscombe, "I'm your man."

So in a few minutes the young men were on the high-road going towards X. It was a beautiful night; the moon shone brightly and lighted up the road in front of them as though it were snow covered; trees and bushes stood out carved into a black relief of fantastic and picturesque shapes against the deep-blue sky; there was but little breeze, the countryside was silent and desolate, and the voices of the two friends rang out clear and distinct in the still air. There was a touch of romance about their errand and the surrounding scene which gave the pedestrians a zest for their expedition, so they stepped smartly out and fully intended to cover the ten miles between Sandwich and X—in two hours and a half, bringing them to the inn just about closing time.

They had proceeded perhaps a couple of miles when they heard the sound of wheels rapidly approaching, and the clatter of hoofs moving at a furious pace, from the direction of Sandwich. Turning round they beheld yet some way behind them the black outline of a gig with figures in it, swaying violently to and fro, and as it drew nearer, the loud shrieks of a woman were distinctly heard.

The young men had scarcely time to consider what to do when the vehicle came tearing along towards them.

"By Jove! it's Audine!" cried Roland.

The horse, startled at the sudden appearance of two figures in the middle of the moonlit road, made a violent swerve to one side, there was a hideous crash, as the gig was hurled over on to the hedge, a momentary appearance of black figures in mid-air, then the horse, with the shafts clattering behind him, thundered down the road, past the two young men, who were rushing towards the overturned gig—and silence, broken only by occasional moans.

It was but the work of a few minutes for Roland and Liscombe to extricate from the shattered remains of the gig the senseless, bleeding figure of Audine; in a furrow some feet off lay the body of a man. Roland went to it, and recognised Ben Tyrrell. He was quite unconscious, although living.

"There's been some villainy here," said Roland, as they lifted Audine to an improvised couch made from the cushions and rug of the gig; "the poor girl had a foreboding of something wrong when I left her this morning, but I laughed at it."

Whilst Roland remained with the sufferers, Liscombe ran back to Sandwich for help. Whilst he was gone Tyrrell recovered. His first words were, after he had sat up and gazed about him as a man in a dream:

"Where's that villain?"

"What villain?" asked Roland.

"Martin Lock, alias John Wildie," replied Tyrrell. "He was with us five minutes back. I hope his neck isn't broken, for it will cheat the hangman of a job. And poor Audine! Ah, she's there! that's right, I'm main glad of that. It's you, is it, Mr. Cray; well, I've got something to tell you when I'm able. Haven't got a drop o' brandy, have you? I'm pretty bad, I am, but if I was half as bad as that villain who calls himself the poor girl's uncle, I should wish my own neck broken. Is he anywhere about? Do have a look for him, Mr. Cray—we're all right here—as it's very important as how Martin Lock—no, no, I mean John Wildie—should be got."

Tyrrell was in too helpless a state to attempt an escape, so Roland searched the neighbourhood of the accident for Martin Lock, but without success.

Meanwhile Liscombe had arrived with a trap from Sandwich; Tyrrell and Audine were placed in it, and they went back at a gentle pace to the Cinque Ports Arms.

A doctor who was called said that in Audine's case no bones were broken, but that she was severely contused, and, as she was wandering in her speech, might be suffering from slight concussion of the brain.

Tyrrell, who had fallen soft, had merely sprained his ankle, and refused to go to bed before he had told what he wanted to divulge. So he was carried into the commercial-room, given a stiff glass of brandy-and-water, and spoke as follows:

"Mr. Cray, you think a lot that's bad of me, but I never was bad until this day. You know, in course, that I love Miss Audine, and you know that I knowed that you loved her. Well, I was gettin' desperate, 'specially when I heard that she was engaged to you, and when I saw that John Wildie was all for you and turned agin me. So says I to myself, 'I'll tell him'—that's Martin Lock, as he calls himself—'I'll tell him what I knows about him, and I'll make him give me Miss Audine for a wife.' So I tells him——"

"Yes, yes," said Roland and Liscombe together, "and what was it?"

"Well, it was just this," continued Tyrrell. "Twenty years agone I was out at the diggings in California. I was only a lad of fifteen then, but I remember it all jes' as if it wur yesterday. I was at Red Gulch Camp, Calaveras County, me and a lot of other young fellows what had stowed ourselves away, and him that calls himself Martin Lock was a digger of the name of John Wildie, and a precious rough lot he wur, I guess, didn't think no more o' bowiein' or gouglin' another man than I do of drinking this 'ere. Well, there came a gentleman there a prospectin', his name wur Charlton, and he had a little kid along on him, which her name was Audine. He was powerful rich he was, and slung the dollars around like ha'pence. Well, one day he wasn't to be found, no more wasn't his little kid, no more wasn't his purse nor his portmanteau, no more wasn't John Wildie. Arter a week we come across the poor old gentleman at the bottom of a canon, terribly mauled about, as if he'd had a fight for life. The boys didn't think no more about it, for you see, gentlemen, in '47, killin' one another was a everyday game with 'em, but I couldn't help it, I was young and green, an' I never forgot it. Then I comes on John Wildie here. Twenty year didn't make no difference, I remembered him. Well, about to-day, gentlemen. I was desperate, as I said afore, and I goes in to John Wildie last night, and I tells him that I know him, and that he must let me have Miss Audine."

"This mornin' I sees him again, and he says, 'O. K., we'll fix it.' So we arranges to take the gig with Miss Audine, as if for a outin', but really for me to get away with her and marry her. He takes with him a big stick. Says I, 'What for?' Says he, 'In case o' accidents,' and smiles ugly. We starts with poor innocent Miss Audine, all laughin' at the notion of a drive in the fine weather, and we gets into the country, and we has tea all pleasant like at Ash—leastaways we has tea, Wildie he sticks to brandy—and we starts for Sandwich. John Wildie, he wasn't exactly drunk, but very near it, and just as it was gettin' dark he jumps up and says:

"'Tyrrell, you ain't goin' to have Audine.' I riles up at this, and we has a long argument, all the time the gig was standin' still, and Bay Jack the pony eatin' out of the hedge. Then he ups with his stick and tries to bring it down on my head. He meant murder, I see'd that, but I was too quick, and we begins to struggle, and poor Miss Audine she begins to cry, and altogether we made such a noise that Bay Jack got frightened, and started off with the bit between his teeth for home. Then John Wildie, who was goin' on like a madman, got chucked out, and then there we was, for there wasn't no holdin' Bay Jack—and you know all the rest, gentlemen."

That Martin Lock's a murderer, gentlemen, and if he's to be found I can prove it against him."

Such was the mystery about the landlord of The George inn, and such was the chain of events which brought Audine and Roland Cray together without a dread of separation. All search for John Wildie, alias Martin Lock, was in vain, and he was never heard of in person again, although the story connected with him afforded food for gossip and comment in all the countryside round X— for many a year after.

Audine's surprise at what had happened may be imagined, but it was still greater when a formal letter arrived, some weeks later, from Messrs. Liscombe and Liscombe, informing her of her great good fortune.

Roland Cray made her his wife quietly in the little village church of X—; Ben Tyrrell was his best man, and Liscombe gave her away.

Stratford Place was at first a little sceptical as to the genuineness of the dénouement, but thawed as Mrs. Roland Cray proved herself to be as good and as devoted a wife as she had been true sweetheart in the days when she was but the country-inn barmaid, Audine.

Dead Love.

NAY, 'tis no good; he died but yesternight,
And as the shadows fell across the sun,
And all the hills lay radiant 'neath its light,
His course was run;
Folded his weary hands and sank to rest,
Pale hands upon a pale storm-wearied breast.
His work was done.

I sat beside, and as he breathed his last,
Methought I was not as when we two met,
Before my first bright days were scarcely past;
Can I forget
How beautiful Love looked that long dead morn,
Whereon my heart and he alike were born?
Not yet, not yet!

Would he and I had never, never strayed
Among his roses—roses white or red!
Would that before that day I had been laid
One with the dead!
Nothing to suffer, nothing much to know.
A spotless life-page, pure and cold as snow,
No tears to shed.

He cannot live again; once love is gone
He may not rise from out his prison tomb.
He dying, passes, though life floweth on,
Beyond the gloom;
He knows no resurrection, comes no more
From that mysterious, far-off, shadowy shore
Where lies our doom.

So I will lay him softly to his sleep
'Neath passion-flowers that shall climb and cling
About his monument; and while they creep,
Roses I'll bring
To die above his heart, to strew the ground,
Where, deaf to every song or sweet soft sound,
He's slumbering.

Then will I turn me to my life and live
As I had lived if he'd ne'er passed my way;
An he is dead, perchance I can forgive.
So pass away,
Thou bitter time in which I saw his face!
So fade he swift from the familiar place—
Love died to-day!

Book II.

CHAPTER III. AN ERROR OF JUDGMENT.

How many times had Ivor Grant looked down the elm-tree avenue, or wished the morning hours would speed more swiftly, or visited the old deserted nursery to look up stores of his own childish toys? It was wonderful, too, his anxiety about luncheon, his delicate hints to the housekeeper, his directions as to flowers and fruit and sweets, and all the dainty trifles which women love. But even with all these cares the time seemed to drag along very heavily. He betook himself to the terrace at last, a cigar in his mouth, and his dog, Royal, at his heels.

The spring air was keen and exhilarating, and that new sense of youth and delight was thrilling his pulses with fire and fervour. He could not acknowledge even to himself the reason for such feelings, but the consciousness of their existence was as assured as his own.

The sun was at its brightest, it was just noon, when at last the looked-for figures came in sight. To him there seemed to be only one—a young goddess floating over the smooth wide drive, with all that was brightest and best of earth, and air, and sunlight surrounding her as she moved, encircling her with such magic halo of life and loveliness as surely had never touched woman before.

He threw the cigar away, and went down to meet her with eager steps.

The meeting was easy and unawkward now. Both knew their own ground, and both were sure that nothing but a very frank and very cordial friendliness gave them that feeling of supreme content in the prospect of each other's companionship.

There was nothing to look back upon with regret, or forward to with fear. They were young, and life was fair, and the present moment held rich possibilities of enjoyment. That was all.

"I am afraid I am very early," said Beryl, after the first greetings were over. "But the children haven't given me a minute's peace since breakfast."

"Not at all early," said Ivor eagerly, feeling as if he had never half estimated the worth of juvenile pertinacity. "I expected you long ago."

"Not before breakfast surely," she said, with a glance that made him laugh at his own stupidity, and then she laughed too, and little Jack, seeing an opportunity of striking in, said in his pretty plaintive voice:

"Has 'oo dot any toys?"

"Lots!" said Ivor with enthusiasm. "A rocking-horse, and a boat, and some tin soldiers."

"And books?" enquired Jack, as he paused.

"Books?" said Ivor, looking at him wonderingly. "Why, what a funny little chap to want books. Picture-books, I suppose. Well, I dare say we shall find some."

"He is very fond of books," said Beryl quietly. "He is always bringing them to me to read stories to him."

"Oo will tell me stories," said little Jack coaxingly, from that vantage-point of Ivor's shoulder where he was perched.

"Certainly," acquiesced Ivor, who in his present genial frame of mind would have promised anything in, or out of, reason. "What about? Giants, and fairies, and—"

"No," interrupted little Jack gravely. "Me likes 'bout Joseph and Samuel, and Noah in de ark, wot mummy tells, and the 'ittle boys who had the porridge, when the other 'ittle boys had meats, and—"

"He means pulse," said Beryl, growing crimson. "Daniel, you know, at the Court of Darius. He is such a child for Bible-stories."

"Mummy tells me them vev'ry night," said little Jack, "after me has said my pwayers. Does 'oo say pwayers?"

"Jack is very silly," interposed Cyril apologetically. "He's so very little, you see, sir, and he thinks everybody says prayers, like himself."

"Mummy does," says Jack eagerly. "I hearded her. She sez—"

"Hush, darling!" interrupted Beryl hastily. "You mustn't talk so much. Mr. Grant will be tired of you."

"On the contrary," said Ivor gravely, "he makes me think of a certain verse I used to con over in my young days, 'Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings—'"

Here the questioning came to an end for a time, and Beryl directed the boys to run on in front of their elders, so Master Jack was dismissed from his pedestal.

"You must really excuse them," said their mother. "They say such odd things. You see they have been entirely with grown-up people, and Jack is naturally old-fashioned."

"They need no excuse," said Ivor gravely. "I think they are simply charming."

She glanced around. That sense of newness in what met her eyes, combined with another and more exquisite sense of enjoyment, and the pride in her own land and its tranquil beauties, soothed her as nothing in that long foreign sojourn had done.

Ivor noted her admiration, and it seemed to bring them into yet more perfect sympathy. The full, rich sunlight poured itself upon her face, and lit its soft and tender lines with a sweeter meaning. She looked to him a woman

Perfect as a young man's dream,
And breathing beauty.

Yet in that moment it came home to him with a sudden pang how well he had remembered that face through all these years. How never since he met its gaze had he cared to look with interest upon another.

The warm air played about her—the very sunbeams seemed to rain their lavish gold as on a thing they loved. The children danced before them, their voices ringing out in happy laughter. It was like an idyl of spring itself, an idyl of hope, and love, and promise. And yet what mad, strange fancy was that which flashed across Ivor Grant's mind for one moment only—a fancy that all of earth's joy and heaven's glory might centre itself in one look from eyes that shone like stars beneath ruffled dusky hair.

But fancies are quick to come and go, and the thoughts of youth are hard to curb when the gladness of spring runs riot through the veins. And, after all, a fancy—unspoken—hurts no one.

Luncheon was over. Beryl had been introduced to Mrs. Grant, and, strange to say, charmed that proud and fastidious lady without an effort. Perhaps as much by her total unlikeness to Mrs. Grant's imagined picture of her as by anything else.

A lovely face, a perfect manner, a frank, fearless spirit, bright wits, and good sense, made up a charming combination of attractions. Then Ivor was so perfectly unembarrassed, so cordial, yet so utterly devoid of any of the empressment which Mrs. Grant had dreaded, that her momentary fear on his account died out.

Certainly Mrs. Marsden was attractive—dangerously so; but then Ivor had stood the batteries of so many attractive women, the snares of so many beauties, that he might safely be trusted with one so securely fenced in by matronhood and motherhood as this woman. The children, too, delighted her with their grave shyness and quaint grace. As for little Jack, she fell down in perfect adoration before the solemn baby-face with its intense earnestness and sweet pathetic beauty—a beauty that no mother's eyes had ever yet gazed upon untouched, yet no mother's heart remembered without a pang of something too like fear for outward expression.

Having left the children in the housekeeper's charge, Ivor and Beryl were "doing" the picture-gallery in a leisurely and somewhat neglectful fashion, indulging in little desultory scraps of talk—gossip as to mutual acquaintances—London life—books—art—all the many topics that spring up between two people moving in the same sphere of life, and naturally intelligent and observant of the world around them.

"Do you remember our discussion on music the first night we met," asked Beryl laughingly, "and how you told me you could sing? Do you still do so?"

"Yes," he answered, pausing by her side, under one of Kneller's famous portraits which the living beauty beneath seemed to utterly extinguish—at least such was his private opinion. "And I remember too what a trick you played me about that young lady, whose notes ran up to the chandelier and down again, and reminded me of fireworks in more ways than one. Not only were they brilliant and uncertain, but they contained so many—crackers."

"Oh, for shame!" cried Beryl in pretended horror; but she laughed all the same—it seemed so easy to laugh to-day. "Doesn't it seem odd," she went on presently, "that we should only have met once? And yet I had been a month in town, and Madge knew so many people that you knew."

"I suppose you never thought of me again?" said Ivor, unwisely but impulsively.

He was surprised himself at the suspense with which he waited for her answer.

She was silent for a moment. Then her lips relaxed into a half-smile.

"Yes, I did. I could not help thinking of you, because you turned out so different to my preconceived idea. In those days I had a way of nicknaming people according to the fancy of the moment, and—"

She paused and coloured softly.

"And," he questioned gently, "you favoured me with some sobriquet also? I wish you would tell me what it was."

"Oh no," she said, shaking her head gravely; "I could not do that."

"And why?"

"Well, in the first instance, my judgment was incorrect; in the second, I should have to know you a long, long time before I could venture to tell you of my—rudeness—and expect you to forgive it."

"I think," he said very low and very earnestly, "there never could be a time in which you would ask for my forgiveness, and fail to obtain it."

"Spoken with a man's rashness," she answered lightly. "How can you tell? I might offend you dreadfully some day. I am not at all good at keeping friends."

"Friends, no; but a friend?"

She sighed softly; her eyes turned to the budding woods.

"I don't think I ever had one yet," she said at last.

Then they were both silent—Ivor for fear of the suddenly-checked impulse that longed to break into words, and she in that grave thoughtfulness which at times clouded the brightness of her face, and spoke of deeper cares below the surface.

"You are forgetting your duties of cicerone," she said at last. "I haven't had half the history of your ancestors yet. By the way, is Sir Hector such a great invalid?"

"At present he is laid up with that family heirloom, the gout," said Ivor. "When he is all right he is as brisk and active as I am."

"And do you find life dull here after London?"

"No, not now. I got somewhat blasé, used up, sick of the endless, useless life of pleasure I led. And my mother wanted me here. I think I was glad of the excuse to come."

"Your mother loves you greatly; anyone can see that," said Beryl thoughtfully.

"I believe she does," he answered with equal gravity. "Not that I deserve it—I am a selfish, idle fellow at best—but it is a way mothers have, I suppose."

She looked up with a smile.

"Are you alluding to me? Do you think I spoil my boys?"

"I don't think love can spoil anyone," said Ivor gently, "and yours is a wise love as well as a good one. There is something very beautiful in a mother's love," he added thoughtfully. "I think most men feel that in their hearts, even if they pretend to ridicule it. Perhaps as children we never understand or value it. It is only in after-years that the word 'mother' carries significance to our minds—tells us of something sweeter, holier, tenderer than words can quite express—a sort of pure, unconscious influence that once was about our days and hours, asking no reward, faithful even through neglect, and forgetfulness, and sin."

As he ceased speaking he looked at her.

"You—you were going to say—"

"Only that you make me very much ashamed of my errors in judgment," she said, laughing and flushing alternately. "What business have you to turn out so very different to what I thought you?"

"I am sorry," he said apologetically. "It was very good of you to fancy me better than I am, or, indeed, to think of me at all, but—"

"Oh," interrupted Beryl hastily, "did I say that I had fancied you—better—than I find you? Might it not be the reverse?"

He looked puzzled.

"If you would tell me the sobriquet you once gave me, I might find some clue to your real opinion. I confess I am at a loss to understand your words."

"Don't try," she said lightly. "I assure you they're not worth it."

"I have my own opinion as to that. Besides, you pique my curiosity. Will you give me leave to try and find out for myself?"

"Assuredly," she said, her lips one dimpled line of happy laughter now. "Full and free permission, for you could never, never discover it."

"Don't be too sure," he answered pleasantly. "If you put me on my mettle I shall leave no stone unturned till the discovery is made."

"And then?" she questioned, colouring despite herself at the grave challenge of the eyes she met.

"And then," he answered, his voice sinking to a lower tone, "I will take my revenge, of course."

"Mummy, mummy!" shrieked an ecstatic voice from the opening door of the gallery, "me's dot two tittens, and such a funny 'tittle bowwow. And the lady says me may have one for my very own; and does 'oo think the mummy pussy will be very angedy if me takes one away? She—she's tummin' to ask you!"

Tableau. Jack with one kitten clasped to his breast and another held in the skirt of his frock, and the distressed mother walking round and round, giving vent to anxious cries for her offspring's return.

Behind, Cyril with a small fluffy dog, very black, very curly, very difficult to hold.

All serious talk was at an end.

Beryl went down on her knees to examine the new treasures, the little lads leaning against her and bending their eager heads beside her own, the light from the stained oriel falling in a lovely glow of violet, and amber, and crimson over the pretty group. Ivor stood there and watched them, his face grave almost to pain.

It seemed to him in that moment that he at last knew what his beautiful home lacked, and yet that the knowledge had come too late to be of any use.

So often, so sadly often, knowledge does come in similar fashion to our blind and wilful hearts.

CHAPTER IV. FOR MOTHER'S SAKE.

"Me's had such a happy day, mummy," said little Jack. He was sitting on his mother's knee by the bedroom fire. In his arms was clasped the tiny fluffy dog which, along with one of the "tittens," Ivor had insisted upon presenting to him.

Cyril, standing opposite, and gravely undressing himself, surveyed the pair with somewhat wistful eyes. Of course it was nice to be old and strong, and no longer a baby in frocks and pinafores, still—well, mother never petted him like that, and he could not help feeling a little envious of Jack's privileges now and then.

"Me hasn't tried once," persisted Jack, doubling up his rosy feet, and hugging himself together in a fashion that rather discompoised the fluffy one, who uttered his remonstrance in the form of a sharp velp.

"Why should you cry?" asked Cyril, with his usual contempt for his baby brother's speeches. "It's so stupid, and it doesn't do you any good."

"Me tan't help it sometimes," said the little fellow wistfully. "Me thinks mummy is angry."

"I am never angry with you, my sweet," said his mother fondly.

"Not when me's a 'tittle bit naughty like me was this morning?"

"Well, certainly you were naughty to get up without leave, and then go all in the wet grass. But Cyril is older than you, and should have known better than to let you. You must never do it again. Six o'clock is quite early enough to get up, and I generally wake then."

Cyril turned aside his flushed proud face. Of course it was his fault—he was always in the wrong. Yet had not Jack suggested the idea, and harped upon it all the previous day? He had only carried it out.

"Me's very tired," said little Jack, with a sleepy yawn. "Me do to sleep now in mummy's arms."

"And what's Pluff to do?" enquired Beryl.

"I thought you couldn't go to sleep without saying your prayers," interposed Cyril, who attired himself in his little nightgown, and now came and leant against his mother's side.

Jack looked wistfully at the fire and the little cot, and his eyes drooped very heavily now.

"May me say me own pwayers?" he asked.

"Any you like, my darling," answered Beryl.

He folded his little hands, too tired to slip down and kneel on the rug.

He was asleep almost before the little prayer was finished, cradled in the tender arms that were so sweet and sure a refuge for all his baby woes. Pluff had escaped and curled himself into a round black ball on the rug.

Cyril still stood leaning against his mother's shoulder, his eyes, unusually thoughtful, gazing into the bright coals as they leapt into flame or shadow. The silence had lasted so long that he thought his mother had forgotten him, and he looked at her face and saw it bent in rapt and awestruck adoration above the lovely little sleeper in her arms.

The little face was colourless as marble, dark rings of ruffled hair fell over the blue-veined forehead, the lashes of the closed eyes hung like a fringe of dusky shadow upon the white cheeks, and through the parted lips the faint breath came slow and soft, and sweet as scents of flowers in spring.

"Are the angels like that, do you think?" asked Cyril softly, as if even to his careless, joyous nature something in that stillness and holiness appealed with an unknown and inexpressible power.

She started—not so much at the voice, as at the echo of an undefinable fear that it had struck from the chords of her own heart.

"They cannot be fairer," she said with a half sob, rising and laying the beloved little figure down in its resting-place for the night.

Then she came back and knelt down on the soft rug, and drew her eldest born into her arms.

"Cyril," she said, and her face was very grave, and her voice had such a strange pathos in its full tones that the boy's quick ear caught it, and for long, long after years seemed to treasure it in his heart, as then she never dreamt he would; "Cyril, my dear, I want to speak to you very seriously for a few moments. You know you are much older than Jack, and stronger too, and you must try and not lead him into mischief as you so often do. He is such a delicate little fellow, and if—if anything ever happened to him through your carelessness or thoughtlessness how sorry you would feel in after years. And another thing, my darling, you know I have come home with you both because India did not suit you, as indeed it seldom does suit children, but papa may not care for me to stop here long, and then I should have to leave you and go back alone, and—"

"Oh, mother, mother!" a cry so low, so stifled, so full of the tears the eyes were too brave to show, that it smote her to the heart.

"Don't fret, dear, I am only telling you what might happen. I don't say it will. And if it did, I should like to think that you would be very good and very careful of your little brother, and look after him as well as ever you can for mother's sake. And then when I come home to see you, and find you both so strong, and clever, and good—"

"I can never be good," sighed Cyril despairingly; "I try so hard, but somehow I'm always doing something wrong."

"But you will try very hard," urged his mother gently, drawing him closer still in that strange urgency of feeling which neither could explain, and one was never to forget.

"Yes, I will try," said the boy gently, clinging to her with a suppressed intensity of his own sorrow, all the more touching in that it was so new and so unexpected a thing. "But do you think really you will have to leave us here and go back across the sea? Do you love papa better than us?"

"Heaven help me, no!" came in a stifled cry from the mother's lips. She could not say more. She could not explain how just because there was no love for that stern, neglectful father in her heart, the sense of duty waxed but stronger and pointed with imperative finger along a rough and stony path that called itself her future. She could not say this, or indeed anything of the dread and pain with which her heart was filled. He was so young, and she gave him credit for only a young child's depth of feeling. Yet she clung to him now in a passion of grief, as to some frail spar that would drift her into a haven of refuge when the dark and unknown sea of the coming years had been braved and passed.

They were silent for a brief time.

"Should we have to go to school?" asked Cyril at last, in a low reluctant whisper.

"I—I am afraid so. In his letter papa says—"

"I don't want to hear what papa says," said the boy coldly. "Papa never loved us. He doesn't care whether we are happy or miserable, or ill, or—or anything. He never did. And if he takes you away from us I shall hate him."

"Oh, hush, hush! You mustn't talk like that, my child. You are too young to understand what is best for you. Papa has other things to think of, you know. Money and business, and all that. I—I have only you."

"Jack wouldn't like school," said Cyril again. "He's so little and so timid, and then he's so fond of you. Can't you think of him if you were away, so lonely and so sorry? and I couldn't help him one bit."

She could think of him, aye, and did, even while she tried to put the thought away, and treat it as some far-off possibility that after all might never touch them half so nearly as their own fears touched them now. She did think of it for long hours after the boy had gone to bed, when she sat in the rectory parlour by her father's side, hearing his praises of the great and fortunate merchant to whom her life was bound, listening with a sad smile to the comments on her own good-fortune. Think of it, yes, and think, too, of her starved heart and lonely life, of the sad and pitiful mistake she had once made, and for which there could never be any remedy now!

Think of it, aye, and look back, too, on the sacrificed girlhood, when circumstances had laid so many a mesh that then she had never even suspected. Think of it until she saw herself changed as she was changed now. The frank, free spirit only asserting itself against a thousand mean and hopeless tyrannies—the light, and laughter, and natural joyousness of her nature alternately crushed or subdued to meet the demands of a selfish and gloomy despot.

No one but herself knew what her inner life was—how utterly unsuited in every degree of feeling, tastes, dispositions, sympathies, were she and the man she had wedded six years ago.

There are some conceptions of duty too deep for mortal ken, and Beryl Foster's had always been a very strong one. The same respect and obedience she had yielded to her father she had been prepared to yield her husband. Of any other feeling she had had no thought. How soon she found out what a terrible mistake she had made, it needs not to say. Human lives are full of such errors, so full that one can but hope for more pitiful judgment hereafter than ever we meet from our fellow-men below; so full that the burden of life is but one weight after another of the foolish, impulsive, short-sighted actions that make up the sum-total of that life's arithmetic; so full that the only wonder is we glean even a little glimpse of happiness here and there, a something to cheer us with hope, or sweeten our days with sunshine, lest indeed we grow quite desperate, or quite evil, or quite mad.

Gradually and surely Beryl Marsden's nature would have deteriorated had it not been for the love and delight that had come to her with her children's birth. They gave her back her youth; their love unlocked the floodgates of her own wealth of passionate feeling. For their sakes she bore her cross as many another martyred womanhood has borne it, and turned a bright, brave face to the world that envied her.

Yet, as the years went on, she learnt that to display these feelings only served as a fresh weapon in the hands of her taskmaster, for through them his sordid and tyrannical nature stabbed her in a thousand petty ways.

The utter breaking down of her own health, and little Jack's extreme delicacy, had been the sole cause of his reluctant consent to her going to England with the children.

The doctor had insisted upon it so stringently, that for appearance sake he was obliged to yield; but, as Beryl had told Cyril that night, his very first letter had been full of some project to curtail her stay and embitter its hours of liberty with an unending dread.

She tried to kindle some spark of sympathy in her father's heart, but he had an idea that mothers were apt to be foolish over their sons, and thought it really his duty to take her husband's view of the case.

What man living ever did understand that pang of heartache, that sick, cold, horrible dread which rends a mother's soul in twain as she thinks of her carefully-guarded treasures passing into a stranger's hands? As she dwells on the countless little wants to which she has ministered, and which she feels assured no alien mind can understand; of the tender nature, which is like a sensitive-plant to rough handling, and must undergo agonies in the rude and careless school of life, turning in vain for the accustomed sympathy and perfect comprehension of a mother's love, and, failing that, growing hard, and chilled, and sullen, for very inability to seek or find an answering comprehension.

All these things Beryl thought of, while her father prosed on, with that utter inability to comprehend his daughter's pain and solitude of heart that is often a distinct mark of the sympathy of one's own kindred.

All these things crushing and lying heavily upon her, she left him at last with her accustomed good-night, and went upstairs to her own room.

Stooping over first one, then the other, of the little beds, she saw the angel-face of one sweet sleeper calm and placid as his dreams, but on Cyril's lashes the tears were glistening still, and his rest was broken ever and anon by a low and sobbing sigh.

When the Golden Stars Shine Out.

'Tis when the golden stars shine out
Upon the brow of night,
And circle round their silver queen,
Like sparkling gems of light,
That then amid the silent calm
Of Nature's peace and rest,
Sweet tender thoughts of thee, dear love,
Rise softly in my breast.

The distance is as nothing now
That thine and my life parts,
Nor time nor space can break the chain
That binds our two fond hearts.
And at the still and midnight hour
I wake and think of thee,
And hope if thou art waking too,
Thou hast a thought for me.

Not much of time for loving thoughts
Is ours throughout the day;
The round of toil and constant care
Drives tender dreams away.
'Tis when the restful night hath come,
And moonlight gilds the sea,
'Tis when the golden stars shine out,
That then I think of thee.

"Lovely and Pleasant."

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"Oh, I say, Miss Raymond, it is just too bad! You might at least give me an extra. What is the use of only two waltzes?"

"Really, Mr. Merriman, you are very hard to please. I kept those two expressly for you, and now you are not satisfied. I assure you I have not a single one left. Look for yourself." And Violet Raymond, the prettiest and most popular girl in the town, laughingly held out her programme.

"I don't want to see," was the sulky rejoinder. "You might have kept me an extra."

"We are wasting our dance, Miss Raymond." And the tall, good-looking gunner who had been waiting with visible impatience while his partner spoke to the two young subalterns who had accosted them, offered his arm to the girl. She took it, and with a smile at the other two, turned to go back with him to the dancing-room. "Those boys are really absurdly impudent. I think you are too kind to them. You ought to snub them a little."

The words, spoken in a tone that there was scarcely an attempt to lower, reached—as the speaker was perfectly indifferent whether they did or not—the ears of the two left behind.

"I'd like to wring his neck—he gives himself such confounded airs!" exclaimed Merriman savagely. "Boys, indeed! We're just as good men as he is any day, and I would soon show him that, if he would only give me a chance."

And the young militiaman certainly looked—if energy and force of feeling, and a strong determination to assert his own dignity, go towards making a man—that he was well qualified for the title.

"He's quite right. We are only boys," returned the other in a slightly drawing tone, which, with his half-shut eyes and general air of languor, gave an idea of perpetual sleepiness. He had stood quietly by while his friend had been pleading for a dance from the belle of the room, and had listened patiently to Oscar Merriman's violent tirade against the other man. "We aren't twenty-one. I shall not be grown-up for two months yet. Till then we are only hobbledehoes. That's what a girl called me the other day. I overheard her. Come along!"

"No, I won't. It's beastly. I shouldn't mind if Arundale were a decent sort of a fellow, but you know there are a jolly sight too many stories about him to make him fit to be the husband of a girl like that, and, hang it all! if a man——"

"Boy."

"Do shut up, Garth, or I'll knock you down. If a fellow can't win the girl he wants, at least he would like to see a respectable man step into his shoes."

His friend had nothing to say to this most disinterested sentiment, so he remained silent, and waited quietly till Merriman should have recovered a little from his irritation. But at present he was evidently too ruffled to move, and sat with his hands in his pockets, his legs stretched out, rubbing his head backwards and forwards against the wall. They were outside in the parade-ground, about which the guests wandered between the dances. Seats had been placed along the walls of the fort, on the flagged pavement where the dancers strolled up and down; but with the exception of a little cluster of girls, partnerless, sitting with their chaperons, and one or two of those men who seem to have no earthly reason for going to a dance at all, for they neither dance nor attempt to make themselves agreeable, but only get in everybody's way by filling up doorways, and lingering about the refreshment-room, the two had it nearly all to themselves.

It was a lovely afternoon towards the end of June. Fort Ravine lay bathed in sunshine. The heat was almost too great for dancing, yet the band, playing one of Waldteufel's sweetest waltzes, had evidently proved irresistible, and the long mess-room given up to the dancing was crowded. It was a waltz to which Oscar Merriman and Violet Raymond had often danced together, and as the strains floated towards him, and he pictured Captain Arundale enjoying what he was deprived of, he grew still more savage, and brought his heels down on to the ground with such an impatient energy that Garth, who had been gazing listlessly at one or two squads of men doing punishment-drill in the distance, turned and looked at him.

They were both good-looking young fellows; Sydney Garth was really the handsomer of the two, but he never made the same impression on people as his friend Oscar Merriman. The latter was always the favourite both with men and women. There was a reckless dash about him, a curious eccentricity in dress and manner that carried with it a sense of individuality, and made him noticeable.

This power of impressing people with your own personality is a great thing in an age when civilisation seems trying to polish and pare down men and women until they present a uniform and therefore slightly uninteresting appearance. Sydney Garth was generally considered rather slow and stupid, and no one knew if it were shyness or natural reserve that seemed to fence him off from the rest of his fellow-creatures.

The friendship between the two, unless from sheer force of contrast, was an unaccountable one. But it was evidently very real. It had begun at school, continued through their career at a crammer's, and they had finally apparently both made up their minds to work really hard at last and pass together into the line.

This was a necessity with Oscar Merriman, who, unlike Sydney Garth, had no private means, while the latter was the heir of a rich but eccentric uncle.

This friendship, and the fact that Oscar Merriman was broad-shouldered and of a good height, with a complexion that but for his outdoor life would have been fair as a girl's, and bore some resemblance to the description given of the Israelite king, had gained for the two the nickname of Jonathan and David.

Garth was tall, and of a slighter build, with a dark complexion, and a faint air of delicacy that perhaps accounted for his indolence.

Merriman was the voice and Garth the echo. The two were never apart, and now in this unfortunate love-affair that had so terribly upset poor Oscar Merriman, Sydney Garth, without saying much, would show himself in his cool, slow way sympathetic and patient. Merriman's devotion to Violet Raymond through the whole of the training had been the amusement of all the beholders. It made no difference to his affection that she was two years older than himself. He never once wavered in his devotion, bearing patiently the merciless chaffing of his brother-officers, as well as the alternate coldness or kindness with which Violet herself treated him. But the appearance on the scene of Captain Arundale had been the finishing-touch to the unrest and bitterness that had so troubled the careless life of the young subaltern. He would enlarge on the subject for hours to Garth, who in his turn would say very little, while the amount of cigars the two got through during these confidences threatened seriously to impair their constitutions. Things were proving very hard for Merriman this afternoon.

"It's horribly hot out here," said Garth as his disconsolate friend showed no signs of moving, and was evidently perfectly unconscious of the fact that the sun was shining full on to his unprotected head, and was not improving the colour of his nose. "Let's go in and have an ice. A vanilla is soothing to the brain. Besides, there's no reason why we should let that fellow crow over us. He will be outside soon, and you'll be the chaff of the place if he sees you knocking your head against the wall in that deplorable condition. I say, do come."

With a growl Merriman rose, but he had come to a decision, and when once Oscar Merriman made up his mind he never wavered. There was an amount of dogged perseverance or obstinacy in him that would have startled most of his friends and acquaintances if they had suspected its existence. At least Violet Raymond should not marry Captain Arundale without knowing what manner of man he was.

He would have nothing to say for himself, but, boy as he was, his love was great enough to think of her happiness before his own. When he went to claim her for the waltz, instead of dancing, he asked her to go with him to the gun-room. He led her to the farther end, where they could talk uninterruptedly. Then he stopped suddenly and faced her. His face was a little flushed, but his eyes were clear and true, while a new kind of dignity seemed to have taken the place of the "spoilt-boy" kind of manner he generally put on.

He had never appeared to such advantage before, and Violet Raymond, noticing the change, was a little startled, even impressed by it.

"I am not going to bother you," he said as he saw from her face that she dreaded one of the wild declarations and appeals to which he was in the habit of treating her. "I will not trouble you about myself again, though I shall never love anybody as I love you. No, don't look vexed, Miss Raymond, I'm not going to begin," and his voice, which had trembled a little, grew steady again. "The two years you are always saying make such a barrier between us are nothing to me. If you were ten years older I should care for you just the same, and work and wait for you. Nothing can change what I feel for you, but I don't want to cause you pain, as you said I did, by making you refuse me. I only say this now because I want you to think that I don't mean to be impertinent in what I am going to say—that I love you too much for that, and that I must say it, though I dare say you will hate me for it. Captain Arundale—"

Violet flushed hotly, and she made a sudden movement, but Merriman went on:

"He admires you awfully, I know, and you have money, and he is fearfully in debt. Please don't, for your own sake, have anything to say to him. I know," the colour in the boy's face deepened, "lots of things about him that wouldn't be fit for you to hear, but he has behaved so badly that—"

"Thank you, Mr. Merriman," said Violet slowly, drawing herself up to her full height. "I scarcely thought that even a boy's impertinence could go so far. Your love, as you call it, gives you strange licence."

The next moment she was half-way down the gun-room.

Her icy tones, her cutting speech, stabbed poor Merriman to the heart.

He stood looking straight before him, while the big gun facing him seemed to become suddenly indistinct through an odd kind of mist that came between him and it.

"I've just done for myself," he said when he could collect his thoughts. "It is awful!"

He drew out an elaborately-bordered pocket-handkerchief and passed it slowly over his pale face as he leaned back against the wall. Then, after a few minutes, he made his way out to the passage. Garth was standing there, talking to an acquaintance.

Merriman went up to him.

"Come out and take a turn, Garth. I feel ill."

"You do look ill," said Garth's companion, a pleasant-looking girl. "Yes, go by all means, Mr. Garth. He's as white as a sheet. He's had a sunstroke, I dare say, and no wonder, sitting out, as he has been, in the blazing sun, with no hat on. I will wait here for you."

The two friends departed arm-in-arm. They found a secluded spot on the ramparts, and, sitting down, Merriman told him what had happened.

"You were a fool!" was all the comment Garth made.

"I know I was, but what was a fellow to do? It makes one's blood boil to think of what that man is—a cold-hearted sneering cad, with no faith in anything in heaven or on earth. Garth, you can't imagine how I love her. I can't give her up. If I can win her on this side of the grave I'll do it."

Garth did not speak.

"Wouldn't you do the same, old man?"

"It sounds rather impossible, does not it?" returned Garth slowly, as he gazed meditatively at the toes of his boots.

"Perhaps so, but I would wait years." Then his eager face grew troubled. "It's awfully hard lines, being without a penny, as I am. If I had only a little money of my own it would be so different. I should feel that I had more to offer. Still, there are a good many turns in the wheel. I may be well off yet one day, and as you are the only man I ever want for a friend, so she is the only woman I will ever have for a wife. I sha'n't leave here directly the training's over. I shall hang about, and I will write and let you know how matters are going on."

"Yes. Don't you think I had better go and find my partner? She may think it odd."

Three months later, Violet was married to Captain Arundale.

Another two years saw the fulfilment of Oscar Merriman's prophecy. Captain Arundale, a reckless gambler, hampered by debt, had only married Violet for her money. He had never cared for her—worse still, all the love he had to give was given to another woman. Violet had borne patiently the squandering of her money, but this discovery did what no coldness nor prospect of being left penniless had effected.

She left him and went back to her mother.

CHAPTER II.

"You here, Garth? It's awfully good of you to come. I meant to try and look you up this evening, as I hadn't seen you for the last day or two; but I'm just done up entirely;" and Oscar Merriman, unbuckling his sword as he greeted Garth, who had been waiting for him in his quarters, flung himself down on the bed, stretching himself out at full length.

The separation which had taken place after they had been gazetted to different regiments, had not been of long duration, and the two young men found themselves shut up with their respective battalions in Candahar, waiting for the relieving columns.

There had been a sortie this day, in which Merriman's regiment only had taken part, and Garth, as soon as he was off duty, had gone up to spend a short time with him. As Merriman lay there, the back of his head resting on his arms, his eyes half closed, it was a little difficult to reconcile his present appearance with the wonderfully clothed young dandy of a few months ago. His uniform worn and stained with the effects of work and weather, his face and hands at this moment very decidedly grimy, and burnt red with exposure to the sun and air, made him look very different to the youth, the tightness and varied hues of whose faultlessly fitting garments had been the wonder and astonishment of his friends at home.

Garth's appearance was not much better, and he too at this moment looked, in spite of the sun's tan, tired and rather done up, as if he had found his work on the fortifications nearly as trying as that in which Merriman had taken part. But there was something more than fatigue in Merriman's face and expression as he lay stretched out on the bed, and Garth saw it, and waited for the explanation.

It came at last.

"Arundale's gone," said Merriman abruptly, turning his head a little away from the window through which the light was streaming.

"Killed?"

"Yes."

There was a short silence.

Then there came another restless movement from the bed, and Merriman sat up.

"I would have saved him if I could, Garth."

"Yes, I know," returned Garth, not looking round, and Merriman fell back again.

"A shot struck him just as we thought everything was right."

Then for the space of six or seven minutes a silence reigned between the two.

A great many changes had taken place since that afternoon-dance. Perhaps not the least was that from the careless, light-hearted, reckless gaieties of their old English stations to the stern realities of war with its terrible fatalities and ceaseless anxieties.

But the old schoolboy attachment which used to result in such wild freaks and escapades, was as strong and real as ever, had even been deepened by the perils and dangers that surrounded them. Neither had they in any way forgotten the past, though they rarely ever alluded to it, generally spending the short time their respective duties in the besieged town allowed them to be together in discussing the progress of the war.

Perhaps the present, with its dark anxieties, was too absorbing to allow them to dwell much upon events that had become only a memory. By one of those strange orderings of fate, Captain Arundale was also in Candahar. Naturally in the course of their duty the three came across each other now and then. Garth spoke to him occasionally, but Merriman never exchanged a word with him, neither had he ever till this day mentioned his name either in anger or contempt to Garth. But the intensity of his dislike was proved by the shock that the man's death had given him.

In the fact, and the light it brought with it, of Arundale's utter inability ever to return any more the contemptuous hatred that the younger man felt towards him, of the awful and complete check that had been laid upon him, which had taken from him all power to mar or wound, or even to repent in this life for ever—the hatred and wrath which Merriman had thought justifiable and even righteous, appeared a thing terrible, unclean, unholy.

It seemed as if when the man, who, whatever his faults, was a splendid soldier, and at the moment of his death had been doing his duty as the noblest and best man would have done, was struck down, all bitterness, and anger, and desire of vengeance had been swept away from Merriman's heart as the leaves of a tree blasted by some scorching flame, and the revulsion of feeling which set in sickened him.

Violet was free, but at what a cost! No matter what the pain and suffering had been, could anyone be glad at such a way of escape?

With a muttered exclamation of weariness, something very like a groan, Merriman rolled himself over, and turned his face away from the window with its crimson light.

The impatient movement roused Garth. He turned his head, and looked for a second or two on the recumbent figure of his friend. It was an odd sort of look—steady, sustained, intent, as if he were looking at a kind of moral conflict in which he could have no share himself because he had no interest at stake, but in which contest every blow given and received, every advantage lost or won, had a reflection in the quiet passionless sweep of his own soul's current. He was not in the fight, but he might have been. Was he thinking that, and was it regret, pain, or pity for his friend who had entered the lists and been discomfited which darkened for a moment his grave face?

He was the first to break the silence, as, rising from his seat on the table, he said in his ordinary voice:

"Going to sleep, old fellow? Well, I'm off too. What a head I've got, to be sure! I was just going without the very thing I came to say, that is, in case—and of course there is always the probability—anything should happen to me—"

"What!" exclaimed Merriman, sitting straight upright and staring at Garth, who was carefully arranging his white helmet before a wonderful little mirror of Merriman's hanging on the wall, a glass which had a strange faculty of so altering the features of the person reflected in it, that it would have been difficult for a mother to recognise them as those of her own offspring, especially if she had any previous convictions on the subject of her child's beauty.

"Don't shout like that," he said rather testily, having apparently fixed the strap of the helmet to his own satisfaction. "I was only going to say that if I get knocked over—"

His sentence was brought to an abrupt conclusion by the rug that Merriman, catching up from under his own head, flung at him.

"If you are going to talk that rot, you had better stay away for the future. Just as if there weren't enough things to worry a fellow without you going to add to the number."

"It isn't rot. Don't you remember with those two fellows, Jonathan and David, Jonathan was potted first and David made a lament over him. I wonder what yours would be like?" Garth laughed as he spoke, but infectious as his laugh usually was, Merriman for once did not join in it. "Well, I'm really off now. There's your man coming across the court."

"Good-bye. I say, just chuck me back that rug again. It's a soft one. I'll come and look you up some time soon—to-morrow, if possible," said Merriman, catching the rug which Garth tossed back to him.

Merriman remained for a second or two half-raised on his elbow, listening to the quick, light steps of Garth as they struck sharp and clear on the flags of the court outside, while gradually into the depths of his eyes stole a light that certainly gave the lie to the scepticism of the nineteenth century, which laughs politely at loves and friendships, and maintains that, in the busy whirl of its everyday life, men and women have not time to stay and wring each other's hands.

But there was no one there to see or profit by its confession of faith, unless perhaps the invisible witnesses whose presence is taken little account of in these days of material and common-sense worship, and Oscar Merriman's head went down again on to the rug.

To-morrow, and to-morrow!

We dream our dreams in the night, and wake in the daylight only to learn their emptiness.

Fate holds in its hand a weapon stronger than our loves and our friendships, our hates and desires, our hopes and our aspirations, and that weapon is—death.

This passionless peace, this white stillness, may be well for the wearied, the unhappy, the halting, but for the young, and the brave, and the happy, what is this enforced quietude beside the rush and stir of life's grand battle, where every noble aspiration may mean a glorious victory?

If Merriman could have thought at all, he might have asked this question as he hurried, some days later, through the streets of Candahar, past the groups of excited men still discussing the result of the sortie which had been made that day, and which had ended in so disastrous a loss of life. It seemed as if he had not thought at all since that moment, a few hours before, when Garth, the friend he had fought so desperately to reach, had been struck down before he could come near him. He knew nothing after that, only that he had been in a fierce, mad fight, and that among the dead and dying Garth had been carried back into the town. The moment he himself was free, he had started off to see him.

Garth seemed to have been expecting him, for he was lying with his face turned towards the door of the small room in which he had been placed, and as Merriman's figure appeared in the doorway his face brightened.

Merriman had intended greeting him in their usual undemonstrative fashion, but the news he had just heard outside the door from one of the doctors, and the sight of Garth's white face, proved too much for him.

"Oh, Garth—Garth!" he exclaimed, sinking down on the edge of the narrow couch.

"Is that David's lament?" asked Garth rather faintly, but with a smile so like and yet so strangely unlike his usual one, that it went straight to the heart of Merriman like the stab of a dagger. It seemed so to seal and ratify the doctor's verdict.

"I say, don't, old fellow," he said, his voice sharp with the pain. "The doctor said you weren't to talk. I've nothing to do, so I've come to sit by you for a little."

"I sha'n't keep you long."

"Garth, it's positively wicked for you to talk like that. You'll never get well if you don't look on the bright side of the question."

Garth did not answer, only the same curious smile fluttered across his pale lips; and Merriman knew what it meant. He rose abruptly and walked over to the window.

"It is jolly that you have got the room to yourself," he said, coming back to the bedside, the short pause giving him time to steady his voice.

"Yes, I'm glad. I've something to say, and—"

"You're not to say anything," said Merriman shortly.

And then there was a silence.

One of the doctors came into the room to look at his patient, and he told Merriman what he was to do and what he was to give him.

Merriman said he would not require help, as he meant to stay till it was time to go on duty, and Garth seconded his wish. The doctor left them alone, for he and his colleagues were very busy, and there was nothing to be done here beyond the common services for alleviating the pain of a sick-room. Nothing could stay the life so fast ebbing away.

Neither of the two spoke much. Merriman could not. He was afraid to trust his own voice, lest it should betray the hopeless pain of his heart, and mar in any way the faintest possible chance there might still be for Garth's life.

Garth was too weak to say much at all, and it required all his strength of will not to betray the pain that was racking him, and so add to the hardness of his friend's watch.

He knew that he was dying, but he was too exhausted and too suffering to know whether he cared much if he were or not, or if death appeared as stern and merciless a fate as it might have seemed if he had been strong and well, only he was glad that he had settled everything in time, and that there would never be any more reason for poor Merriman's occasional railings against fortune for the poverty which, even if he had won Violet's love, would have necessitated so long a waiting before he could claim her as his own. So he lay quietly there, accepting gratefully the ministrations of Merriman, who proved an unwearied nurse, while he was even less able to think than Merriman himself. The long weary night had almost passed away, the watch by the sick-bed being only broken by the usual round of hospital visits.

For the last hour Garth had been perfectly silent, and as he lay with closed eyes, his breath, which had been short and laboured, coming gradually slower and deeper, Merriman thought he was asleep, and a wild hope sprang up in his heart that the doctor might have been mistaken after all. As he sat there keeping his patient, tender watch, almost pathetic in its contrast with its keeper, the strong, stalwart young subaltern who, but a short time before, had been the despair of his crammers, the incorrigible young militiaman, the life and the soul of every mad escapade in any place he might be quartered at, all their past life—at school, with their tutors, through their trainings—came back to him. For the first time he saw clearly what Garth had been to him through all that time. It was always Garth. Garth who had helped him out of difficulties. Garth who had kept close to him in all his troubles, whether brought on by his own fault or by outward circumstances. Garth whose good advice, given in that curious indifferent way of his, as if he did not care much whether it were taken or not, which never wounded or irritated by its assumption of superiority, but was always so good and true, that had helped and guided Merriman when, otherwise, he would have failed and given in. He had led Garth? Why, it was he who had guided and governed him, only with such a simple, honest, unselfish away, that he had never felt the rule, but had been strengthened, encouraged, directed all unwittingly. Why, it was Garth who had made him what he was, and enabled him to enter on a profession which was honourable and glorious, for if it had not been for Garth's grumblings and lectures at his indolence and recklessness, he would long ago have given in and emigrated, perhaps only to die in want and degradation on some distant gold-fields. The thought of it all almost maddened him, accompanied as it was with the dread knowledge that nothing he could do could hold back his friend from the beckoning hand of death. Like David with his son Absalom, he could have cried out, "Would God I had died instead of thee." But Absalom died just as Jonathan had died before him, and all David's love and grief could save neither.

There was a slight movement from the bed, and Merriman, with the strength of devotion subduing every trace of trouble in his voice, forced himself to speak gently and quietly. Garth was awake—if he had been asleep—and was trying to raise himself a little.

Merriman lifted him up gently and arranged the pillows, rather awkwardly, as hands unaccustomed to sick nursing are liable to be, but the tender care of his touch made the slight discomfort of little account in Garth's eyes.

"Thanks, dear old boy," he said rather slowly, but in so much stronger a voice that Merriman's heart gave a throb of gratitude. "I have something to say to you, and you must not interrupt as you did before. Before I came here I made a will, leaving you everything. There is no one else, and I could do as I like. No; it is no use you making a fuss. It is done. Only there are just a few legacies——"

A scarlet flush dyed Garth's pale face, but he would not heed Merriman's entreaties to be silent. It seemed as if, knowing his time was short, he wished to make haste.

"The legacies are to one or two people. One is Violet Arundale. Let me finish. I knew she was left without anything, and I thought even if ever she were able to, she might not care to marry again, so if I could help her I would. You don't mind, Merriman?" he asked entreatingly. "You will let me do so much for her?"

He looked up into Merriman's startled face as he spoke.

What was it in the look that drove every drop of blood from Merriman's lips? He turned away abruptly from the bedside, and took a half turn across the room.

"Garth," he said in a low, strained voice, as he came back suddenly and sank down by the bedside, "does it mean that? Oh, Garth!"

Garth returned the questioning misery of Merriman's look by one as steady and quiet as if death had indeed brought its promised peace to all tempted and suffering spirits.

"It does not matter now, Merriman, or else I should not have told you. Only I thought if you ever guessed it afterwards, from that legacy, you might be sorry, and I should like you to know that it did not really matter. I think I always loved her from the first day I saw her. Do you remember that dance at Eastney? Don't look like that," he continued, his own face growing troubled at the sight of Merriman's; "I didn't mind. She never cared for me. It was she who called me a hobbledlehey," a faint smile coming into his face as he spoke.

"But you never tried to make her think otherwise. And to think how I must have hurt you sometimes with——" And Merriman laid his head down on his arms as they rested on the bed by which he was kneeling, and could have groaned aloud at the thoughts that overwhelmed him.

How he had talked of his love and his doubts and fears to Garth, who had listened so patiently, never betraying what he must have felt during those long confidences; how he had never spared Garth, but constantly devised plans for throwing him into the society of Violet in his own endeavours to be always near her!

"It worries me to see you take it so much to heart," said Garth appealingly, his voice already growing fainter, and the pauses between his words longer. "I really didn't mind so much. Only once, it was hard—that night you came to my rooms in town and told me that you had just met her in the train, coming up all alone to London, after she left Arundale, not knowing where to go—I felt half mad to think that she was so near, in such trouble, and I could do nothing for her. If I had dared, I almost felt I would have offered her a home. Don't think me a brute. It was only for a moment."

"A brute, Garth! What have I been?"

"The jolliest friend a fellow could have," said the other, stretching out his hand and meeting Merriman's half-way.

It was not one of the easiest parts of the latter's task to sit there passive and quiet, keeping back the burning words of his pain and remorse, but he saw that Garth could not bear much more.

"You will be kind to my people in Scotland, and do what you can for them? They have been very good servants and tenants. You and Violet will look after them if you ever win her; perhaps you will, now she is free. She always said she would like to live in Scotland."

"Garth, I cannot stand it! I owe you everything, and then to come between you and trying to gain her love, it is——"

"You must not think of that. I would not have lost you as a friend for anything. What was it David said of Jonathan? That is what your friendship has been to me."

But Merriman was beyond an answer. Passing the love of woman, could his own affection, true though it had been, make up for the loss of Violet's love, which perhaps Garth might have won if he had tried? Could any devotion on Merriman's part fill up the measure of his sacrifice, made so simply and quietly? All that he could say to himself as he sat there, his face turned away from Garth's eyes, was, that his friend had been very lovely and pleasant in his life, and that now that life was ending, and the pleasant things of loyal friendship and tried trusts were vanishing into that past from which there was no coming back.

A slight movement from the bed roused him, and as he turned to look, he could see even by the dim light in the room that there was a change, as if the awful wing of death's angel had already come between Garth and earth's light, and cast its grey shadow upon his face, as he lay back exhausted on his pillow. Merriman's first impulse was to rush for help, but Garth's appeal stopped him.

"Lift me up, I don't want anyone else," and as Merriman placed his strong arms round him, and raised him gently, a look of relief came into Garth's eyes.

"The night is coming."

"No, it is morning," said Merriman, not knowing himself how his voice could be so quiet and steady with that burden in his arms. "Look," he added, looking towards the window, through which could be seen in the far east the first opal tints of the dawn, to lighten in a few minutes into the glorious splendour of a new day.

Afterwards his words seemed to bear another meaning, but then they were only uttered with a passionate longing to interest his friend for just a little longer in the things of this life.

"Is it? It is growing so dark."

"Do you mind very much, Garth?" asked Merriman, while he could scarcely see, through a mist of pain, the face of Garth as it lay white and still against his own shoulder.

"No—for underneath—are—the—everlasting—arms."

"It is all over," said Merriman a moment later, as he gently laid Sydney Garth back on the pillows, and turned to greet the two doctors who had just come in again to look at their patient.

And the doctors, knowing the names the two young men had gained, let him pass from the room without troubling him with questions.

"And that was how Garth died," said Merriman, when he spoke afterwards for the first time of his friend's death.

Even to-day he could only have spoken of it to one as close and as near to him as Garth had himself been in the old days. When, having at last gained the promise from Violet he had waited so patiently for, he and she could speak together as both having had so great a part in the life that was gone.

They were standing, this summer afternoon, looking up at the window that they had put up in memory of Sydney Garth in the chance of the village church near his old home in Scotland—the home that was Oscar Merriman's now, and to which Violet Arundale had promised to come in another year.

Violet had already learned the story of Garth's love for her, Oscar Merriman having told her that before he spoke again of his own, and Garth's patient devotion, his generous care for herself in her need, his grand surrender of self—giving all and asking for nothing in return—had brought him almost as near to her as he had been to Merriman himself.

"Do you see what I had put after his name? 'Lovely and pleasant in his life.' He was that to me." And something very like the look that had come into Merriman's face as he left that room in the hospital two years ago in Candahar came into it again as he looked up at the name of his friend.

It touched Violet with its expression of perfect love, from which the intervening years had taken only the bitterness of the parting.

Garth had never been forgotten, though the sharp sting of that moment when he had passed out of Merriman's life had been softened into the loving memory of after-years. Both of them had been true as steel to her—to themselves.

She passed her hand through his arm.

"You were wonderful boys," she said softly.

"I don't know about myself," he said slowly; "I only know what Garth was."

"Dear Sydney!"

The softness of her tone showed that Garth had won his own place in Violet's heart, and told Oscar Merriman that in some way his friend was sharing the gladness which had come into his own life.

He bent down and kissed her, drawing her closer to him, for there were no curious eyes to see them. Only the soft west wind floated in at the open church-door, bringing with it the scent of the purple heather and wild thyme, while the sunlight fell upon them in rays of gold and crimson light from Sydney Garth's window above, as if the love and the faith of his life were still casting the radiance of its blessing upon them.

The Editor's Note Book.

WHEN French revolutionists first, and Bonapartists afterwards, posed as the "saviours of society," the world was more disposed to laugh at them than to accept their statement. It is odd to find a hard-headed practical man like Mr. Chamberlain going back to the old absurdity and hoping, in his speech at Newcastle, that it would not be considered too great an assumption if he said that the Liberals, after all, are the true saviours of society.

THIS is just the mistake which all energetic party-politicians make. Parliamentary majorities are made by society—using the word, as, of course, Mr. Chamberlain did, in its extended and not in its limited sense—and when society wants saving it gives its orders to whichever political party seems most likely to carry them out, and the business is very soon done. Ministers, nowadays, as Mr. Chamberlain occasionally seems to forget, are the servants and not the masters of the country, a fact which is emphasised by the complete overthrows of Mr. Gladstone and of Lord Beaconsfield in turn.

THE opposition to the proposed lock at Isleworth has proved too strong for its promoters, so the Bill has been withdrawn, and the matter will not be further proceeded with until evidence has been laid before the Select Committee which is to sit next session. No one who knows anything of the condition of the river between Kew and Teddington can doubt the absolute necessity of something being done. Unfortunately there is as yet no prospect of an agreement being come to among the people most directly interested, and the state of the river goes steadily from bad to worse.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT has told us more than once that London is one of the safest cities in the world, and the statement has been emphatically contradicted by many correspondents in the newspapers, who declare that at most hours, and certainly after dark, the streets swarm with dangers.

As in most matters of this sort the truth lies between the two extremes. Occasional violent assaults and daring highway robberies undoubtedly occur, and it would be surprising if, in a population of some four millions, they did not. But, in nine cases out of ten, I am sure the victims of street outrages have only their own imprudence, or their own carelessness, to thank for their sufferings.

It will be remembered that Dr. Edmund Bower, of East Dulwich, was prosecuted for negligence some little time ago by the father of a child who had died under his care, and that the father's action was supported by the Public Prosecutor. The case was dismissed by the magistrate with contumely, and some of the most influential members of the medical profession have now shown their feeling on the subject by the presentation to the doctor and his partner of handsome testimonials.

FROM this case it would seem that the Public Prosecutor is chargeable with sins of commission as well as of omission, and that it would be well, while reform is in the air, that some enquiry should be made into the manner in which this functionary discharges his duties.

THE proposed amalgamation of Metropolitan Gas Companies is opposed by the Board of Trade and will consequently fall through. This would seem to indicate that London municipal reform is really to be taken in hand, and that the tyranny of gas and water monopolists is approaching its end. But there are so many slips between the cup of reform and the public lip that it will be wise not to be too sanguine.

OUTSIDERS who were beginning to lose their way in the mazes of the Belt Case may take comfort. The fog with which this litigation has come to be surrounded has been too much even for the Master of the Rolls, who was obliged to ask in the course of the proceedings last week which of the litigants it was who was appealing.

THE prosecution of the Park Club by the police, on the charge that it is nothing but a gambling-house, is likely to lead to rather extensive litigation, as the points at issue are notoriously difficult and doubtful. What is a bonâ fide club, and what are its rights? are questions as to which the law is ambiguous, while the other point, what constitutes illegal gambling, is even more uncertain. At present the legal position of gambling depends a good deal on the construction of a statute of Henry VIII., which was passed more with a view to the encouragement of archery than to the improvement of public morality.

IF Dr. Carter Moffat is right, the fact of so many Italians being blessed with beautiful singing voices is due entirely to the air they breathe, and, as that air can be exactly imitated by chemical means—so says the doctor—it follows that Concentrated Artificial Italianized Air will produce equally beautiful voices anywhere else.

WHETHER the Concentrated Artificial Italianized Air can be manufactured or not is a matter for chemists to determine, and experience alone can show its value when it is made, but there is one point which makes me a little sceptical about the whole discovery. Is Dr. Carter Moffat prepared to prove that English people who go to Italy with feeble singing voices always show marked improvement after a reasonable term of residence in the country? If the real air does not produce such an effect I have no faith in the manufactured article.

MR. BARNUM's white elephant—which appears, after all, not to be white—has arrived, and will probably be the leading attraction at the Zoological Gardens for some time to come. It is to be hoped that the appearance of this animal will not be the cause of a repetition of the nonsense which was written and talked about Jumbo; but I am afraid that in these days of the worship of sensational trivialities this is almost too much to expect.

THE matinée of "Claudian" which Mr. Wilson Barrett gave last week to the members of the dramatic profession was a most interesting event, not only for the unusually admirable performance of the play itself, but for the opportunity it afforded Mr. Barrett of contradicting in his speech at the end of the play certain malicious misstatements which have been circulated as to its success. Mr. Barrett declared emphatically that, from a financial point of view, "Claudian" has far surpassed any of his former productions.

As Mr. Pinero's comedy at the Globe has perished prematurely, it is not necessary to dwell at length on what was in truth a crude and awkward piece of work. The only really interesting feature in the whole performance was the Mr. Vereker of Mr. Carton. It is a thousand pities that the intrinsic weakness of Mr. Pinero's comedy prevents us seeing more of this admirable and thoroughly original study of character, which was quite as good in its way as anything I ever saw on the stage.

ONE of the most beautiful theatres in London is Mr. Edgar Bruce's new house, The Prince's, in Coventry Street, which, both for the beauty of its decorations and the completeness of its arrangements for the comfort of the audience, is quite perfect. Its situation also is one of the best in town, and if Mr. Bruce can only provide his excellent company with good material to work upon, he is certain to secure the success which his enterprise so well deserves.

THE balance-sheet of the Théâtre Français for 1883 is not reassuring to the advocates of a State-aided theatre for the encouragement of the classical drama. The sociétaires, or full members of the company, received for their share of the profits twenty-five per cent. less than in the previous year, and whether this is due to the unattractiveness of the répertoire, or to a growing desire on the part of the Parisian public for a less conventional style of acting, the fact is significant.

MR. CLEMENT SCOTT will have done good service, if his letter to the Times brings about the abolition of the dangerous nuisance of cigarette-smoking in theatres. People who cannot get through a ten-minute wait without a cigarette ought to stay away from theatres altogether, or, at least, go out into the street if they must smoke between the acts. Unfortunately the prohibition of smoking is only one of many reforms in the arrangements of our theatres which are urgently required, and which we do not seem at all likely to get.

MR. EDMUND YATES has inaugurated in the World a new style of dramatic criticism, which has the double merit of being extremely simple, and of affording unrivalled opportunities for the manufacture of ill-natured paragraphs at the smallest possible cost of time and labour.

THE new system is that a critic should write about a play which he has not seen, and should abuse the people concerned in its production, not so much for what they have actually done as for what he himself chooses to assume it possible that they may do.

THUS, because a good deal of fun is got out of Dick Swiveller and the Marchioness—two essentially comic characters—in the adaptation of the “Old Curiosity Shop” which I have recently written, and which has been successfully produced at the Opera Comique by Miss Lotta and Mr. Harry Jackson, Mr. Yates assumes, without the slightest reason, that Miss Lotta, Mr. Harry Jackson, and I are quite ready to burlesque Little Nell herself, or to make Paul Dombey’s story the subject of a pantomime opening. And, taking this gratuitously insulting supposition as his text, Mr. Yates proceeds to deal with us in his most graceful and fascinating manner.

MR. HARRY JACKSON and I are perfectly well able to take care of ourselves, and can afford to pass over such attacks as this with composure. So far as we are concerned, therefore, I do not propose to comment further on the article to which I have referred. But I cannot refrain from taking this opportunity of briefly characterising Mr. Yates’s assault on Miss Lotta as grossly unfair and cruelly unjust.

Cookery.

LIGHT DIET.

ONE of the most common directions given by doctors is that for a light nourishing diet without meat. Sometimes white fish is allowed, and generally eggs, milk, beef-tea, some kinds of soup, broth, and all kinds of farinaceous food come under the head of light diet. In some cases chicken and game are included, and there is then no difficulty, especially when expense is not an object, in providing a bill of fare. But when it is necessary to avoid even the lightest animal food, it is puzzling to provide at once sufficient variety with a high degree of nourishment. Under such circumstances everything which a patient takes must be very carefully prepared, so that nothing be lost from the substance under treatment, but that rather by the skill of the cook it may be made more nourishing.

Too great care cannot be bestowed on the preparation of beverages. Even toast-water may be so made as to have some little nutriment, and that without leaving in it any particles of burnt bread, which are so disagreeable alike to sick and healthy. There is, perhaps, no beverage more generally useful or acceptable than barley-water, yet although it can be properly made with very little trouble, it is in a great many instances so vile a mess as to create such a dislike that the very name makes an invalid shudder. When well made, barley-water is perfectly white, soft, and with a flavour so delicate that it is often preferred to any other beverage, and may be described as “fascinating.” Although it is very good plain, the best form in which it can be taken is that in which it is combined with cream and milk. For that form it should be made thick, and be reduced to a suitable consistency with cold or hot milk. This can be used as a breakfast beverage, and it would be well if barley-water found a place at the tables of the healthy instead of tea and coffee. Flavoured with strong extract of cocoa made from the nibs, with wine or spirits, with lemon or fruit syrups, mixed with the yolk of an egg or simply sweetened, barley-water is delicious and nourishing.

In making barley-water, be careful first to wash the grains in cold water, and then boil them for ten minutes in plenty of boiling water, which then drain off and throw away. This done, again boil the pearl barley, half a pound to two quarts of water, from three to four hours, water being added from time to time as required. Barley-water can be made in a much shorter time, but it is only by long boiling that a rich and entirely satisfactory decoction is obtained. The last and most important matter is the straining. For this a good and clean hair-sieve with two wooden or silver spoons are required. Use one spoon to rub the barley-water through the sieve, the other to remove that which hangs beneath it. Do not use the first spoon for the latter part of the operation, as by so doing you may get some of the grain into the liquid and destroy its smoothness. Barley-water should, in warm weather, be made fresh every day, and in cold weather, three times a week.

From time to time little dishes of fish, suitable for invalids, have been given in this Journal, and the paper in No. 48 will be found useful. It is always desirable to have fish perfectly fresh, but for those in delicate health too much pains cannot be taken in this matter, for stale fish has undergone changes which render it less digestible and less nourishing. It was hoped that one result of the Fisheries Exhibition would be that of bringing fresh fish within the means and reach of all classes. At present, however, it is just as difficult as it ever was to get fresh fish anywhere except at shops in London itself. Very few suburban tradesmen go to market every day, and they keep fish on ice during many nights, exposing it on the shop-board for sale during the daytime until, to an experienced eye, it is positively disgusting. If housekeepers made a point of always choosing their fish a better state of things would soon prevail. Cleaned fish should never be bought, for it is almost certain to have been kept for a day or two, and then, as was before said, it is comparatively valueless. It is not a good plan to deal exclusively with one fishmonger, or to allow him to send anything he pleases. The housekeeper will do well to go from shop to shop until she finds fish fresh from the day’s market, and to let it be seen that she can distinguish it from that which is stale. One often hears a lady at a fishmonger’s say, “Are the soles fresh?” but we never heard any other reply than, “Oh yes, ma’am,” no matter how evident the falsehood.

A great deal of nourishment is wasted in skinning fish; a sole fried in its skin is more juicy and of much finer flavour than one which has been skinned. A whiting baked in its skin is lighter than when fried without it and more nourishing than when boiled. Many cooks think that fish for invalids must be boiled in plain water in order to keep it delicate, but, as a rule, white fish is improved in all respects by being boiled either in fish or meat stock. All these little points should be carefully attended to when catering for invalids, both because such attention ensures the highest possible amount of nourishment, and because when a dish has its full savour it is more relished and is consequently more digestible.

For some patients, sweet dishes are interdicted; in such cases savoury jellies and blancmanges are often useful and make a decided change from beef-tea and broth. For both of these, recipes, which may be suggestive of other similar forms of nourishment, are given. Gelatine served in this way is useful when diarrhoea is present, and although the quantity given is sufficient to set the jelly, more, in such a case, may be used with advantage.

BEEF JELLY.

Cut one pound of fine beef or rump steak into dice, rejecting all skin and fat, put it into a bright stewpan, sprinkle over a small pinch of salt, cover the stewpan closely, and put it on the range at a low heat in order to draw out the juices of the meat, which will take about twenty minutes. There must be no approach to frying, as that would dry up the extract and alter the character of the preparation.

About every five minutes during the process, drain off the juices as they come; if the meat was fine and fresh there should be rather more than a gill of these. Now put them aside, until you have boiled up the meat with a pint of water for half an hour, or until the liquid is reduced to half a pint. It is better not to strain this, but to pour it off with all the sediment, in which lies the chief nourishment. If, however, the jelly is required clear, this liquor with the juices must be strained through a napkin, and afterwards be boiled and skimmed until perfectly bright. Mix the juices at first extracted with the liquor, and having taken off every particle of fat, use for the jelly.

Soak half an ounce of Nelson’s gelatine in half a gill of water for an hour or more, and dissolve it in the beef extract in a stewpan over the fire without allowing it to boil; add seasoning as required. When this is done stir the jelly occasionally until cold, when put it into a mould.

SAVOURY BLANCMANGE.

Make half a pint of veal broth, or chicken broth if preferred. For the former cut half a pound of veal cutlet into dice and boil it in a pint of water, until reduced to half that quantity. A small bit of lemon-peel, mace, and sweet-herbs may be used according to taste. When the broth is made, strain it through a napkin, and boil up in it half an ounce of Nelson’s gelatine, previously soaked in a little cold water, pour into a basin, and stir in a gill of cream or milk, adding salt to taste.

Freaks of Memory.

THERE are no phenomena of memory more strange than those in which—usually through some illness or some accidental injury to the brain—some particular facts, or classes of facts, baffle the recollection altogether. The instances recorded by Abercrombie, Winslow, Wigan, Carpenter, Holland, and other physicians, are too well founded to admit of any doubt. There was a gentleman who, when in disturbed health, uniformly called coals paper, and paper coals, quite unconscious of any anomaly in the matter. Another called his snuff-box a hog’s head, and it was remarked that, in earlier life, he had been connected with the tobacco trade in the West Indies. Dr. Scandella, an Italian physician resident in New York, was attacked there with yellow fever. He spoke only English when first attacked, only French in the height of the fever, and remembered only his own Italian just before his death. A Frenchman, at the age of twenty-seven, spoke English well; he received an injury to his head, and for some time could only remember French, believing and asserting himself to be but sixteen years old. At St. Thomas's Hospital an invalid suddenly began to talk in Welsh, a language which he had entirely neglected for thirty years. One lady lost the memory of exactly four years, well remembering events before and after that period; and, in another instance, the lost years amounted to eight or ten. A gentleman forgot the names of his friends, but remembered their ages, and adopted that as the most convenient mode of referring to them. Another lost so completely the meaning of nouns substantive, that he unconsciously gave the names of places to things, persons to events, and so on, rendering his talk unintelligible. A lady, similarly under temporary ailment, could not remember the names of any of the ordinary things in her household. She was forced to go from room to room and point to the articles concerning which she had any orders to give, or any observations to make. A military officer, mentioned by Dr. Winslow, sometimes remembered his own name, but not his address; at other times remembered his address, but not his name. He would occasionally, with a perplexed expression, accost a stranger: "I am Major —; can you tell me where I live?" Under his other frame of mind: "I live at —; can you tell me my name?"

Corroborative instances of a kind more or less analogous are so numerous, that we need only cite a few more as illustrations. There was a man who could remember the first syllable of long words, but no others. A soldier after receiving an injury in the head forgot the figures 5 and 7, and everything connected with them. A gentleman in a similar way lost the memory of the letter F. An old French lady could express herself intelligibly in any ordinary conversation; but if a direct question were put to her, her memory seemed to depart at once, except in reference to two words; her regular reply was "St. Antoine." In another case, of a wounded French soldier, he evidently understood the meaning of what was said to him by others, but his memory could only assist him to the uniform reply, "Baba." John Hunter, the great surgeon, called on a friend at a time he was indisposed; for a few hours he could not remember any person or object beyond the walls of the room he was in. It was a painful time to him, for, without any hallucination, he knew perfectly well that his memory had in a great measure temporarily deserted him; he walked to the window, as a possible means of getting back some recollection of the outer world. An artillery officer, in 1785, could read out well when a book was open before him, but could not remember a word of the contents when the book was closed. A Spanish tragic author forgot his own writings; when reminded of them, he declared they must have been written by someone else. A French scientific man could scarcely ever remember the names of his colleagues; he was accustomed to speak of them as the authors of such and such works or papers, or as the discoverers of such and such facts. One gentleman forgot the names of the whole of his children for a time. An agriculturist, a man of extensive business and good intelligence, was obliged to use a dictionary to understand the ordinary implements of his trade; the sound of each word suggested the shape of the letters, and the sight of the latter suggested the sense, but the sound did not directly suggest the sense. A lady, after an illness, forgot all pronouns, and all inflexions of verbs except the infinitive; when wishing or intending to say, "Stop, my husband has just come," she said, "To stop, husband to come."

Another variety is what may be called perversion of memory, memory running to wildness, generally manifested during or immediately after an illness. One instance is that in which we imagine other persons to be doing or feeling that which is really attributable to ourselves. There was a gentleman, who, when thirsty, believed that others experienced the thirst; and after he had coughed, said to a friend near him, "I am sorry you have such a bad cough." Samuel Rogers, when very aged and declining, was riding in a carriage with a lady, who asked him about another lady well known to both; the name seemed a blank to him, and stopping the carriage, he asked his servant, "Do I know Lady M.?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. A gentleman sitting with his wife in the evening, found his thoughts wandering back to a lady at whose house he frequently had spent an evening in former years; ludicrously confounding time, place, and person, he rose up, and, addressing his wife as "madam," declared that it was getting late, and that he must return home to his family.

The forgetfulness arising from sheer absence of mind is different in its nature from any of the above. The man may be in good health, and may be the reverse of stupid, but so absorbed in a particular train of thought as to be oblivious to surrounding sayings and doings. Sydney Smith cited two instances of absence of mind which struck his fancy. "I heard of a clergyman who went jogging along the road till he came to a turnpike. 'What is to pay?' 'Pay, sir, for what?' 'Why, my horse, to be sure.' 'Your horse, sir! what horse?' There is no horse, sir.' 'No horse? Bless me!' said he, suddenly looking, 'I thought I was on horseback.' Lord Dudley was one of the most absent men I think I ever met in society. One day he met me in the street and invited me to meet myself. 'Dine with me to-day; dine with me, and I will get Sydney Smith to meet you.' I admitted the temptation he held out to me, but said I was engaged to meet him elsewhere. Another time in meeting me he put his arm through mine, muttering, 'I don't mind walking with him a little way. I'll walk with him as far as the end of the street.' He very nearly overset my gravity once in the pulpit. He was sitting immediately under me, apparently very attentive, when suddenly he took up his stick as if he had been sitting in the House of Commons, and tapping the ground with it, cried out in a low, but very audible whisper, 'Hear, hear!'"

An absence of mind more or less similar has often been displayed by men habituated to deep study. Domenichino, the great Italian painter, became so absorbed in his own picture of "The Martyrdom of Saint Andrew," that he reviled with the fiercest passion a soldier who was represented insulting or mocking the saint. Caracci, who was present, was so struck with Domenichino's excited expression of face, that he afterwards adopted it as an impersonation of rage. Crebillon, the French dramatist, impatiently said to a friend who entered his study: "Don't disturb me; this is a moment of exquisite happiness. I am going to hang a villainous minister and to banish a stupid one!" Isaac D'Israeli says: "It has been told of a modern astronomer that, one summer night, when he was withdrawing to his chamber, the brightness of the heavens showed a phenomenon. He passed the whole night in observing it; and when they came to him early in the morning, and found him in the same attitude, he said, like one who had been collecting his thoughts for a few moments: 'It must be thus; but I will go to bed before it is too late.' He had gazed the whole night in meditation, and was not aware of it." Dr. Stukely called upon Sir Isaac Newton, and was told that Sir Isaac would come to him directly. The waiting was long and tedious; dinner was brought in, and Stukely, feeling hungry, sat down and nearly demolished a tempting roast fowl. Newton at length appeared, and seeing the empty dish, exclaimed: "I protest I had forgotten I had eaten my dinner!" The Count de Brancas, a friend of La Bruyère and Rochefoucauld, was one day reading in his study, when a nurse brought in a little infant. He put down his book, and took up the infant and caressed it admiringly. A friend coming in, Brancas threw the baby on the table, thinking it was a book, and did not detect his error until loud crying announced it. On another occasion Rochefoucauld crossed the street to greet him. Brancas said: "Heaven help you, my poor man!" Rochefoucauld smiled, and was about to speak, when the other interrupted him: "I told you I had nothing for you; there is no use in your teasing me; why don't you try and get work? Such lazy idlers as you make the streets quite disagreeable." Rochefoucauld's hearty laugh at length roused him from his reverie. Men have been known to exhibit such instances of absence of mind as the following: Taking out a watch, looking at it, and then asking "What's o'clock?" Going to a house where friends have lived, and forgetting that they had removed. Going up to dress for dinner, forgetting the main purpose in view, and getting into bed instead. Taking imaginary pinches of snuff while talking, forgetting all the time that the box is empty. Dante went once into a bookseller's shop to witness a grand street procession. He became so absorbed in a book, that the whole spectacle passed without his noticing it; and when he got home, was surprised at being reminded of it. Hogarth, dining one day with friends, rose in the middle of dinner, turned his chair round, sat down with his back to the company, meditated awhile, resumed his proper position, and went on with his dinner. Sheridan, conversing with his sister one day, unconsciously cut up into shreds an elegant pair of ruffles she had just made for her father. A gentleman invited to dinner sat in the drawing-room alone for awhile; by the time the lady of the house appeared, she found that he, in a brown study, had picked a hearth-brush to pieces. He had the denuded handle in his hand, while his dress was covered with the hairs.

The Prose of Knitting.

MACHINERY bids fair to supplant our fingers in many branches of industry, notably in domestic handiwork. Needlework, for instance, is not, indeed, entirely taken out of our hands by the sewing-machine, but those parts requiring the greatest nicety of finger-work and exactitude of eye are now done infinitely better by it in both these respects. All kinds of embroidery are now made so well and so rapidly by machinery that the old and tedious process of embroidering by hand on muslin is a thing of the past. Edgings and trimmings of all kinds are cheap, pretty, and abundant, and have ousted tatting and crochet.

KNITTING still retains its place in the list of feminine handiworks. There is a knitting-machine, and we believe it does its work well, though as yet its high price puts it out of the reach of all but the well-to-do, who do not need its help so much. We cannot, however, carry our knitting-machines about with us, into the thousand-and-one places to which we take our four steel pins and ball of wool—into the garden, into the lecture-hall and concert-room, to the railway-station, in the train, on board the steamer, in the pleasure-boat—in short, almost anywhere and everywhere. You can take your knitting, but you cannot take your knitting-machine. Moreover, the one is noisy, the other is silent. We may knit while we chat with our friends over their kettle-drum, but we could not venture to drown their voices with the buzzing hum of a machine. "Gain time," the canny North-folk call it, when you get a little work done in time otherwise unoccupied. We know a lady who always brings out her knitting on the arrival of visitors, be they duchesses or farmers' wives, to talk Court Circular or poultry and butter. It matters not; out comes the knitting—or rather, it is always out, ready to be taken up at once. The farmeresses are occasionally affronted at the want of respectful idleness exhibited, the duchesses never. Her good example has set this fashion in many houses, and by this simple means many a round of knitting is "gained." No one talks or enjoys her tea the less—rather the reverse, for the fact of the fingers being occupied removes an unhappy consciousness that valuable time is being too often wasted in mere desultory chat.

THERE are several recognised standards of knitting amongst expert and experienced knitters—the German, the French, and the English. English knitters hold the left hand over the needle, the point between the finger and thumb. The right-hand needle is laid over the hand, between the thumb and first finger, and the wool, after being twisted, for the sake of regulating the tension, round the little finger, is worked by the first. Germans, French, and Swiss all knit holding the left hand over the needle in the same way we do, but the right hand they hold over the needle, working the wool over the first finger. It is a disputed point, and probably will ever remain so, which is the better of the two modes. It is certain that the German-Franco-Swiss way is a very rapid one, but English knitters have occasionally beaten Germans and French in knitting-matches. Quick knitters can knit rapidly either in the English or the foreign way, and slow knitters do not find either way increase their speed.

THERE are several points of essential importance in order to ensure good regular knitting. Good needles are a great desideratum. It is impossible to produce good work, unless the needles used are all of the same size, well-made, of good steel, smooth, and the right length, as well as a right size for the wool to be knitted. By far the most handy needles for stockings (of any moderate size), socks, and small things generally, are the short steel German needles. Four or five may be used; they are lighter and more convenient to work with than the old-fashioned long steel needles, which must, however, be used for larger work—jerseys, petticoats, etc., where a large number of stitches are set on each needle. All needles, whether of steel, bone, or wood, may and should be accurately sorted by means of a knitting-needle gauge, a little implement made in various materials. The best are in hard steel, as the softer kinds are apt to wear away imperceptibly and gauge the needle wrong in the course of time. They may be purchased at any Berlin wool shop for a shilling. The sizes are plainly marked at each slit, and the needle is gauged by drawing it through the slit. If they pass down easily, without using any force, they are of the size marked on the slit—they are not gauged as many suppose by the holes. Wools of various thicknesses should be exactly fitted with needles of a suitable size. If different sized needles are used, even with the same number of stitches, a different-sized article will be produced, or if the set—that is, the whole number used upon the work—do not all fit the same gauge, the knitting will be rough and uneven.

SUITABLE material for the special work to be done, is another important consideration. It is a waste of time to do an elaborate and lengthy piece of knitting with inferior silk or wool. The time and labour expended are well worth the best that can be got; and the superiority both in appearance and in wear amply repays any trouble that may be given in the search for good knitting materials. One of the best firms in England, Scotland, or Wales for knitting materials, as well as knitting appliances of every kind, is that of Jevons and Mellor, Worcester Street, Birmingham.

A COMPARATIVELY new stocking-wool has been lately introduced, the "Sicilian," which combines fineness, lightness, softness, and yet great durability, in the most perfect way. It is unsurpassed for ladies' and children's stockings. It takes needles No. 18; the thread, though fine, is not tender, and is exceedingly pleasant knitting.

AN excellent top to a long stocking, in lieu of the old clumsy two inches of ribbing, is one invented by a knitting friend, who kindly gives permission to insert it here. Cast on the required number of stitches on each needle, and knit twelve rows plain, then one row of holes, thus: thread forward, take two together, repeat all round; then twelve more plain rows; double down the knitting at the holes, and knit a round, taking one stitch of the first cast on round, with each stitch of the round on the needles; then proceed with the plain knitting in the usual way. You will then have a flat hem formed at the top of the stocking, something like that of a woven stocking, only much firmer and stronger, calculated to resist any amount of wear and tear. This is a charming invention for children's long stockings, which, from being so constantly pulled up, wear out at the top first. It is also well adapted for the bottom of knitted petticoats, boys and girls' jerseys, etc. It is not suitable for socks, as the ribbed tops being elastic serve to keep up the garterless short stocking. In order to make the ribbing really elastic and firm, it should always be knitted on needles one size smaller than the rest of the sock; i.e. if the sock is knitted with No. 15 needles, the ribbing should be knitted with No. 16. After knitting each row, the work should be pulled out lengthwise, taking hold of the needles with one hand and the ribbing with the other, this ensures great elasticity as well as evenness, and soon becomes such a mechanical routine as to consume a mere trifle of extra time.

FOR ladies' stockings the most suitable wools are Sicilian, Rutland, fine German Fingering, Super Scotch ditto. For silks, Spun Silks and pure Knitting Filoselle are the best. A very nice, even, and durable cotton is the Filanfer Cotton, sold in quarter-pound skeins, and in all fast colours and mixtures. All these, both for silk and wool, take No. 17 needles. For gentlemen's hosiery, in thick materials for knickerbocker-stockings and shooting-socks, the most serviceable wools are the Scotch Fingerings, Irish Yarn, and Alloa Yarn; the needles should be No. 15; for the ribbed part, No. 16. For socks and finer wear, Cyprus Yarn, Camel's-hair Yarn, German Fingering, and the finer Scotch Fingerings are very suitable, with needles No. 16, and No. 17 for the ribbing. For children's stockings and socks, the Scotch and German Fingerings, Worcester Knitting, Rutland Yarn, and Scoured Welsh Yarn are all good for strong wear and older children. For little ones, Sicilian Ladies' Wool is softer and finer, and very little more trouble to knit. No. 16 needles for any but Sicilian and Rutland, which require, the former No. 18, the latter No. 17 needles. For babies' socks, white Sicilian is the very best material that can be used in wool, as it does not shrink, and this, where such constant washing is required, is a great consideration. Babies' socks should always be knitted on pins one size larger than you would generally use for the wool, to prevent any shrinking, which naturally takes place sooner in a tightly-knitted sock. Andalusian wool is also much used for babies' and small children's wear, also Filoselle and Lady Betty; but we have never found any wash so well and knit so evenly and true as Sicilian. For shawls, squares, and other fancy work, the different wools are legion. Berlin is a good old-fashioned favourite; Shetland also, with the new mixture, which is partly cotton, and washes better than pure Shetland, but lacks its delicious thorough softness. There is a large variety of fleecy wools of different thicknesses, from six-fold to twelve-fold. Berlin Fingering is a newer class of wool, Zenobia a very soft close wool, and Zephyr fleecy. Andalusian, Pyrenees, Ice Wool, and a very useful wool called Petticoat Yarn, with Peacock Fingering in all colours, are the best for the woollen petticoats.

MANY persons after spending a good deal of time and labour upon the knitting of Shetland and other fine woollen shawls, especially white ones, are vexed to find how soon they sully, and how badly they wash. They quickly soil, it is true, but with the following recipe they need not wash badly, and should look new again after each wash:

Shred two ounces of pure white curd soap in fine shavings into two quarts of clean soft water, in a perfectly bright brass pan, set it on the stove, and stir, till the soap is entirely dissolved, with a bit of clean white wood; pour it into a bath, add cold soft water, enough to make it just perceptibly warm, put in the shawl, move and rub it gently between the hands in the water, but use no soap. Continue moving it about until it looks white and clean, then gently squeeze it (do not open or spread it out, as this breaks and strains the delicate fibre of the wool) and lift it into another bath of clear, cold, soft water, rinse it up and down, not too high, changing the water until it is quite free from soap. When quite clear, squeeze it between the hands and dip it into another basin, in which one tablespoonful of dissolved gum arabic has been diluted in one quart of soft water, wet every part thoroughly, squeeze gently between the hands, and then clap it softly in a clean, dry, white towel, pin a clean sheet on to an unused bed or on the carpet, lay the shawl upon it, pull it cautiously and gently out to its right shape and size, and pin it all round, leaving it to dry by degrees, covered with another sheet. All articles knitted of Shetland wool, or of any soft fine wool, either shawls or veils, should be finished by dipping them in weak gum arabic water as above. It gives them the necessary stiffness required to keep their shape.

SHETLAND veils, so easy to knit, and so far superior when knitted by hand both in size and quality, should all go through this process, even the black ones. A very pretty, useful stitch for a Shetland veil, especially if great warmth is desired, is to cast on any number of stitches divisible by three, knit one, thread forward, take two together for the whole row, purl the back or return row, and so on till the veil is of the right size. A few plain stitches at either end make it firmer and squarer.

LITTLE cases made to secure the points of the needles when not working are an admirable invention, and save many lost needles. They are made in ormolu, ivory, mother-o'-pearl, oxydised and frosted silver, porcelain and carved wood, in every variety of fantastic forms.

A GOOD plan to prevent the needles from rusting in an unused piece of knitting, is to run the stitches on to a thread, and remove the needles altogether. The store of knitting-needles should be kept in a case. These are readily made of American leather, lined with silk or print, stitched in divisions an inch wide, and the numbers marked distinctly over each division, with a pocket provided for the gauge.

Good Things.

GOOD things said at public dinners are often quickly forgotten. The following lively descriptions of the failure of their artistic aspirations, given at the dinner of the Royal Academy of Arts, by the Earl of Granville and Mr. James Russell Lowell, deserve a better fate. Lord Granville said :

"It may be said that it requires no eloquence to make a good speech on a subject which you understand well. But here, again, I am in a difficulty. Whatever my natural artistic powers may have been, they have been sadly discouraged in youth and in middle age. I took lessons in drawing at school. I brought back, with the assistance of a kind and attentive drawing-master, a beautiful drawing of a church. I remember well the pride of the family circle; but it had its fall when, upon being asked to reproduce the sketch, I found it impossible to do so in the absence of my master. I found myself later at Rome, at an age which I then thought old, which I now think very young. I was intoxicated by the artistic atmosphere of the place. I sought out an eminent artist, who I knew was sometimes induced to give lessons. I asked him whether I was too old seriously to study drawing. He answered that he had known persons who had begun when older, and who had met with complete success. My first lesson was as good as settled when he put a piece of paper and pencil in my hand, and requested me to draw something out of my own head. I immediately produced and handed to him with some satisfaction a pretty little composition. If I remember right there was a cottage, a silver fir, and a bush. The eminent artist was so much pleased with the perfection I had already attained that he handed it back with the observation that, on the whole, he advised me not to take lessons."

Following Lord Granville Mr. Lowell said :

"I do not know that my own artistic experience can compare with that of Her Majesty's Principal Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which almost tempts one to parody a line of Pope, and say,

'How great an artist was in Granville lost !'

But I remember an achievement of my own youth in some respects comparable with his own. I, too, began the art of design, and I was set by my teacher to make a drawing of a bathing-house in the neighbourhood where I lived. I succeeded, I thought, pretty well with my sketch, but it occurred to me that I could improve it by putting in a moon, which I did without much reference to what had gone before. When my teacher saw it he said : 'I must compliment you on having performed a feat which none of the great artists of the past have ever equalled. You have made moonbeams come round the corner.'

Another extract from a speech of Earl Granville's is too good to be neglected :

"I was once acquainted with a very eminent foreign diplomatist, a man of great ability. His sovereign was a man of strong will, and the heir-apparent, who might succeed any day, fell in love with a charming princess, but the father raised great objections to the match. My friend the diplomatist was called upon to write a memorandum on the subject. He nearly died of it, but he performed the task, and, having performed it, he took the memorandum to a very intelligent friend of his, and begged him to tell him whether he entirely agreed with the opinions expressed in it. His friend read the memorandum, returned it to the diplomatist, and said : 'I cannot accede to your request, because, after reading it most carefully, I have not the slightest idea what your opinions upon the subject are.' Now, I cannot help thinking that Sir Stafford Northcote, looking at his speeches of last week, must have consulted some intelligent friend of his, and asked him whether he agreed with his views. That intelligent friend no doubt answered that he had known Sir Stafford as a good free trader all his life, but that, so far as his speeches were concerned, he had not the remotest idea what his views now were. The scene doubtless ended by Sir Stafford clasping his intelligent friend in his arms, always supposing the friend to have been a gentleman."

Economy.

ALL economy, whether of states, households, or individuals, may be defined to be the art of managing labour. The world is so regulated by the laws of Providence, that a man's labour, well applied, is always amply sufficient to provide him during his life with all things needful for him, and not only with those, but with many pleasant objects of luxury; and yet further, to procure him large intervals of healthful rest and serviceable leisure. And a nation's labour, well applied, is in like manner amply sufficient to provide its own population with good food and comfortable habitation; and not with those only, but with good education besides, and objects of luxury, art treasures such as those you have around you.

But by those same laws of Nature and Providence, if the labour of the nation or of the individual be misapplied, and much more if it be insufficient—if the nation or man be indolent and unwise—suffering and want result, exactly in proportion to the indolence and improvidence, to the refusal of labour, or to the misapplication of it.

Wherever you see want, or misery, or degradation in this world about you, there, be sure, either industry has been wanting, or industry has been in error. It is not accident, it is not Heaven-commanded calamity, it is not the original and inevitable evil of man's nature which fill your streets with lamentation, and your graves with prey. It is only that, when there should have been providence, there has been waste; when there should have been labour, there has been lasciviousness; and wilfulness, when there should have been subordination.

Now, we have warped the word "economy" in our English language into a meaning which it has no business whatever to bear. In our use of it, it constantly signifies merely sparing or saving: economy of money means saving money; economy of time, sparing time, and so on. But that is a wholly barbarous use of the word—barbarous in a double sense, for it is not English, it is bad Greek, and it is worse sense. Economy no more means saving money than it means spending money. It means the administration of a house; its stewardship; spending or saving, that is, whether money or time, or anything else, to the best possible advantage. In the simplest and clearest definition of it, economy, whether public or private, means the wise management of labour; and it means this mainly in three senses; viz., first, applying your labour rationally; secondly, preserving its produce carefully; lastly, distributing its produce seasonably.—Ruskin.

Pianoforte Studies.

THE amateur musician is apt, as a rule, to think a great deal about pieces, but very little about studies. Amongst professionals, on the contrary, the studies are always the great point of interest, and test of proficiency. If you see two Academy students talking together, the first thing they will ask one another will be, "What studies are you learning?" and they will guess how far advanced their fellow-student is according to the nature of the reply—whether it is the studies of Heller, or Moscheles, or of Chopin, that they happen to be learning at the time. And when professional students meet together, it is rarely pieces that they play; they never show off to one another, or play the ear-tickling melody, or the effective but easy variations that bring down the applause in the concert-room—no, these things are for the public who do not know "how it is done;" when they are with their compeers, the question is always "Can you play such and such a study in Chopin's Second Book?" and they play these hard-and-fast things, in which no deception is possible, and where execution can only be gained as the fruit of hard work. To play difficult studies well is the one thing one student admires in another—the one thing to which he will accord the most hearty and ungrudging praise.

STUDIES are the bricks with which you build your house, the materials with which you found your style of playing. All great pianists have been indefatigable players of studies, and many an amateur would be astonished to see the piles of books of studies that these hard workers have been through. As a rule, the studies are the weak part in an amateur's practice; he will work at the interesting sonata, or at the pretty light piece that will be so useful to play out, but he will almost invariably slur over his exercises for some reason or another. But nobody can play well if they do not take pains with their studies; book after book must be gone through, and style after style acquired; there is so much to learn, and there is no single difficulty in piano-playing that has not been made the subject of a study by some composer or another, therefore it behoves the pianist to be up and doing, and to work very hard and persistently at these difficult things which will make everything else seem easy to him by comparison.

FIRST come the simpler exercises, dealing chiefly with the rudimentary difficulties, but very useful and necessary all the same. "Czerny's 101" belong to this category, and are considered by experienced masters to be the best things of their kind ever written. After a long course of these, Cramer's Studies, dry as they are, will come as a kind of relief. Old-fashioned they may appear, but they are excellently written, and every one in a different style. The "Étude de Vélocité" is another good book of studies, and the good to be got from them is very great. But it is better not to give them to any pupil who is very slow at reading music, as there is so little melody to catch hold of, and if too much time is spent in mastering the notes no good is got out of them. They are just studies of scale passages put into different forms, and are extremely beneficial to the execution. People say that if you could play the "Étude de Vélocité" with a metronome you could play anything, but there is hardly a pianist who could do it. It is so hard to get all the passages up to time.

THE student has every occasion to be diligent and energetic in getting through these earlier books of studies, for even when he is safely through these, how many are the difficulties that await him! There are the ponderous books of Moscheles, there are the preludes and fugues of Bach, and then as a prelude to the more modern style of pianoforte playing there are the tremendous studies of Henselt, Chopin, and Liszt. All of these present enormous difficulties, both of reading and playing, all of them positively must be gone through if the player aims at the performance of high-class works of other kinds. About each of these books we shall have a little word to say.

WHEN once a player has mastered the rudimentary difficulties of Czerny and Cramer, the best thing to put him to is the first of the two books of studies by Moscheles. They are very dry, and tiresome to read, but the good that is to be got out of them is incalculable.

No player could go through them without gaining strength of fingers from their performance, and that is the great thing in playing, for strength is elasticity. There are twelve studies in this book, all carefully fingered, and all useful for curing some defect or another. The first one is good for acquiring strength and a fluent touch. The second is one of the best studies for playing spread-chords ever written. So many players seem completely upset when they come, in the course of a piece, to a few chords that have to be "spread." They nearly always begin too late, so that the last note of the chord comes long after the beat, instead of exactly upon it, and the emphasis is given to the bottom note instead of to the top one. Moscheles's second study is an excellent one for curing this tendency, written as it is entirely in spread-chords throughout, sometimes for one hand singly, sometimes for both hands together.

THE third study is for the practice of the chromatic scale interspersed with double notes. It is extremely fatiguing, and few people will commence it without a groan. However, like many other disagreeable things, one has the satisfaction of knowing it is extremely "good" for one, but there is a sprightliness about the tone of the composition, and a cheerfulness in the way it sets off for a fresh horrible run after balancing itself, so to speak, for a moment, on a less difficult bar, that is almost aggravating in its absurd pretence of freshness. It recalls the piquettes and bounds that the tight-rope dancer gives when he leaves the circus, and tries to demonstrate that he is not at all tired.

PASSING over Number Four, of which the time is the chief difficulty, we arrive at the fifth, which is a study for playing pieces in the style of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words." It should be studied with a due regard to the part-playing, and when proper feeling is inserted, it will be found to be a very charming and pathetic composition. Number Six is marked Allegro Giocoso, and must be played smartly. It is chiefly remarkable for the awkward way in which the double notes come in—just on that part of the bar where it is most difficult to play them. It seems rather a grim pleasantry when we are adjured by Mr. Moscheles in a foot-note to perform these difficulties so as to maintain throughout an apparent character of "ease and playfulness!" The other exercises in this book are equally useful. Number Seven will be found extremely efficacious for mastering the shakes and turns which appertain to music of the "powder and bag-wig" period, and the Octave Study on page thirty-six will be found interesting to play, which is more than can be said of most of the studies in octaves one comes across in the course of one's experience.

Household Gardening.

A MILD, pleasant autumn and winter is often followed by a term of wet, frosty, sleety, and generally inclement weather, and when such prevails, it will always be wise policy to keep off the land. Some light, porous soils work freely shortly after a shower, but the majority remain unkind and adhesive for a considerable time. Whenever they are in that condition and cling to the boots of the workman and his spade like glue, let them alone, as ground in that state can never be worked profitably. At the same time, whenever the surface is moderately dry let no opportunity pass for completing the digging of vacant ground, as the more fully it is exposed to the ameliorating action of the frost and air, the more fertile it will become and the less infested with grubs and insects that are so inimical to crops. Also, except on very wet days or during frost, let planting be proceeded with.

USEFUL ORNAMENTAL TREES.

Last week we referred to some trees which by their attractiveness of habit, blossoms, and fruit, are perfectly appropriate for associating with evergreens in shrubby borders, provided, as is often the case, that a separate plot of ground cannot be devoted to them. A few other varieties may now be named.

THE SIBERIAN CRAB.

Although belonging to the same genus as the Apple, the Siberian Crab has no resemblance to that fruit, and those, therefore, who are not acquainted with the tree under notice, must not associate it with the sour and not enticing Crab of the hedgerows.

The Siberian Crab is in appearance much more like a Cherry than an Apple. It is, indeed, often called the Cherry Apple on account of its small bright scarlet fruits that are produced in abundance.

The tree never attains a large size, but forms a round elegant head, not unlike that of a medium-sized Cherry-tree. In the spring the flexible branches are wreathed with pretty blossoms which render the tree decidedly attractive, while it is even more striking in the autumn when all aglow with its harvest of fruit.

The tree is very hardy, as might be expected, since it is a native of Siberia, and it grows well in any ordinary garden-soil in which Lilacs, Laburnums, and such like flowering shrubs flourish.

In Siberia the fruit of the Cherry Apple is largely employed for making punch, that is much enjoyed; but in England it is used as a preserve, and by most persons is regarded as excellent. It also makes a pretty dish for the dessert-table when freshly gathered, and its sparkling sub-acid flavour is refreshing to many palates.

There are not many gardens in which ornamental trees and flowering shrubs are grown in which a Siberian Crab might not be planted with advantage; yet it is absent from the majority, and this is the more to be regretted, since trees can be had from any good nursery at a trifling cost.

THE MORELLO CHERRY.

Few trees are more beautiful than this, either in spring or summer, while none bears more freely; the fruit, moreover, usually escaping the ravages of birds.

The Morello is a small-growing tree. Grown as a standard it forms a compact weeping head, and as the fruit is borne on the young shoots the branches require no pruning.

Many trees are also grown as dwarf bushes—that is, are grafted on stems not more than a foot high, and in this form are suitable for many positions where standards would be incongruous.

The variety under notice is often called the Brandy Cherry, because the fruit is not only preserved in brandy, and then coated with sugar, and used at dessert, but the juice of the fruit is mixed with the spirit and cherry brandy is made.

THE MAY DUKE CHERRY.

Sweet cherries are often grown in pleasure grounds for the beauty and profusion of their blossom mainly, as there is not much certainty of ripe fruit being gathered except by birds, unless the trees are netted, or in positions not much frequented by our feathered friends.

The variety named is not selected because it is the richest and best, for in that respect several others excel it; but is chosen on account of its even, compact, and upright habit of growth, that renders it suitable for associating with shrubs, over which more vigorous and spreading growers might encroach inconveniently. This and other kinds of dessert Cherries are equally adapted for training to walls, which they cover usefully and ornamentally.

DAMSONS.

Favourites with almost everybody, it is a matter of surprise that both purple and yellow Damsons are not seen in every garden in which space can be found for Hawthorns and other spring flowering trees whose blossoms are not followed by useful fruit.

In the spring, Damson trees are densely covered with blossoms, in some years each tree resembling a huge white bouquet. In this respect they compare favourably with most other flowering trees that are planted for ornament, while in the autumn the former are rendered more attractive still when heavily laden with clusters of purple and yellow fruit.

In many parts of Kent Damson-trees are planted at intervals of twenty yards or so in the hedgerows that separate fields. Thousands of trees are thus grown, and both in spring and autumn present an appearance not soon forgotten by persons who see them for the first time.

Damson-trees are equally ornamental and useful when associated with shrubs and evergreens in the borders by the sides of carriage-drives, or in the marginal strips that surround the enclosures of less pretentious dwellings.

For this purpose, undoubtedly the best variety is that known as the Cluster, because the trees never attain a large size, while they are compact in habit, fitting them admirably for gardens where space is limited. This variety is, moreover, an enormous bearer of small dark fruit, which is highly esteemed for preserving.

Considerably larger is the fruit of the Prune Damson, but the crops are rarely heavy, while the tree, being a strong and spreading grower, needs more space than can often be found in villa gardens. This is a tree for the orchard rather than the garden, and those who have the requisite space and desire large fruit may plant it, but, as before observed, the smaller kind is generally preferable.

Yellow Damsons are always admired when the trees are covered with the amber grape-like fruit. The fruit is also excellent both for tarts and preserves, and for the first-named, is not the less acceptable because it will often hang on the trees, if permitted, till November, and after most of the leaves are blown from the branches.

For the purpose indicated—beauty with utility, the trees above-named should be planted more freely, and positions can be found for them in gardens innumerable. We have other trees to refer to, including some of the most beautiful blossoming Apples, the flowers of which are not excelled in attractiveness by many rare tropical plants.

EARLY PEAS.

Of all early vegetables, fresh Green Peas are the most universally esteemed, and the earlier they are, the more they are prized by the growers. For affording the very first gatherings, seed is often sown in November, but there is always risk of the plants being injured during the winter.

The present is the safe time for sowing, and no time should be lost in procuring seed. A sheltered position is desirable and free porous soil. The best variety that requires sticks three feet high is William the First, and the rows should be four feet asunder. The best dwarf variety requiring no sticks, or very short ones, is the American Wonder, and the rows may be eighteen inches apart.

Prepare flat-bottomed drills three inches wide and two inches deep, scatter the seed regularly over them with spaces of about half an inch between the Peas, then cover with light soil, and the work is done. Where mice abound, the Peas may with advantage be sprinkled with paraffin before being placed in the drills, and they will usually be safe from the depredations of these enemies.

Odds and Ends.

PAUL SIRAUDIN, confectioner and playwright, who died lately at the age of seventy-two years, was one of the authors of the libretto of "La Fille de Madame Angot." He wrote in all some eighty plays and opera librettos, was one of the brightest wits and practical jokers in Paris, and will enjoy endless fame in theatrical history for the trick which he played on Nestor Roqueplan, manager of the Théâtre des Variétés. Roqueplan barred his doors against all authors, receiving only those who were shrewd enough to overcome the obstacles in their way. "The very fact of his penetrating to my door is to me proof of a man's aptitude," he would say. Siraudin, having been bluntly repulsed by the concierge a dozen times, saw some bricklayers at work, with a tall ladder, reaching direct to Roqueplan's window. Quickly he changed his clothes with one of the labourers, shouldered a hod, climbed to the window, and in a moment stood in the obdurate manager's presence, hod on shoulder, and manuscript in hand. Roqueplan was forced to give him a hearing. "But only on one condition," he said, "that you go back to the ladder and read there." Siraudin did so; but at the third scene Roqueplan cried: "Enough! Come and sign an agreement for the production of your play." It was that wonderfully successful bit of buffoonery, "La Vendetta."

"FATHER," she said, as the old man sank into an easy-chair after a hard day's work at his office, "I noticed in the evening paper that sealskin mantles are advancing in price." "So they are, my dear; so they are." "And you know you promised to buy me one this winter." "I know I did," he replied, "and I will keep my word. But with the increased price and the scarcity of money, I expect it will cripple me somewhat." "I was thinking," his daughter then said, as she clasped a pair of soft white arms about his neck, "if it would not be better to wait until next winter. My old cloak will do very well, and perhaps sealskin mantles will be cheaper then?" The old man groaned in anguish of spirit, and murmured to himself: "My worst fears are realised." In the morning the young woman was tenderly taken to an insane asylum, where it is believed that with proper care she may ultimately recover her reason.

GEORGE III. was the possessor of the smallest watch ever made, which was the work of the famous chronometer-maker, Arnold, and was set in a ring like a jewel. It contained one hundred and twenty different parts, and weighed about as many grains; so that the parts weighed, one with another, one grain each, the balance-wheel and pinion weighing only the seventeenth part of a grain. Of course ordinary tools were useless for such delicate work, and Arnold had to make a special set of implements for it. The king was so pleased with the wonder that he rewarded the skilful maker of it with five hundred guineas. The Emperor of Russia wanted a watch like it, and offered Arnold a thousand guineas for one, but in order that his gift to the king might not be lessened in value, and at the same time to preserve its unique character, he refused the offer.

"VERY fine, nice pie," said the polite Japanese, bowing and smiling at his hostess. "What's its name?" "We call this 'mince-pie.' I'm glad you like it. Do you have mince-pie in Japan?" asked the lady. "Oh yes, thank you; mince-pie in my country," he replied. "Of what do they make them there?" asked the lady. A gentleman of his rank need not have blushed to say, "I do not know;" but he felt bound to keep up the honour of Japan so far as it rested on mince-pies. Again tasting the pie slowly, and with the air of a critic, his face brightened up as he said: "In Japan mince-pies are made of pears and fish."

A JUDGE was once visiting a penal institution, and being practically disposed, he trusted himself on the treadmill, desiring the warder to set it in motion. The machine was accordingly adjusted, and his lordship began to lift his feet. In a few minutes, however, the new hand had quite enough of it, and called to be released; but this was not so easy. "Please, my lord," said the man, "you can't get off. It's set for twenty minutes; that's the shortest time we can make it go." So the judge was in duance until his "term" expired.

It happened that Dean Swift, having been dining at some little distance from Laracor, his residence, was returning home on horseback in the evening, which was very dark. Just before he reached a neighbouring village his horse lost a shoe. Unwilling to run the risk of laming the animal by continuing his ride, he stopped at one Kelly's, the blacksmith of the village, and having called the man, he asked him if he could shoe a horse with a candle. "No," replied the son of Vulcan, "but I can with a hammer."

EVERY solitary kind action that is done the whole world over is working briskly in its own sphere to restore the balance between right and wrong. Kindness has converted more sinners than either zeal, eloquence, or learning; and these three never converted anyone unless they were kind also. The continued sense which a kind heart has of its own need of kindness keeps it humble. Perhaps an act of kindness never dies, but extends the invisible undulations of its influence over breadth of centuries.

THERE are some great troubles that only time can heal, and perhaps some that never can be healed at all; but all can be helped by the great penance, work. When grief sits down, folds its hands, and mournfully feeds upon its own tears, weaving into a funeral pall the dim shadows that a little exertion might sweep away, the strong spirit is shorn of its might and sorrow becomes our master.

ENQUIRE not too much into your bosom companion's griefs, nor compel him to tell all the tale of his life. Much and all will be told to those who do not ask; and you shall have the secrets into which you do not pry.

BAD temper is its own scourge. Few things are bitterer than to feel bitter. A man's venom poisons himself more than his victim.

HEARTLESSNESS and fascination, in about equal quantities, constitute the recipe for forming the character of a coquette.

THE setting of a great hope is like the setting of the sun. The brightness of our life is gone.

AN amusing instance of the terror an unfamiliar danger may have for a man whose courage in his own particular line of life is indisputable, has been recorded in connection with the history of Charles Augustus of Sweden. When he was besieging Prague, a boor of a most extraordinary visage desired admission to his tent, and, being allowed to enter, offered to devour a large hog in the king's presence. The old general Koenigsmark, who stood by the king's side, hinted to his royal master that the peasant ought to be burnt as a sorcerer. "Sir," said the peasant, "if your majesty will but make that old gentleman take off his sword and spurs, I will eat him before I begin the pig." The doughty general, who at the head of a body of Swedes had behaved with exemplary gallantry against the Austrians, could not stand this proposal, accompanied as it was by a hideous play of the rustic's jaws. Without uttering a word, it is said that the veteran turned pale, suddenly ran out of the tent, and precipitately fled to his quarters.

A FEW years ago the magistrates of a certain burgh, which may be seen on a clear day from the Carlton Hill, upon the south side of the Forth, received information of the theft of a cart-wheel. Highly incensed at the circumstance, they resolved to spare no pains to discover the offender; and hearing next morning that a recruiting party which had been quartered in the town was about to march to another station, they caused the whole of their knapsacks to be searched.

WILLIAM PENN and Thomas Storey once took shelter beneath some house in Pennsylvania from the rain. The owner came forth with great pomp of manner and said: "How dare you take shelter here without my leave? Do you know who I am? I am the mayor of this place." "Pooh, pooh!" said Friend Storey, "my friend here makes such things as thou art; he is the Governor of Pennsylvania."

WE do not know if "a cat may look at a king" in Bavaria, but criticism on royalty is a dangerous thing in that country, where an unlucky journalist has been sentenced to two months' imprisonment for having in an article expressed regret that King Louis allowed himself to be seen so seldom. The verdict declared that no person has a right to criticise the king's actions.

LORD DURHAM was about to embark for Canada, and it was said the expense of his outfit was enormous; amongst other things he carried with him being a great quantity of musical instruments. Upon someone expressing their astonishment at this, Sydney Smith said: "Of course he does. Don't you know he is gone to make overtures to the Canadians?"

ONE bitterly cold night a village doctor was roused from his slumbers by a very loud knocking at the door. After some hesitation he went to the window and asked: "Who's there?" "A friend." "What do you want?" "To stay here all night." "Stay, then, and welcome," was the reply, as the doctor closed the window and crept again into bed.

AN old woman unable to read, on receiving a letter from an absent son, asked a friend to read it to her. It commenced: "Dear mother." Upon the reader making a stop to find out what followed, as the writing was rather bad, the old lady exclaimed: "Oh, it is from poor Jerry; he always stutters."

"MY brethren," said a minister, "the preaching of the gospel to some people is like pouring water over a sponge—it soaks in and stays. To others it is like the wind blowing through a chicken-coop. My experience of this congregation is that it contains more chicken-coops than sponges."

MONSIGNOR CAPEL is struck in America by the precociousness of the children. He called with the archbishop upon a Baltimore lady, who said to her four-year-old boy: "My son, speak to the Archbishop." The boy readily held out his hand and said: "How do, Arch?"

It was at the close of the wedding-breakfast. One of the guests arose, and, with glass in hand, said: "I drink to the health of the groom. May he see many days like this." The intention was good, but the bride looked as if something had displeased her.

A LITTLE boy caught his foot in the wool with which his sister was working the sentence, "Mercy is divine," on perforated cardboard, and got such a box on the ear from the amiable sister as showed how fully she appreciated the motto she was using.

"DOCTOR," said a gentleman to a physician, "my daughter had a fit this morning, and afterwards remained half an hour without knowledge or understanding." "Oh," replied the doctor, "never mind that; many people continue so all their lives."

THE three reasons which a good woman presented for objecting to a preacher were striking ones. She said that, in the first place, he read his sermon; in the second, he did not read it well; and, in the third place, it was not worth reading.

ON a gentleman complaining to Chief Baron O'Grady that he had caught a boy stealing his turnips, and asked if he could not prosecute him under the Timber Acts, the Baron replied quickly: "No; not unless the turnips are sticky."

It is not uncommon to see philanthropists, especially of the softer sex, who so lavish the cream of human kindness on the bad that they have only the skimmed milk left for the good, and even that is generally kept till it is sour.

A MAN is always a fool. If he be young, the world says when he is older, he will know more; if he be older, it says he is old enough to know better; and when he is old, it says there is no fool equal to an old fool.

A CONTEMPORARY has an article on the mysteries of vegetable life; but it does not tell us how it is that the largest specimens always get on the top of the measure that is filled by the market-gardener.

VERY rarely, and, indeed, Oliver Wendell Holmes says never, do you hear a woman make a pun. And when you do hear the one she does make, you don't wonder that she never tries it again.

A MAN in one of the suburbs knows how to play on two cornets at once. The neighbours say they don't object to his knowing how, but he had better not try to do it.

NEVER travel without a pocket companion. A well-filled pocket-book is the best.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

ANXIOUS MOTHER.—In most neighbourhoods there are Provident Dispensaries, where, for a small payment, working people are admitted as members, obtain advice free, and medicine for a penny or so on each prescription. If there is no such dispensary open to you, take your poor child to the nearest hospital. The case is evidently one requiring careful treatment.

BUMPKIN.—What are now known as "Wards" in the City of London were originally large estates, owned by men of great influence, called "Aldermen," who gave their names to the wards, and were much in the position of lords of manors. In the time of Henry III. these large estates became broken up, and the wards began to assume their modern names, and after his reign ceased to be owned by the aldermen. For an interesting account of the "Corporation of the City of London and Some of its Useful Work," see Whitaker's Almanack.

CEUR-DE-LION.—Your questions are rather out of our line. Write to the editor of the Referee, Fleet Street, who will, no doubt, give you the information you require.

CUPID.—Try purified ox-gall with water for removing the greasy appearance of your black silk. In some cases no remedy can be found, and if the ox-gall does not answer, we are afraid you must give it up.

EVENING PARTY.—1. There are no particular novelties in sweet dishes this season. Cocoa-nut and Banana Creams are, however, new to many people. You will find recipes for them in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, Nos. 52 and 99. 2. It is impossible to tell, without further details, why it is that you fail in making your jelly bright. Perhaps you put the whites and shells of the eggs to the jelly whilst it is hot enough at once to set the former. The liquid should be tepid when the eggs are stirred in. Stone's raisin wine makes jelly of a very fine quality and flavour.

INQUIRER X.—The sect about which you wish for information were called Glasites in Scotland, and Sandemanians in England. In 1727, John Glas, a minister of the Church of Scotland, published "The Testimony of the King of Martyrs, concerning His Kingdom (John xviii., 36)," in which he opposed national Churches, and described the original constitution of the Christian Church, its doctrines, ordinances, officers, and discipline, as given in the New Testament. Having been deposed in 1728, he and others established several churches formed upon the primitive models. The publication of a series of letters on Hervey's "Theron and Aspasio," by Robert Sandeman, in 1755, led to the establishment of churches in London and other places in England, and also in North America. A meeting-house at Barnsbury, London, was erected in 1862.

L. DÖLLE.—Many thanks for the information you have kindly sent. We will forward it to our correspondent.

LOIS.—The poem is an early production of Mr. Ruskin's, and is to be found in a very scarce volume printed for private circulation. On the title-page is inscribed simply, "Poems, J. R., collected 1850":

REMEMBRANCE.

I ought to be joyful, the fest and the song,
And the light tones of music resound through the throng;
But its cadence falls dully and dead on my ear,
And the laughter I mimic is quenched in a tear.

For here are no longer, to bid me rejoice,
The light of thy smile, or the tone of thy voice,
And, gay though the crowd that's around me may be,
I am alone, Adele, parted from thee.

Alone, said I, dearest? O, never we part—
For ever, for ever, thou'rt here in my heart;
Sleeping or waking, where'er I may be,
I have but one thought, and that thought is of thee.

When the planets roll red through the darkness of night,
When the morning bedews all the landscape with light,
When the high sun of noonday is warm on the hill,
And the breezes are quiet, the green leafage still:

I love to look out o'er the earth and the sky,
For Nature is kind, and seems lonely, as I;
Whatever in Nature most lovely I see,
Has a voice that recalls the remembrance of thee.

Remember, remember—those only can know
How dear is remembrance, whose hope is laid low:
'Tis like clouds in the west, that are gorgeous still,
When the dank dews of evening fall deadly and chill.

Like the bow in the cloud that is painted so bright—
Like the voice of the nightingale heard through the night;
Oh, sweet is remembrance, most sad though it be,
For remembrance is all that remaineth for me!

LONGEVITY.—No doubt the signs of long or short life are well understood. Lord Bacon, generally regarded as the keenest observer and profoundest thinker who has appeared on this planet, wrote much on longevity. His signs of short life are quick growth, fair soft skin, soft fine hair, early corpulence, large head, short neck, small mouth, fat ear, brittle, separated teeth. Some of his signs of long life are slow growth, hard coarse hair, rough freckled skin, deep furrows in the forehead, firm flesh with veins lying high, wide nostrils, large mouth, hard, gristly ear, strong contiguous teeth. He adds that early grey hair is not significant, some of the longest livers having turned grey in early life.

QUEEN'S ENGLISH.—We are on the side of those who object to the word "reliable," but we are aware that there is some authority for its use. Dr. Ogilvie says: "This word has been again and again attacked by different writers, having been at various times stigmatised as an Americanism, as irregular in formation, as unnecessary, as vulgar, and what not. Against such charges, however, it has found able defenders, the most notable of whom is Mr. Fitzedward Hall, in his little work 'On English Adjectives In-able, with Special Reference to Reliable.' The first instance of its use, as known to him, was in a paper written by Coleridge to the Morning Post, in 1800, the expression in which it occurs being, 'the best means and most reliable pledge.' Coleridge used it repeatedly afterwards; and it has also been used by many good writers since. It is now, indeed, of everyday occurrence, though no doubt certain persons still object to the use of it. Among those who have employed it, Mr. Hall mentions Rev. James Martineau, Mr. Gladstone, Dr. Newman, Mr. Stewart Mill, Dr. Henry Maulesey, Bishop Wilberforce, Dean Mansel, Harriet Martineau, and Mr. Leslie Stephen—names surely sufficient to support any one who chooses to use the vocable in question. . . . Altogether it seems too late in the day to protest against the use of the word now. Those who do not like it can let it alone; but, as Professor Whitney remarks (the quotation is from Mr. Hall): 'We have had to swallow too many linguistic camels to want to make life more uncomfortable by straining at such gnats as that.'"

SINCERITY.—1.

Yes, child of suffering, thou may'st well be sure,
He who ordained the Sabbath loves the poor.

"Urania," OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

2. Your second quotation cannot be found.

TRUE TO THE CORE.—The tale of the faithful wives who carried out their husbands on their shoulders as their dearest and most valued possessions, is probably not much more authentic than that of Lady Godiva's self-abnegation. At Weinsberg, in Wurtemberg, are still shown on the summit of a hill the ruins of a castle, which is known by the name of "Weibertruhe," or Woman's Faith. During the Guelph and Ghibelline wars the castle was in 1140 besieged by the Emperor Conrad III., who, in his exasperation at the protracted resistance made by the garrison, vowed to put all the men to the sword, but promised to spare the lives of the women, with the engagement, moreover, that each should be permitted to carry out along with her her choicest treasure. The offer was accepted, and each woman marched out with her husband on her shoulders. The incident has been made by Bürger the subject of one of his ballads, entitled, "Die Weiber von Weinsberg," which has been spiritedly rendered into English by Mr. Brooks. See Ripley's "Specimens of Foreign Standard Literature," Vol. XIV., "Songs and Ballads."

WORLD WORN.—The lines are by Longfellow:

Something the heart must have to cherish,
Must love, and joy, and sorrow learn;
Something with passion clasp or perish,
And in itself to ashes burn.

W. R. T. B.—"Ten Thousand Wonderful Things" (Nimmo), 5s.

Only a Pink.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

It is a simple story that I am about to tell—common enough, perhaps, in this strange, sad world, where the visible tragedies are as nothing compared with those which are hidden for ever from our eyes, but it is none the less pathetic for that.

There is but little in it of thrilling incident or startling adventure, and those who seek for either in these pages will be disappointed. Some there are, however—and perhaps they are not the few—to whom the record of a life self-spoilt, in this world, at least, irretrievably, may not be devoid of a certain sad interest, and to those I address myself in recalling the story which was told to me under the following circumstances.

It was towards the close of a hot, weary, dusty summer's day, when most of the inhabitants of Tours had left the town, and the few who stayed behind loitered out in the evening, and sat listlessly and idly on the stone parapet of the great bridge. I had been detained, sorely against my will, in the deserted town. On this particular evening my imprisonment had begun to feel more intolerable to me than ever, and the thoughts which filled my heart, as I wandered out aimlessly and wearily beyond the boulevards, were depressed and despondent. I knew of no life outside my own in which to take that interest which alone keeps the heart from preying on itself.

The future was dark to me; the past seemed fruitless; the present grey as the dust on this long monotonous road, which stretched on before me for miles without a curve or slope to relieve its weary straightness.

I stopped at last, looked round for a moment before I turned homewards, and saw the only pleasant sight that had met my eyes that day. Nothing but a mass of deep-red flowers in the window-sill of a small, mean-looking house close by, but no one could ever guess how that spot of colour refreshed my eyes, wearied by the dust and glare of an August day at Tours. I could not resist the temptation, and, crossing the road, bent forward to smell them, when I became aware of a face in the window looking at me with kindly interest.

In some confusion I hastily drew back, and asked pardon for the liberty I had taken. I saw then that the face was that of a woman no longer in her first youth, who was lying on a bed that had been drawn close up to the open window. It was of rare beauty and refinement, but the features bore, alas! that sharp, pinched look which accompanies habitual suffering. In answer to my apologies she smiled sweetly, and said, in a voice which I thought the most musical I had ever heard in France:

"Madame likes these flowers, they are sweet and will refresh her?"

I had forgotten the flowers already in the pleasure of seeing a face which carried such infinite suggestions with it.

I thanked her, however, most heartily, and was about to pluck one of the pinks when she forestalled me, and with a tenderness which I can only describe as reverential, cut several for me herself, and tied them up into a bouquet.

"Madame looks very tired," she said, glancing at me with eyes that seemed gifted with a power of discerning more than mere physical weariness.

"I am rather; but you—you are ill, I fear," I answered, struck again by the lines of pain about the mouth.

"I am always as madame sees me now. I cannot move."

"But have you always been so?" I asked with interest, for there was more than passive suffering and resignation written on that worn, sweet face.

This woman had lived, she had reached the high-water mark of life's most powerful emotions; for her the worst was over. We cannot lose that which we have never possessed. I did not pity so much as reverence her, because I felt rather than knew that she had attained a point impossible for me.

"No, madame, not always," she replied, in answer to my question. "Three winters ago I slipped in the snow, and hurt my spine, and they say I shall never walk again."

She said it calmly enough. I wondered vaguely in my own mind through what storms of anguish she had learnt such a lesson of perfect patience.

I stayed with her for nearly an hour after, meaning to go every five minutes, and resisting all her invitations to go in and sit down. She drew me to her, I could not tell how or why; what the bright spot of colour had been to my dreary walk, her look, and gentle words, and gracious manner were to my hungry, aching heart.

Only when our interview was disturbed by the return of her brother, did I turn away at last from the open window, and prepare for my homeward walk. She had spoken of him two or three times already in the course of her talk with me, and I was not unprepared to see in him a man quite out of the common, and far above the apparently humble position he now held as clerk in M. Maine's office.

He must have been at least ten years older than his sister, for there were many grey threads plainly visible in his thick black hair, and though he lacked the charm that was so visible in her, I felt at once that he was a good man, and liked and trusted him accordingly. I could see what he had been to her, by the way in which her eyes rested upon him, when, after having politely saluted me, he entered the house, crossed over to the bed, and changed her position with the skill and tenderness of a woman.

My interest in the two increased every moment, and when at last I left her, it was with the permission—asked on my part with eagerness, and granted on hers with evident pleasure—to go and see her again as often as I would.

I will not weary the reader by describing how often I found my way to the poor, mean-looking abode, which I should doubtless have passed and repassed twenty times without even noticing it but for the wonderful wealth of colour blooming in the window-ledge. Neither will I wear out his patience by telling of the charm of voice, and look, and manner which increased upon me daily. Suffice it to say that by degrees I won her confidence, and she told me, as it were, in various chapters, the history of her life, which I will strive to blend together, and tell as nearly as possible in her own simple and pathetic manner.

"We have not always been as poor as we are now, madame," she said in answer to one of my questions. "My father was a notaire at Strasbourg, and his business was large enough to enable him to give us, my brother and me, a better education than falls to the lot of the petite bourgeoisie. I do not remember my mother; she died when I was still quite little, and of my father I never saw much, for I was at school till seventeen, and soon after he died, and I was left with only Jean to take care of me.

"He is many years older than I, and he had always been steady, and was far more grave and serious even as a boy than many men of twice his age. He succeeded to my father's business, and I lived with him and kept the house, and, having no relations and but few friends, I had much more liberty than is generally thought good for a young girl in France.

"I do not know how it might have been for others, but I am sure it was not good for me. I was pretty—people told me so, and I soon began to think so myself. I saw that my brother's friends thought so, and by-and-by I began to see it in the faces of those whom I met in the streets, and I grew vain and coquette, and cared more for dress and less, I fear, for making Jean comfortable at home. He lived much in his books and affairs, more than than he does now, for I was too young and gay to share his anxieties.

"He was very good to me, and gave me all I wanted, and did not make reproaches when he might very well have made them; but he did not let me live in his life, and sometimes I felt this to be unreasonable. I knew that I was something more than the little doll he took me for, and it fretted me when he treated me as a child before his friends, and smiled at my ideas.

"I know that he was often right, but I think perhaps he had it in his power to have made me wiser by raising me to his level, instead of condescending kindly but half-pityingly to mine. I know he thinks so himself now.

"I soon saw, however, that others thought me clever if he did not. I began to feel my power with men, and to use it, often without regard to the pain I gave, because it pleased my vanity.

"In short, madame, I was coquette, and from that came the beginning and end of all my griefs. I did not care for these men with whom I thus played and amused myself. They pleased me well enough, if you will, but they did not touch me, and I had too much liberty in my home to be willing to marry unless I gained something that would more than recompense me for what I lost.

"I felt in my soul the need of being understood, and yet some strange instinct, half shamefaced, half coquettish, made me hide away the very need, and seem as gay and smiling as if I were never troubled with a serious thought.

"People spoke severely of me sometimes, and 'légère' was a word often applied to me in those days, nor do I say there was no truth in the accusation. Therefore it is, dear madame, that when I see a young girl coquette it makes me sad for her, because I know that she is doing everything she can to ruin her own life, and perhaps not only her own.

"One evening in July—it was such a day as this, hot and sultry—Jean and I were sitting in our little garden, he reading, and I with my work, when old Jeanne, our bonne, came out to us, and told my brother that some one wished to speak to him. He went in, but returned almost immediately with a young man whom he presented to me, saying:

"Marie, this is my friend, Eugène Groult; thou hast heard of him often."

"Yes, madame, I had often heard of him, and I had liked what I had heard. He was younger than my brother by about five years, but he did not seem to me much older than I was, and I was quite disappointed by his youthful appearance. He was not remarkable, he was not handsome, and he had not the air of being gay and lively. Indeed, he scarcely seemed like a Frenchman at all, for his voice had a foreign accent in it, and I did not know at that time that his mother had been a German, and he himself had lived at Leipsic for many years. Neither did I know then, though I did afterwards, what a pure, noble soul this was on which I was so rapidly passing my poor judgment. But I will not try to describe him."

"Let me show madame his portrait; that will give her a better idea of what he was like than any words of mine."

As she spoke she drew from her pillow a little volume of the "Imitation of Christ," which I had noticed beside her on the very first night of my acquaintance with her.

Among the leaves lay a photograph, which she took out and laid in my hand without a word.

It was as she said, not a remarkable face, not at least in the sense in which that word is generally used, neither was it by any means handsome, yet the moment I saw it I could understand the nature of the undying love she seemed to bear him. There was a pathetic expression about the eyes, and certain sorrowful lines about the steadfast, well-cut lips which told plainly enough of aspirations and yearnings too great ever to be satisfied on earth, of a sensitive refinement and delicacy of nature that could not fail to be the cause of keen suffering, and which must needs have been jarred on perpetually.

It was the face of one whose love would have been pure and tender as a woman's, and deep and passionate as a man's, alike strong and jealous, sacrificing and exacting—one which would lavish all freely upon its object, but could be satisfied with nothing short of all in return. Yes, I could understand it all now. He had loved her only, and for her there was but this one man in the world. Looking from his face to hers, I did not wonder that it should be so.

She looked at me enquiringly as I gave her back the picture.

"It is as you say, a pure noble soul," I said in answer to her silent question. "I thank you for having allowed me to see this."

She thanked me by a quick, grateful smile, and then went on.

"Madame must know that he and Jean were camarades together at school. Jean had always loved him dearly, and had been like an elder brother to him."

"He had, even from his childhood, shown a wonderful talent for music, and when his father died he went to Germany with his mother, and lived at Leipsic for many years, studying at the Conservatoire. He had been organist in one of the churches there till just lately, but now his mother was dead, and he had come back to his native town, having heard that the post of organist at the cathedral was vacant and being anxious to obtain it."

"And thou hast not left thine heart with any German maiden?" my brother asked him merrily.

"He shook his head and smiled, and said he had no heart but for his organ."

"I do not believe that," said Jean, laughing; "but thou shalt come in now and play for us. I want Marie to hear thee. She has known thee by repute for a long time, hast thou not, Marie?"

"I have, indeed," I answered, and I too prayed of M. Groult to come in and make music."

"I soon saw that my brother had not praised his wonderful talent too highly. It seemed to me that I was in heaven as I listened to him. I did not know whether he played his own music or that of another, but it flowed like water from his fingers; sometimes it lulled me, sometimes it stirred up longing yearnings in my soul; sometimes it made me rejoice, and then again I could have broken my heart in weeping with a blissful sadness or a painful pleasure."

"We have no playing like that in all Strasbourg, have we, Marie?" my brother said when he had finished.

"I did not answer, but I came forward to where M. Groult was standing, and I met his eyes for the first time."

"I cannot tell how I knew, but I did know, and I think he knew it too, that I had found a soul that would understand mine. He made me feel as I had never felt before with any man—humble and unworthy, and yet wishing to be better than I was. I had watched his face in the dim light as he sat playing. I knew by instinct that he was more pure and unworldly than any man I had ever met, except my brother, and I had a strange mixture of restlessness and satisfaction in his presence which yet made me half-angry both with myself and him. Perhaps madame can understand what I mean?"

"I do perfectly," I answered.

"But I must not weary you, madame," she said after a moment's pause, during which she had lain with closed eyes, doubtless seeing clearly in her mind's eye the gracious vision which she had been striving to paint to me.

"After all, there is not much to tell, but from that evening my life was changed, for he was in it. He obtained the post of organist without much difficulty, and took a lodging in the same street as ours. We saw him often; he was Jean's greatest friend, and he had liberty to come in any evening that he pleased, that we might make music together, for people said at that time that I had a fine voice."

"He never said so, yet I knew it pleased him. He never paid me compliments, as others did. He never praised my dress or said a word to make me think I was pretty. Yet I knew that he loved me. I knew in my soul that to him I was the best and dearest in all the world, and certainly he was that to me. It was not long before I knew that I could never marry any one but him, and yet—you will think it strange, perhaps, madame—we often made each other very angry. He was jealous by nature—the French blood told there. He could not endure to see me laugh and coquette with other men, and when I saw that he was angry a wicked spirit took possession of me, and I talked and rattled on all the more fast, because in secret I often despised myself for doing it."

"Alone with him and Jean, it was different. There was something in him which made me more soft and gentle in spite of myself."

"The raison d'être of a woman," as he said once, 'c'est la douceur.' And with him my whole nature seemed to flower out and grow. Ah, madame, he loved me well, in truth, but he would not have loved me as well as he did if he had not loved God better!"

"But if he loved you, and you loved him, what separated you?" I asked curiously.

"He was poor, madame," she answered simply, "and I was well off, and he knew it, and was too proud to ask me to marry him till he could bring me to a home at least as good as that in which he found me. If I had been less of a coquette it might have been different, but as it was, looking back upon the past I can well understand why he kept silent for so long."

"And for how long was it?" I questioned her.

"For a year, madame, till the summer came round again—the summer of 1870."

"The year of the war?" I exclaimed with interest.

"Yes, madame," she answered, sighing heavily. "During that year I had seen him often, and loved him better each day. And yet as the time went on I cannot say that we drew nearer together. There were many points on which we differed entirely, and I think perhaps it was not good for us to live so near each other."

"We had too frequent opportunities for finding out the radical differences in taste and temperament which existed between us. For instance, he, half a German by birth, and more than half by sympathy, naturally loved the country where he had spent so many happy years; while I, foolish child, hated both the country and the people, and would not read the books he offered to lend me, if they were written in German. In his own nature there was the very same strife. I have heard since that his father's marriage with his German wife had not been a very happy one, and I think that the bitter drop was in the child. He was at war with himself and the world around him."

"Therefore it has always seemed to me strange, above all other things, that he should have chosen me on whom to lavish his great wealth of affection. I who could never have soothed him until my nature was transformed. And yet I loved him. Ah, Heaven knows how I loved him through it all!" she added, as if to herself. "Moreover, I could not understand then, what I have learnt since, that one may be a good Christian without being what many of the priests would call a good Catholic. Eugène was always the former; he never was the latter. To me, in those days, his ideas seemed very dangerous; he spoke so earnestly and even sorrowfully against what I know now to be the undoubted evils of our Church."

"I remember one night telling him at last, that I believed for all his heavenly playing at the mass, which was a kind of religion in itself, so entirely did he make it express the true devotional spirit, he was yet at heart no better than a German heretic. He did not speak for a moment, but his face grew white and set, as it always did when I made one of these speeches to him."

"Mademoiselle," he said at last, taking a little book from his pocket, 'I believe in the religion that is taught here. If the man who wrote this be a German heretic, then I am proud to be his disciple.'

"It was the 'Imitation of Christ'—yes," she added, following my eyes as I glanced at the little volume beside her, 'that is the same book, madame; I have had it ever since.'

"Of course I knew it and had read it often, as all Catholics do, but it had not impressed me with any deep sense of its marvellous knowledge of human nature. It is a German copy, as you may see, and for a moment I felt tempted to give it back to him, but, as I opened it, I observed that it was marked here and there, and the desire to study those parts he most cared for, overcame my love of teasing for the moment. He never asked for it again, and so I have used it ever since.

"Several weeks passed by after that evening, during which I did not see him, for Jean had taken me out to a little country house that belonged to us. It was not more than two leagues from Strasbourg, and Jean often walked in and out; but for me, I desired to forget the town altogether, and amused myself with my little garden, and with the work of the dairy.

"In this way the month of June passed by, and we lived quietly on, little thinking of the storm that was gathering to burst over our unfortunate country. I wondered why Eugène never came near us after our first Sunday in the country, and from wonder it was but a step with me to angry and suspicious jealousy.

"He had found someone else, I said to myself angrily, with whom to pass the long summer evenings. Well! he should find that to me it was a matter of very small moment. That he had not left Strasbourg I knew, for Jean had mentioned more than once having met him, but he said no more, and I was far too proud to ask for any news of him.

"But one afternoon I had been out a little distance from home to visit a friend who lived in a neighbouring village. Jean had gone in to town that morning, so I had been in no haste to return, thinking he would not come back till evening. It was past six, and beginning to grow cool, when I saw him—Eugène—coming along the road to meet me, and there was a curious spring and elasticity in his whole bearing which I knew of old meant that he was pleased and happy. Ah, why was I not ready to be glad with him, instead of thinking only of my own vanity, which I conceived to have been wounded by him? He came up to me as one who was at least hopeful of a kind welcome, and I could see that he was both hurt and surprised when I said carelessly:

"Good-evening, monsieur."

"Let me take this," he said gently, laying his hand on the little basket on my arm; but I answered brusquely, 'No; I prefer to carry it myself,' and I began to walk with greater rapidity.

"He did not say anything, and walked quietly beside me, but the glad look with which he had first approached me was gone, and he wore instead that troubled, anxious expression which, alas! I had the power of calling out in him so often.

"Have you seen Jean?" I asked presently.

"Yes, we came out together by the diligence; he is at home now."

"How did you know where to find me?"

"Old Jeanne told us where you had gone, and your brother pointed out the road to me, and bade me seek you."

"Why had Jean done that?" I asked myself. And my heart leaped into my mouth with a kind of terror at what I felt was coming.

"I began to hurry on still faster, but in a moment he had laid his hand on my arm, and said:

"I cannot let you walk so fast, you will overheat and fatigue yourself, and Jean bade me take care of you."

"Then it is a pity he did not come himself, if he was anxious about me," I said with a laugh.

"He did not come because he trusted me; his last words to me were that he confided you to my care."

"My faith!" I interrupted him scornfully; "Jean should know me better by this time, than to dispose of me without my own consent."

"He did not, mademoiselle, but you will not understand. I have, perhaps, vexed you unintentionally."

"I did not know there was anything to understand; you speak enigmas this evening, monsieur."

"You have wondered, perhaps, why I have left you so long without a visit, but—"

"I have not thought about it at all," I answered quickly. "I have been so busy and happy out here that I have wanted no one and nothing."

"If you knew all, mademoiselle—" he began again.

"But, monsieur, I assure you I desire to know nothing."

"Ah, but I will not weary madame by telling her of all the foolish things I said that day! It is enough that I ruined my own peace. I knew, though I would not let him tell me, that something must have happened which had enabled him at last to seek permission of Jean to speak to me. I knew that Jean had sent him to tell me this himself, and yet, foolish child that I was, I would not let him tell me, but interrupted and thwarted him at every turn, until even his patience could bear it no longer. At the head of the little lane that led down to our house, he turned and looked at me with white face and reproachful eyes.

"Do you not wish to see Jean again?" I asked him carelessly, but he answered:

"Mademoiselle has taken such pains to show me that I am not welcome, that I will not intrude upon her any longer."

"He did not offer me his hand, or say good-bye, but only bowed coldly as he went away."

"I laughed, for I thought he would surely come back next day, and that I had but put off my happiness for a few hours; and I sang gaily as I ran down the lane by myself."

"Jean was standing at the door, and he gave a start of surprise when he saw that I was alone."

"Where is Eugène?" he said quickly.

"Indeed, I don't know," I answered; 'he refused to come in.'

"Marie, what hast thou been saying to him?" and for the first time in my life I saw my brother look really angry. His eyes were flashing with indignation, and mine fell before them. 'Hast thou been a fool?' he asked me angrily. 'Hast thou wounded one of the best and truest hearts that ever beat?'

"Still I did not answer, but I began to be frightened at his tone of displeasure."

"Answer, Marie," he said at last, taking me by the arm; 'did Eugène tell thee of his professorship?'

"No," I answered shortly.

"What did he tell thee?"

"I don't know, I did not care to hear."

"Dost thou mean to say thou hast refused to marry him?"

"I did not choose that he should ask me," I answered with a laugh.

"Marie, listen then, thou art a little fool!" said my brother with a crushing contempt. 'Dost thou know what thou hast done? Dost thou know that Eugène has loved thee ever since he first knew thee, that it has been the object of his life to make a home for thee, and now that it has been done, and he comes to tell thee of it, thou canst stand there and tell me thou dost not choose that he should ask thee? Go. Thou art not worthy of him. I hope he will never humble himself by asking thee again. Go, I tell thee! I do not wish to speak to thee any more;' and he dropped my arm and turned away.

"I stood there as he had left me, I cannot tell how long. I began now to know what I had done, and to wish it undone. It was not till later that I knew what I may as well tell you, madame, now, that all these weeks past he had been trying for a post at the Conservatoire, which would give him a position and income above that which he held now. It was but yesterday that he had obtained it, and he had sought me out at once to tell me, and it was thus I had received him. Ah, madame, I wonder sometimes shall I ever be forgiven for what in my mad vanity I did that day."

"It has been repented long ago," I said gently.

"Ah, if repentance could wash it out!"

She said no more, but there was such a volume of suffering in those few words as nearly broke my heart to hear.

"I still hoped that he would come back," she continued after a moment. "Yes, I still hoped that he would come back. I thought if I had been a man I would not have been baffled by a few sharp words, and, madame, if it had not been for the war, I cannot say but that he might have come; but as it was, Heaven had ordered it otherwise. I had let the opportunity He had given me go by. I was never to have it again."

"It seems so hard," I cried, feeling an inexpressible pity and yearning over the two lives thus spoiled.

"It was not hard, madame," she answered calmly. "I have learnt to see it since. I was not fit for him, and, besides, I have not been unhappy, at least, not always. To have loved, and to have been loved by a good man, is blessed, and no one can be always sad who has known that blessing. I thank Heaven I have known it."

"But he?" I asked, feeling almost abashed before her exquisite patience and resignation.

"He is far happier where he is than he could ever have been with me. I am content for him. What makes me sad in this matter is the thought of my own sin."

I was silent. This woman, taught by that best of all teachers—pain and suffering—had learnt one of the greatest lessons that can be learnt in this life—to love without needing to be loved again. A lesson learnt always hardy; only too often never learnt at all. Yet who that has not at least set himself to learn it, knows any thing of either love or life in their highest and best sense?

"Then he never came back after all?" I said presently.

"Pardon, madame, he came, but the time for speaking of love and marriage was gone for ever, little as I thought it then. A few days passed, the only days of my whole life in which Jean was stern to me. But I deserved his displeasure, and it gave me a greater respect for him than I had ever had before. At last, one glorious afternoon, when I was sitting in the porch, I saw him—Eugène—at the garden-gate, and half in shyness, half in coquetry, I fled away to my own room, and watched him from behind the blinds as he walked up the path that led to the house.

"I heard Jean come out to greet him, and the sound of his voice; then the door closed, and I began to walk up and down my room with a beating heart, trying to prepare myself for what I thought was before me. Ah, how little I knew! It could only have been a few moments before the door downstairs was opened again, and Jean called to me in a loud and agitated voice to descend quickly. I ran down at once, but my heart almost stood still when I saw Eugène's face as he came forward to greet me.

"What is it?" I cried, looking from one to the other, for I saw in a moment that something had happened. "What is it then, Jean? Say quick!"

"The war!" he answered, with a face as white as death.

Eugène said nothing, but in the few days which had passed since I last saw him, he seemed to have gone through years of sorrow, so pale and drawn was his face.

"When did you hear?" I asked, turning to him.

"Only yesterday," Jean answered for him; and then he told me all that madame knows, doubtless as well or better than I. It was not at once that I could take it all in, and Jean had to explain it to me again and again.

"At last I said triumphantly:

"But, at all events, we are going to conquer."

"My brother raised his hand to silence me, and Eugène turned away, his lip quivering, and the tears started to his eyes. Ah, madame, what a terrible thing it is to see a man weep! We none of us spoke for a moment; then he said in a low voice:

"If this war comes, it is not with Prussia alone we must fight; all Germany will be called into the field."

"Ah, I could understand it now. France was his fatherland; he bore a French name, yet he spoke her language with a foreign accent, and in his heart, as I well knew, loved his mother's country and people far the best. Whatever issue the war might have, it could not but bring misery to him.

"But war is not yet declared," I said at last.

"No, mademoiselle," he spoke in a low tone of hopeless misery, "but it will be. Prussia will never yield to the demands of the emperor, and he will never be satisfied unless she does."

"Even as he spoke, I seemed to see, in a sudden flash, all that was coming upon us—the devastation of our fair pastures, the siege of our beloved city, the breaking-up of our home, the ruin of our fortunes. I saw it all, and, worse still, I knew that now, at least, there was no chance of my being allowed to undo what I had done.

"This was not a time to speak of love and marriage. Nay, I could not have loved him so well as I did if he had spoken of them then. But, oh, how I despised myself for my own folly when I saw his silent misery, and knew that I had shut myself out by my own act from all right to comfort him. Oh, how bitterly I wept when he had gone, and I found myself once more in my room, from the windows of which I had watched him so proudly and joyfully but one short hour back!

"The sun was shining just as brightly over the fair green meadows and smiling cornfields, but in imagination I seemed to see them ruined and devastated, and heaped with dead bodies, and I shuddered and sickened at the thought.

"Well, madame knows the rest. But a few days more, and the war was proclaimed, and the French army set out, crying, 'A Berlin! à Berlin!' I felt no doubt but that in a few weeks we should arrive there in triumph, and when the days passed on, and our armies were utterly routed again and again, I was nearly wild with grief and humiliation. And Eugène—during those days he had no comfort but in his organ. Sometimes, at evening, I used to steal into the cathedral—for I had forgotten to tell madame that at the first mention of the war we had gone back to Strasbourg—and I heard him, in the dim light, playing like one inspired, but we never met now in the old way. He came to our house, indeed, but between him and me there was a barrier which neither would or could be the first to break down.

"Alas! neither he nor Jean could understand the strange inconsistencies of a woman's heart. He could not believe that, notwithstanding my shameful treatment of him, I yet loved him more than life. It is often so, I suppose, between a man and a woman. When they most love they seem least able to understand each other.

"These were the few days of suspense and anguish before the wounded were brought into the city; then the enemy closed in upon us, and the horrors of the siege began. For seven weeks, madame, we were under fire; there was not an hour in which we felt safe; houses were destroyed, and men and women struck down by hundreds, and the sufferings of my unhappy countrymen were beyond description. Our house was full of the wounded, and old Jeanne and I were employed in nursing them night and day.

"And all this time I never saw Eugène.

"Afterwards I knew that from the first moment the siege began he had never spared himself. Those whom he tended said of him later that his touch was as light as a woman's, and not their own wives or mothers could have cared for them more tenderly than he during those terrible weeks; but all the while he went in and out among them like a ghost, his heart almost rent asunder by the struggle between the two nations that was going on within him.

"Ah, it was well that he was taken away and spared all the misery that came after, to which this was nothing—yes, it was well. I thank Heaven!"

"Then he died?" I asked her gently.

She did not answer for a moment, then went on as if she had not heard me:

"It was on the 16th of September—a Friday evening. It had been a wearisome day, and at the end of it I had crept out with Jean to the open door to breathe for a few moments air that had not been tainted all day by sick and suffering men. There had been a lull in the bombardment, and the whole street was perfectly still.

"Now in this moment's breathing space my thoughts went to one who was never very far from them at any time, and the longing to see him again, if but for one moment, to feel his hand in mine, and hear his beloved voice once more, became so great as almost to overpower me.

"Well, I had my wish, madame, though not as I desired it. I had not been there many minutes before the firing began again, and I turned to go in.

"I was very weary, and Jean bade me go and lie down for a couple of hours before resuming my watch, from which old Jeanne must then be relieved. I remember that he put his arms round me with something of his old tenderness. From the time that the war first broke out he had quite ceased to be cold to me, though Eugène's name was never now mentioned between us. I did as he bade me, and laid down, but before I could close my eyes there was a crash so loud that I knew a shell must have fallen quite close to us, and in terror I started up, rushed to the window, and looked out.

"At the farther end of the street I could see in the dim light a group gathered round something—I dared not think of what they saw. I had seen the sight before many times, and had become almost hardened to it. Why should I have felt to-night, when I saw it, as if every drop of blood had frozen in my veins with horror?

"I watched them coming slowly down the street, and I went down and stood at the door to receive them. There were many other houses in that street, but I knew they were bringing him to me, and I waited quietly till I heard Jean's voice saying:

"Art thou there, my sister? Go in, poor little one; this is no sight for thee."

"I did not answer, but I threw open the door of the nearest room, and made place for those who were carrying him. They brought him in and laid him down, and I followed them. I had not seen his face, yet my heart had told me from the first who it was.

"After they had laid him down they stood away from him by Jean's desire, and I heard one say, 'He lives still.'

"My brother knelt by his side, and listened for any signs of life, then lifting up his head he said gently:

"Marie, bring me a light."

"Before I could turn to go, however, at the sound of Jean's voice Eugène had opened his eyes and looked round. In a moment I was beside him, and had taken his hand, and I fancied I saw a faint smile pass over his face. It might have been minutes that I knelt there, or it might have been hours. I cannot tell. One of those standing by brought the lamp that Jean asked for, and then fell back into his former place.

"Was it thus that my passionate wish was to be fulfilled? I asked myself bitterly. Had he been struck down close to my door only for this? Was he going away without giving me one word, one look, one smile to show that he forgave me? I would have given my life for a word from those dear lips, but it never came.

"When he would have lavished all his tender love upon me I had trifled with him, and made light of it. Now, when I would have given the whole world for even a look, he was to die, as I feared, and make no sign.

"Ah no, not that, madame. Just at the very end Eugène opened his eyes for one moment and turned them full on me. I saw them shine with an undying love. I saw his lips part as though they would try to speak, but I saw no more, and knew nothing till I heard Jean's voice saying beside me:

"Come, my sister, he has no need of us now."

"No, he had no need of us. When I looked on his face I knew how true it was. He lay there as peacefully as if he had fallen asleep on his mother's breast like a tired child.

"The cannon might sound on now, he would not hear them. His tender heart would no more be wounded and torn in the struggle; nothing could harm him, for he was safe with God. I could have gazed for ever on that blessed face, but Jean said again with infinite tenderness :

"Poor little one, thou must not stay, he would not have it so."

"I turned away at these words, and saw then that we must have been kneeling there for hours. The lamp burned yellow and dim, and the faint grey light of dawn was struggling into the room. It fell upon one of these," touching the clove-pinks as she spoke, "almost the last left of a plant that he had given me in the early spring. He loved the flowers well in his lifetime. I have wondered sometimes whether he knew that I laid them in his hand when he was dead. I like to think he did."

"Then I saw my last of him, and Jean led me away. Ah, madame, I can never tell you what my brother has been to me since that night. It was as though he loved me from henceforth with some of Eugène's love as well as his own."

"When we left Strasbourg, ruined by the war, and came here to live in a manner so different from that in which we had always lived there, how brave he was—how tender!"

"And you?" I asked her gently, "you did not make it harder for him, I am sure?"

"Madame, I was indifferent to it all. Our national disasters were nothing to me. Our altered circumstances were nothing to me. I knew now what people meant when they spoke of a broken heart; and nothing more, as I supposed, could ever happen to make me either glad or sorry."

"I thought that my life was done, but ah, madame, there I was wrong. As long as God leaves us here we have work to do for Him, and He will never let our life be empty if we will to have it filled. I had not yet learnt that sorrow is sent not only to purify us, but also to open our hearts and make us better able to help and comfort others, and unless it does that we may almost as well not have suffered."

"And so it was with me when we first came to this strange place."

"No one could comfort me, so I did not seek to comfort anyone. It seemed to me that in my great grief I was quite alone, and I would not, or could not, enter into the sorrows of those around me. I know now that it needed just this helplessness, which of all other crosses is the most wearisome to me naturally, to bring me to God, and make me learn the lesson He had tried to teach me less hardly. So He laid me down here, and He has taught me many things, madame, in the past three years."

"That is my story, madame," she said presently. "I have never told it to any one before. I don't suppose I ever shall again."

"I thank you from my heart for having told it to me," I answered, kneeling down beside her and taking one of her wasted hands in mine. The scent of the pinks was wafted in from the open window, and she turned to them lovingly, saying :

"See how they have grown, madame, from that one little plant he left me!"

Ah me! that was the only token she had, then, of that great love, the earthly loss of which had been to her eternal gain—only a pink!

I bade her good-bye that night, and I have never seen her since. But I often have thought of her story, which I give now in her own simple words, letting it speak for itself. If, even in one solitary instance, it does not speak in vain, Marie Charpentier will be more than satisfied.

A Lover's Revenge.

I SANG thee a tender song,
I brought thee a flower of blue;
But there are thy scattered thy flowerets all;
And the song that I sang in the evening fall
As I stood in the gloaming amid the dew,
Thou hast not heard it; and bitterly
I learn that my love is naught to thee!

For another brings thee a tender song
And a little flower of blue;
Though the flower is never a fairer than mine,
Nor the tale of love more true;
Yet he hath stolen the wealthy prize
Of thy loving heart and thy glowing eyes!
O would I were but that other one
For the little space of a noonday sun,
To avenge myself on thee!

Revenge is balm to the burning smart
Of the thwarted, passionate, hopeless heart.
Then would I never a ditty sing,
Never would pluck thee a flower of spring—
Never—! Ah, would for a little space
It were mine—yes, mine—to stand in his place!

Book II.

CHAPTER V. ON SHIFTING SANDS.

As there was a clear month to pass before the arrival of the next Indian mail, Beryl Marsden resolved to live in the present, and be as happy as circumstances would permit.

A month—a whole clear month—well, one might get a great deal of enjoyment into a month if one set to work with a will. Her husband's tyranny had so shadowed her life, so often come between her children and herself, that the sense of utter freedom from such interference was as intoxicating as it was new. She could rise, walk, idle her time, eat, drink, sleep, when and how she chose.

To anyone who has known what it is to live under the rigid control of domestic tyranny, such liberty as this will speak for itself.

Day by day her heart unfolded itself as a flower to sunlight. The sorrows of the gathering years were hidden from her sight and ken, and even foreboding was shut out by a nature too frank, and simple, and content to brood on ills to come, since as yet they were only possible.

If in these days she saw a great deal of Ivor Grant, it did not seem a very strange or unnatural occurrence. His mother was always inviting her to the Court. Sir Hector had taken a warm fancy to her, and the little lads were as much at home there as at the rectory.

It was all very sweet and very pleasant. But "a sonnet without a swain, a pleasure without a pain"—are such things possible? Not for long, and not often indeed. Only the sweetness and the pleasure are so rare that it is little wonder Beryl seized them with eager hands, easing the long famine of heart and sense by a feast of continual yet simple enjoyment.

She grew very fond of Mrs. Grant, though at first she had felt a little in awe of her, and deemed her somewhat cold and proud. But the mother-love in both hearts made a bond of union between natures that were somewhat reticent and self-contained. To look at the two little brothers was as a matter of course to bring up recollections of Ivor at a similar age, and as Mrs. Grant liked nothing better than to speak of, and Beryl nothing better than to listen to, such recollections, they speedily became fast friends. To Mrs. Grant also Beryl could speak of that dim foreboding respecting her darlings, which she could never quite forget despite her efforts, and from her she met a sympathy so warm and genuine that it unconsciously sealed the bond of a friendship which at one time it seemed hardly possible could exist.

Ivor watched that ripening affection with delight. He had feared his mother might show herself distant and unapproachable, as he well knew she could. That she proved so very much the reverse seemed to augur well for Beryl's attractions, and the charms of mind and manner which to him had from the first set her apart from all other women.

So this friendship, as he called it to her—aye, and to himself—took deeper root, day by day, and, giving her a higher place in his thoughts than ever any other woman had held, yet fenced round those thoughts with so sure a barrier, that no pang of uneasiness stirred his lulled senses into wakefulness or fear.

Surely a man could like a woman with a frank, loyal liking, and no harm come of it. Surely he may find delight in her presence, voice, manner, looks, and yet hold no thought of her within his heart that is not to her honour and his own.

Alas! on how many such false foundations have men and women built up a fabric of self-deception—a palace of cards that will fall to pieces at one breath of temptation, passion, surprise!

How many indeed! But, of course, each fresh case is to be the one and only exception to all the others. The world is so censorious—so narrow-minded—always scenting danger where no danger can possibly be! Absurd world—absurd prejudices—absurd everything! save just that perfectly self-conscious rectitude, that complete honesty of thought and feeling that hides nothing, because there is nothing to hide, that can smile with calm superiority on the narrow-minded objectors, and say: "We have never spoken a word that all the world might not hear."

Very probably, but then if words were all the weapons in love's armoury, the little blind god might be trusted a thousand times more than he is, and would in all probability do not half as much harm as he does.

When once there is a subtle undercurrent of attraction between a man and a woman, when a look or a smile holds more eloquence than any speech, when the mere consciousness of proximity can send a thrill of joy to the heart of either, when so perfect a sympathy is established that not a light or shadow on the face of one but is instantly read and feared by the other, then it will be perfectly correct to say to the censorious, "We have never spoken a word that the whole world might not hear." But, my friends, it is the unspoken words that hold all the eloquence, that are set to music swift and keen as the electric current of delight each presence sets in motion.

Believe me, it is not in what is said, but in what is unsaid, and yet fully comprehended, that the danger lies—the danger that our own hearts are often the last to read, and for which they are the surest to suffer.

So that happy springtime passed on with winged feet—an idyl of peace and happiness, and tender, mirthful hours. Happy—aye, every day that dawned, and every night that died, Ivor Grant told himself that, gathering from each dawn a hope that the dying nights but verified, and laying the garnered memories of each at the shrine of the false god he had elected to worship.

Perhaps it was a goddess, though—a goddess with the grace of the spring itself in her lithe young form, and a little queenly head, whose every trick and motion he seemed to know by heart.

Of course he had only studied them in the interests of friendship. He would have been horrified had anyone told him that his heart was not loyal to the core in the service and worship of this woman. He never even asked himself, "Whither am I drifting?" and she was no wiser than himself. The calm self-repression of years was taking its vengeance upon both.

The one question was—how long would the blindness last?

Time would show that—time, the enemy, as it is the friend, of all self-delusions.

That bright April month was drawing to an end.

It was on one of its late sweet afternoons that Beryl sat in the quaint old garden of the Court, the children playing on the grass, the great elm-branches shadowing her from the dying sunlight like a canopy, and about and around her that translucent wealth of colour and sweetness that speaks out the lessons of earth's floral treasures through every season of the years they crown.

Jack and Cyril were having a game of romps with Fluff, who looked blacker, and curlier, and rounder than ever. Beryl sat on a low basket-work chair, and Ivor Grant lay stretched on the grass at her feet, sometimes talking to her, sometimes watching the little lads and inciting Fluff to fresh eccentricities.

"You have no idea how much better you are looking," he said presently. "Certainly country air has done wonders for you, and the children too. Jack's cheeks are getting quite rosy."

"We have been having what the Americans call 'such a good time,'" said Beryl softly, moving to and fro between her bare slim fingers the branch of honeysuckle that little Jack had laid in her lap. "The rest, the peace, the freedom, the lovely air—better than physic these. I am only afraid it is all too good to last. Have you ever noticed what a spiteful delight Fate seems to take in disarranging one's plans, just as one has settled them comfortably with oneself? We go to sleep one night thinking that to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow will be just as happy as to-day, and we wake and all is changed. Never again can that 'to-day' be with us in any similitude of its deep content."

"Which proves that life's truest philosophy consists in making use of the present moment and enjoying it to the utmost," said Ivor; "as I am doing now," he added, laughing, and leaning back to look at her with his handsome azure eyes.

Her own had grown dreamy and absorbed. She scarcely seemed to heed his words.

"The month is nearly at an end," she said presently; "I wonder what the next will bring?"

"Nothing worse than this, I hope," said Ivor lightly. Below his breath he added, "Better it hardly could."

"You have no idea," she continued presently, and with a certain tremulous motion of the hands that still clasped those scented clusters; "you have no idea how I dread the arrival of the mail. I don't believe in presentiments as a rule, but—"

"Then pray don't say you are going to make an exception here," said Ivor hastily. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Besides," he added with a smile, "even mail steamers are not impervious to the 'slings and arrows of outrageous fortune,' and by opposing very often end—themselves. The mail is overdue already, so you may have a reprieve."

She shook her head.

"Hardly likely. A day does not count for much."

"This one must, if behind it there is anything to dread," he said in those low earnest tones that sometimes sent to her heart so strange a thrill. "I shall keep you prisoner here. You talked of going home, but you must not. The housekeeper shall give the children tea, and you will stay and dine with us, and afterwards I will see you all home. Come. Why that doubtful shake of the head?"

"I was thinking," she said, a slight access of colour stealing to the white-rose beauty of her cheek, "how often this week, and the 'before one,' as Jack says, I have accepted similar invitations on similar specious pleas."

"And why should you not?"

"Ah," she said with a comical glance, "don't let us argue the point, unless you wish me to confute your reasons altogether, or pursue you in your own line by a similar query: 'Why should I?'"

"For many reasons," he answered gravely. "Because it is a charity to take compassion on two lone bachelors; because the children like it; because there is nothing to call you home; because— Well," lowering his voice, and laughing uneasily, "that, of course, is the weakest and worst of the reasons—I beg it as a personal favour."

She looked at him calmly enough, though her heart was beating fast.

"It seems to me I am always here. As for the boys—no wonder they adore you! You have been playing the part of fairy 'god-father' to them ever since we arrived. But, you know, it really won't do to inflict you with such an unlimited amount of our society. You would be wishing us all back in India, if this sort of thing went on for another month."

"I fancy I see myself doing that," said Ivor grimly. "Long may it be before you give me the chance. What are you looking at so earnestly?"

"If my prophetic soul is not very much mistaken," said Beryl, "I see the well-known grey figure of our local 'post' coming through the trees. I wonder what he brings you?"

"Nothing important, I dare swear," said Ivor carelessly.

"Dat is berry wicked to say," chimed in a little rebuking voice. "You won't do to Heaven if you swear. I thought you was doot."

Ivor drew the little fellow into his arms, and kissed the rebuking lips.

"No one is good, my dear—at least, no man," he said with a sigh. "I wish we were."

"Mummy very doot," said little Jack thoughtfully. "Does doot people ky sometimes?"

"Why do you ask?" asked Ivor with a glance at a suddenly crimsoned cheek, that turned itself aside with ostentatious indifference.

"Cos' my mummy kyes often and often. But I don't tink she's naughty—do you?"

"Naughty! Bless the child, what things he does say!" cried Ivor, aghast. "Your mother couldn't be naughty," he added very low, as the little face nestled close against his own; "be quite sure of that, and try never to grieve her, or vex her yourself. Perhaps it is you who make her cry."

"Me doesn't think so," said little Jack with that deep far-off look coming into his eyes which always seemed to Ivor Grant too earnest and unchildlike for those baby years. "But she's a sweet 'little mummy, and me doesn't want her to kye, and me thinks Dod loves her very much—much as me."

With which ambiguous speech he slipped off Ivor's knee, and stood gazing down the walk that led to the back entrance of the house.

"Me saw somefins," he said gravely. "Oh!" and he danced off like a sunbeam. "Mr. Postman—Mr. Postman! Oo've brought some letters. Div' 'em to me directly once."

"Your letters b'aint among these here, my little gentleman," said the old man, who knew the child well. "I've left them up t' Rectory this hour ago."

"Then div' me Mr. Dant's," said Jack imperiously, and forthwith danced back with three or four missives in his little hands, which he presented triumphantly to Ivor. "See, Mr. Dant, I've a postman too! One—two—three. Dis a berry big letter. Does you know Indian people, like mummy does—a far way?"

But it was not an Indian letter. Only a foreign one, with the strange stamps and cramped fine writing which Ivor had learnt to recognise as Count Savona's.

"This is not for me, it is for my mother," he said, holding the missive between his fingers, and looking at it with frowning eyes.

"Let me take it to her," said Beryl eagerly, as she rose from her seat and stood before him in the full deep glow of the setting sunlight.

"Thanks, if you will," he said somewhat absently, and rose too, and gave her the letter, with so strange a look upon his face that she puzzled herself as to its meaning all the time she was making her way to Mrs. Grant's rooms.

It might have been half an hour later that she returned and found him on the terrace with the boys, teaching Fluff to leap over sticks in a mimic hurdle-race.

"Well," he said, looking up as she approached, "have you decided to stay this evening?"

"Yes," she said quietly. "Your mother insists upon it. But you won't be so dependent on my society soon, for you are to have another visitor."

"Another! Who is it?"

Her quick ear caught the ring of fear and dismay in his voice, even before she read the mingling of them in the eyes that met her own.

"A friend of yours, so Mrs. Grant said. Some foreign nobleman, the Count Savona."

Had little Jack caught that suppressed exclamation echoing in muttered thunder to the lightning-flash of the dark blue eyes, he would have declared Mr. Grant had said a "very bad swear" indeed.

CHAPTER VI. THE GOLDEN SCEPTRE.

DINNER was over.

Lamps were lit in the great, old-fashioned, dusky drawing-room. Beside the fire, Mrs. Grant and Sir Hector were sitting, each with one of the little lads on a knee, and farther off, by the great Broadwood, Beryl sat, listening to Ivor Grant singing the "Maid of Athens."

The beautiful passionate words and the beautiful passionate music made her heart thrill with emotion, carrying her away from a dull region of prose and sorrow into some land of glamour, and romance, and exquisite delight.

With the last words and the closing notes she seemed to come back to herself, and, the better to hide her own emotion, entered upon a curt and commonplace discussion of the song which had called forth such weakness.

"What nonsense poets do write!" she said; "asking anyone to give back a heart, just as if it were a book, or a piece of furniture! And I wonder to how many ears Byron whispered that refrain, 'My life, I love thee!' It is to be hoped the Maid of Athens consoled herself as speedily as he did."

"And you don't like the song?" asked Ivor, disappointed.

"The song? Oh yes. It is very fine, and you sing it charmingly."

"Ah," he said, rising abruptly from the piano, and speaking with an irritation quite foreign to his usual courteous and indolent good-nature, "if you only knew how I detest conventional praise from you!"

She raised her eyes to his in surprise—in momentary forgetfulness, too, for he saw then the tears lingering on the long lashes, softening those starry depths; and saw, too, that her words had been only a disguise used to conceal the feelings awakened in her heart.

"Yes, poets are foolish, of course," he went on hurriedly; "or is it only ourselves who cannot see what sublime heights such folly may attain—what realms of beauty it can throw open to those who care to enter?"

"And suffer," she added very low. "The commonplace is always the safest. It is the brilliant hues that dazzle and bewilder, and make one's eyes ache as they gaze. The dull and sober tints are more useful, and less likely to fade."

"You must not turn cynical," he said gently; "it doesn't suit you at all. Your nature is naturally a happy one, I should think, and you ought to be on good terms with life."

"I never said I was not," she answered with spirit; "I am not so ungrateful, and," with a little unsteady laugh, "I have certainly a goodly array of the sober useful tints about me."

She rose from her chair, and stood leaning against the grand piano, turning over some loose sheets of music. His eyes rested upon her with a long look—a very sad one, had she seen it, but happily she did not.

"I sometimes think," he said in the same low, earnest voice that he had used throughout the conversation, "that you are very much changed from what you were. Perhaps I have no right to say it, and perhaps you think the experience of one evening too poor a foundation on which to base an opinion of a person's character, but I seemed to know you so well, even from that evening, that when we met again there was nothing strange about it."

"I should never have thought you a student of character," she said.

Her heart was aching, her brave, sweet eyes were full of tears. She was thinking how faithful a memory this must have been that had held her in such close remembrance for six years, but outwardly she gave no sign of being in any way moved. She looked only a graceful, indifferent woman, bending over those scattered printed sheets.

"Nor am I, as a rule," he answered. "I am not aware that I studied yours, only I cannot help telling you the impression you gave me."

"I should think you would be a very staunch friend," she said gravely. "I wonder if I might ask something from you?"

"Anything you will, Queen Esther," he said with a lightness he was very far from feeling. "The golden sceptre is quite at your service."

"It is only," she said, her voice low and hurried, "that in case my fears are realised—in case I have to leave my darlings—I want you to go and see them from time to time, if it is not too great a tax on the kindness you have so unflinchingly shown us all. At first they will be so lonely—it is young to leave a mother's care, though of course you could never quite understand what I feel about that. But if from time to time they saw you, they would know they were not forgotten, and you could talk to them of me as—as no letters could, and it would make me so much happier."

"I think you need say no more," he said gently. "For their own sakes I would have done all you asked, without that bribe your last words held out."

"I offered no bribe," she said in surprise.

"You said it would make you happier."

"And is it possible—?"

Before she finished the sentence, she looked up and met his eyes. Something in them—of pain bravely suppressed—of feelings dangerously near expression, startled her, and held her dumb.

"Yes," he said, his voice growing cold almost to sternness by the effort to steady its tones, "quite possible that I should care for anything that would make you—happier. Should I be worth the name of a friend if I did not?"

Her colour came back; she gave a sigh of relief.

"Thank you," she said simply. "Of course I may be alarming myself unnecessarily. I may not, after all, be called upon to leave them, only—"

"Only that absurd presentiment will speak out," he said lightly, as she paused. "Think it realised and answered if that pleases you. I love the little lads too well not to try and console them in any way I can."

"And you won't forget—"

"I could never forget anything you said, or wished," he answered, quite simply but quite earnestly.

"Then, as you have set my mind at rest, I will take myself and my treasures home."

"Must you go?" he pleaded. "To-morrow it will not be like this, and you are curtailing your usual stay when in charity you ought to lengthen it."

"What is Count Savona like?" she asked carelessly. "Is he really a friend of yours?"

"No," said Ivor brusquely; "and I don't particularly like him."

"Then why have you invited him here?" she asked in surprise.

"I did not do so. He invited himself."

"One of the privileges of friendship, certainly. But you could put him off if you wished."

"He does not give me the chance. He simply writes to say he will be here to-morrow."

Beryl was silent. She did not like to pursue the subject further. They walked up to the group beside the fire, and Jack slipped off Mrs. Grant's lap and held out his arms in eagerness.

"Doin' home?" he enquired. "Doin' directly once?"

"Yes, darling," she said, lifting him in her arms, and feeling a pang of compunction as she noted the pallor of the quiet little face.

"Is my sweetheart tired?"

"Very—very tired," said little Jack wearily. "Me on'y wants to do home, mummy, and seep wiz you."

"So you shall, my own," she murmured tenderly, and turned to take his outdoor wraps from the maid, for whom Ivor had rung.

"I am afraid he has been running about too much," said Mrs. Grant. "He does seem tired. But Ivor will carry him home for you."

"No, nunbody but mummy," cried little Jack with unwonted peevishness. "Me on'y wants mummy."

"But he is so heavy," remonstrated Ivor as Beryl assured him that he should have his wish.

"Never mind," she said lightly, "he is not too heavy for me, and it may not be for very long," she added below her breath. "He shall have me while he can."

Ivor Grant turned a shade paler. The unconscious words smote him to the heart with a sudden dread that for long he had not dared to face.

Walking home beside her in that silver world of starlight that little Jack called "the angels' suns," he was so silent and absorbed that she could not but remark it.

With the shelter of her child's arms about her neck, with the tender little heart beating there close and warm against her own, she felt so happy, so safe, so tranquil, that it never occurred to her through what ocean of suffering this man's feet might have to wade for sake of her and her children.

She never asked what struggle was going on within his heart, and most assuredly never dreamt of the unasked vow he had registered that very night—"her happiness at any cost."

CHAPTER VII. "ILL-NEWS COMES APACE."

THE Indian letter had come.

There it lay on the parlour-table as Beryl entered, and the ominous dread at her heart increased as she saw the well-known caligraphy of John Marsden. She put the letter in her pocket. No need for haste in deciphering those cramped lines and hard-flavoured sentences with which her husband usually favoured her. She undressed little Jack, and laid him in her own bed as he had asked.

Cyril, who was never tired, and rarely anything but merry, and good-tempered, and mischievous, had already made his preparations for the night, and took a flying leap into his own crib that somewhat startled her.

"Now read your letter," he said, settling himself down amongst the pillows. "I want to know about going to school."

With a sort of desperation his mother took her usual low chair, and drawing the ominous missive from her pocket, proceeded to read it at last. Soon—only too soon—she knew her fears were realised. This was her husband's letter:

"MY DEAR BERYL,

"I trust your health is fairly established, as it is now three months since you left this country. Your last letter was very brief and unsatisfactory, and what you say about the children is arrant nonsense. Our mutual friend, Major Crumpleton, has told me of an establishment kept by an estimable lady who receives a limited number of boys to board and educate. His boy was there at the age of four, and he is highly pleased at his progress and efficiency. He can translate Cornelius Nepos, and can spell and write admirably." ("Poor little wretch!" sighed Beryl, remembering the sorrowful, large-headed boy who was the hope and joy of the race of Crumpleton.) "I have written to the lady by this same mail, telling her you will call and make the necessary arrangements. I see no reason why the boys should not enter before the midsummer term, in which case you can return here by the July steamer. I enclose Miss Crawley's address. I have had a slight attack of fever, but am otherwise in my usual health. Don't trouble me with any scruples or objections. The sooner boys have to rough it in the world the better. In your next letter I expect to hear everything is settled, and your passage taken."

"Your affectionate husband,

"JOHN MARSDEN."

The letter dropped on her lap. Her eyes, wide and sad, looked up in a sudden despair, and met Cyril's anxious gaze.

"Are we to go?" he asked breathlessly.

"Yes," said his mother in a strange, stifled voice.

There was a moment's silence. As if by one impulse the eyes of both turned to the bed where lay that little figure wrapped in deep and dreamless slumber.

"Poor little Jack!" sighed Cyril sorrowfully.

It was the last straw. It broke down the mother's strength, and, sobbing like a child, she fell down on her knees beside the little bed.

"Oh, I can't bear it—I can't," she cried in a very agony of distress. "It is too hard."

The boy looked at her, all the mirth and mischief gone from his face, his heart sinking within him as he saw that passionate grief. Possessed by an impulse too strong for resistance, he crept out of his cot, and came to her side, and put his arms about her as in some rare moment of tenderness he was wont to do.

"Don't cry, mother," he said cheerfully. "I will take care of Jack. I won't forget what you said."

Something seemed instinctively to tell him that it was for Jack, this grief, this fear, these passionate sobs, and amidst his sympathy with that grief and wonder for it, he had no time to think of the loneliness that had before now pierced him with a sense of loss and misery such as no one would have credited, even if it had been in any way possible for him to express.

Beryl hardly heard him. The sense of desolation and anguish that had swept over her was perfectly overwhelming. All else was forgotten.

Cyril grew alarmed at last at those stifled exhausting sobs.

"You will wake Jack," he said at last as the little figure stirred uneasily—perhaps oppressed, even in sleep, by some instinctive comprehension of his mother's grief.

Those words calmed her. She choked back the terrible sobs and rose to her feet, taking the boy's hand in hers, and leading him to the seat by the fire.

But for long she could not speak, and he—wise beyond his years —waited there in silence, though the little fluttering heart was oppressed by a thousand vague terrors, and full of eager curiosity to know more of that new world into which the magic word "school" was to introduce him.

When she grew calm at last, she talked to him low and earnestly of the coming parting, and of the charge of that beloved little life whose frail existence seemed bound up in the very springs and core of her own.

If in her love for one child she was in some way taxing the youth and freedom of another; if in laying this charge on the child's shoulders, she was also laying a burden too heavy and important for its young years, she did not think of such things then.

Cyril had always been careless and heedless. It was his nature—a nature that no one credited with being capable of deep feeling and passionate fidelity.

So it is that surface judgment makes such fatal errors, so it is that in cases numberless as those errors, we pass from childhood to youth, from youth to maturity, only imperfectly comprehended, if comprehended at all by our nearest and dearest.

Beryl grew calmer by-and-by, feeling that she must face this great ill, since no law of Medes and Persians was ever more irrevocable than John Marsden's mandates.

Though she wept her eyes dry, though she crossed the seas to kneel at his feet and implore him not to send her darlings from her, he would only tell her not to be foolish and impulsive, as he had told her a thousand times before. What would he understand or care for her feelings, for the sweet fancies and sweeter idyls that were to be ruthlessly scattered at his will? He had never cared to watch the baby minds unfold, he had never gazed with eager eyes after toddling forms and dancing feet, or listened with all his soul in his ears for the faintest echo of that music which makes a mother's heart thrill and tremble with a rapture inexpressible, the music of a child's voice that calls her name. No; such sentiments and feelings as these were a sealed book to him; how then could she make him comprehend what treasures that volume held?

It suited him to have his wife back, it suited him to revel in the delights of domestic tyranny, and it was advisable that the children should go to school. That was all to be said about the matter.

The only thing that remained was to do it.

When Cyril had returned to bed, Beryl, feeling too heartsick and miserable to go downstairs again, undressed also, and crept in beside that little figure which soon—only too soon—would stretch out empty arms for "mummy." And if that night her pillow was wet with tears, and the dusky curls beside her received a new baptism of passionate sorrow, no mother's heart will blame her, or wonder that it should be so.

Meanwhile Ivor Grant was battling once again with that strange mysterious suspicion which had ever and anon crossed his mind.

What did his mother know of Count Savona, and what secret power did he hold over her that could so compel her submission to his wishes?

It was not the first time he had come on these strange visits, and after each there had been a greater difference in his mother's health—a perceptible weakness and increase of suffering; yet never had he been able to discover the reason.

At first the count used to write to Ivor, and propose a run down to the Court, but latterly he had omitted that ceremony altogether, and it was through Mrs. Grant he received the information.

Despite the count's attractions, his wonderful fund of information, and unfailing good-temper, Ivor Grant felt a growing distrust of him in his heart—a distrust that only gained ground with additional knowledge of the man.

Yet to find fault with him would have been impossible. He was so polite, so good-humoured, had such subtle deference of manner, that he could not help being an agreeable companion. Still, despite all these attractions Ivor could not help wishing him far enough away at the present time, and when he woke the following morning and remembered that he must stay at home and play host, instead of walking down to the rectory and idling with the children, or going off on one of those charming rambles, in which Beryl and they delighted, he felt most unamiably disposed towards his guest.

"I can't understand why Savona invites himself here in this unceremonious fashion," he said to his mother, as he paid her his morning visit. "I don't want him, and it's not so very long ago that you cautioned me against his friendship. Do you remember?"

"Yes," she said, growing very white. "He is not a safe friend; but he is a still more dangerous enemy. It would not do for you to offend him."

"Why on earth should I fear him?" asked Ivor wrathfully. "I've no secrets for him to unearth. I don't fear him, or any backstairs information he may possess of my past, but I do very seriously object to his dropping down on us just when he likes, and I don't understand it."

Never before had he spoken so plainly, never before had he put into words the smouldering indignation of years.

Mrs. Grant grew yet more deadly pale. She pressed one thin white hand against her heart, as if its beating were painful, and looked in agonised appeal at her son. But he was standing by the window with his back turned to her, and did not see the expression of her face.

"I think I shall give him a hint," continued Ivor ill-temperedly, "that in future, if I desire his visits, I will ask for them. I object to these self-enforced invitations."

"You never objected before," said his mother, speaking coldly to hide her agitation; "and you should remember, Ivor, that you are not yet master here."

He turned and faced her in very amazement.

"Mother," he said impulsively, "what do you mean? What is this mystery—for mystery there is, and I can see it. You, too, hate this man, and yet you fear him. You cautioned me against him, and yet you receive him here as if he were a friend. Have I ever asserted myself in a manner unfitting my position, that you should remind me I am not master? I am sure I have not. Sir Hector has never allowed me to feel the sting that your words have conveyed. Do I owe them also to this—count?"

"Ah, it is a good proverb of your country that says, 'Talk of an angel,'" interrupted a voice close at hand.

The velvet portières were swept aside. Before them stood the very man of whom they had been speaking.

"My train arrives an hour too early," he said, advancing and taking Mrs. Grant's reluctant hand. "Your servants tell me I shall find Mr. Ivor with you, and I hasten to pay my respects to both."

The pale quiet face with the strange eyes struck them both with an unaccountable chill. Ivor advanced, but there was no smile of welcome on his face, or any cordiality in his brief words of greeting.

The count noticed that, as he noticed everything, but it only amused him.

"Did I come at an inopportune moment?" he went on blandly, "or am I mistaken in thinking I answered my own summons, as they say Mephistopheles did?"

"An apt simile," growled Ivor below his breath. "You certainly answered to your title," he added aloud. "I was wondering what fancy could have prompted you to pay us a visit at this time of the year."

"I was pining for a whiff of your English country air," said the count with an odd little smile, "and then it is so long since I have seen you or miladi here. I—I trust my visit is not inopportune, madame," turning to Mrs. Grant, who had not spoken a word.

"Not at all," she said briefly, as her eyes turned in appeal to her son. "Only, as Ivor says, the country is very dull out of the shooting-season, and my health compels me to live in almost absolute retirement. So you will have to bore, or entertain, each other as best you can."

"There is something wrong here," said the count to himself. "I am not wanted by the son. As for miladi, I know her reasons; but what has come to the young signore? I must keep my eyes open."

He raised his head, and looked from one to the other with that keen, inscrutable glance of his.

"Life is all boredom, more or less," he said quietly, but with a curious distinct emphasis that seemed to make his words live longer in his hearers' memory than their purport warranted. "In the present instance I trust we only imply the last state."

Mrs. Grant had left her chair and crossed the room. She looked ill at ease, and her worn face was more worn than ever. The very presence of this man seemed to age her by years and years.

The count, perfectly unmoved and placid, watched both mother and son.

"Surely she has not told him anything," he thought. "She would never be such a fool—and yet there's never any knowing what women will do."

"Isn't that Mrs. Marsden coming up the drive?" cried Mrs. Grant suddenly. "So early, too, and she told me she could not come to-day at all. I wonder what has happened?"

Ivor turned sharply round, but not so sharply that the change in his face could escape the notice of the watchful eyes of the Count Savona. The very faintest shadow of a smile crossed his thin lips.

"So—that is it," he said softly to himself. "I see now why I am not welcome. There is a woman in the case. Well, so much the better. Another puppet in the show. I shall see her, and draw my own conclusions. A friend of yours, madame," he said aloud, "the lady coming up the drive?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Grant briefly; "a friend from India."

"Interesting place, India," remarked the count. "Your friend—is she married?"

"Yes, but her husband is not here. She has two of the sweetest children, though."

"Those facts cannot possibly interest Count Savona, mother," said Ivor very coldly. "There is no necessity to inform him of them."

"On the contrary," said the count politely, "I am deeply interested. A lady, young, and, we will suppose, fair, and with two charming children, and a husband who has the good sense to remain in India—quite the elements of a romance, really."

"I fail to see it," said Ivor, turning round, his face one blaze of wrath, his eyes flashing such fire as only languid, sleepy eyes can flash when roused to anger or revolt.

"Possibly," said the count, still tranquil and unmoved. "My fancy unfortunately has a tendency to poetise."

"And mine a strong inclination to knock you down," thought Ivor savagely as he turned on his heel and left the room, leaving his mother to apologise for his lack of courtesy if she chose.

"Your son is not in the most amiable of moods, it seems to me," remarked the count, turning to Mrs. Grant. "He did not want me to come here just now. Why?"

"How can I tell?" she said evasively as with a sigh of weariness she resumed her seat. "Sometimes I think he suspects. You promised me there should be nothing in your conduct to create suspicion, and yet there is a great deal."

"Your own fault, madame. You are neglecting your part of the bargain."

"I have told you," she said, her voice trembling with suppressed passion, "that I cannot do more than I have done. It is cruel to ask it."

"You must put the screw on Sir Hector, then," he answered calmly. "Money I must have. When there is so much at stake you can surely make some small sacrifice."

"Sacrifice!" she almost sobbed. "Great Heaven! what has my life been but one long sacrifice since first I saw you? It is killing me!"

"Oh no, it is not," was the cool rejoinder. "Women of your nature can stand a great deal. But of course there is always one resource left—I can appeal to your son."

"If you did that," she said passionately, "you would lose everything. He is too honourable to buy your silence. He would care nothing for what he lost. It is only I who am weak and foolish enough to wish to hide it from him."

"I am not sure that he would be so self-sacrificing," said the count placidly. "I can read between the lines of his character better, perhaps, than you can. Mothers, you know, are proverbially blind. And who is Mrs. Marsden?" he added suddenly, and with such startling irrelevance, that Mrs. Grant looked at him with absolute fear in her eyes.

"I have told you—a friend of mine."

"And of Ivor's?"

"What do you mean?" she asked sharply. "Is your mind too evil to credit even friendship with innocence?"

"Between woman and woman—oh no; between a man and a woman—yes; more especially when both are young and one is not free, and there is a husband in—India."

Mrs. Grant smiled coldly.

"Beryl Marsden is a good woman," she said; "and, as I have told you before, you do not know Ivor."

"Ivor is pretty much the same as other men, I suppose," said the count coolly. "He has served his apprenticeship to the world, the flesh, and—here they are, I think."

He rose to his feet as the door opened and Ivor and Beryl Marsden entered the room together.

Which?

I DID not know you, when in early childhood
You played and romped about your nursery floor;
But here I keep the portrait that you gave me,
That was my darling, when she was but four.
Two round blue eyes, two lips, red-ripe for kisses,
A little love to tease, and to adore.

I saw you first, a stately grown-up maiden,
Gold locks brushed back to show your square white brow;
The same blue eyes, but shyly glancing downward—
A formal curtsy answered to my bow;
A little smile when you and I got friendly,
Then kisses came; sweetheart! I feel them now.

I see again the day when we were married,
Your dear hand trembling slowly to my own;
I hear once more your vows all lowly whispered,
I hear, as then, the organ's joyful tone;
I scent the orange-blossom in your bouquet,
Though thrice ten years 'twixt then and now have flown.

And then, dear love, I see you with our children,
Sedate and grave, some tears upon your cheek;
Some grey hairs in the locks that were so golden;
The step so swift, now tired, and slow, and weak;
A head bowed low beneath the weight of living;
A heart that held some words too sad to speak.

The last time that I saw you—ah, my darling!
I cannot tell it; but I too am old;
I shall not have much time to wait behind you—
A few more years, then is my story told—
A few more days, and then all will be ended,
And Death's grey mist-clouds all away have rolled.

Yet do I wonder which will show me Heaven—
The child, the maiden, bride, or tired wife?
All are unlike, all lovely in their passing;
But which contained the true strong germ of life?
I cannot tell. What if this dread hereafter
Holds nothing save the rest that ceases strife!

Through No Fault of Hers.

(A STORY IN FOUR WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER I.

MR. LEIGH was seated at table, his breakfast before him. Opposite him was his daughter Muriel, pouring out the coffee, and looking anxiously towards her father.

"Do begin your breakfast, papa," she pleaded. "You are letting it get quite cold."

Mr. Leigh started from the reverie into which he had fallen, and laying down a letter he held in his hand, mechanically took up a piece of toast.

"Yes, yes, my dear," he replied quickly; "I've lots of time, the carriage won't be ready for half an hour."

But the toast remained uneaten, though he carefully buttered it. However, he drank the coffee, and passed his cup up for a second supply.

"Aren't you well, papa?" enquired Muriel. "I wish you would see Dr. Felton on your way in. You have not been yourself for a fortnight, and every day you grow worse. You really must eat something."

Mr. Leigh pushed back his plate.

"I'm not well, my child; I've a great deal to worry me just now at the bank."

"I wish I could help you," murmured Muriel.

Mr. Leigh smiled his thanks.

"I'm afraid that's out of the question; I only wish I could help myself. That's what some of my fellow-directors have been doing rather freely," he added to himself sadly.

"When will it be all settled, papa?"

"I don't know, my dear; I wish I did."

He rose from the table, and threw himself into an armchair near the fire. Muriel joined him, sitting on a stool at his feet.

"I wish, my dear," he said, after a few moments' silence, "that you would go and visit your aunt for a few days. She very much wants to see you, and just now you can't find it very pleasant here with me coming home late and tired every night."

"Papa!" whispered Muriel reproachfully, "do you think I could leave you here ill? You know I would sooner be by your side than anywhere else. I only wish I could go into town with you."

"Be thankful you can't," responded Mr. Leigh earnestly; "I wish I had never been near it in my life."

"Is it so serious as that, papa?"

"Yes."

Muriel took his hand. "I can bear it, papa," she said; "tell me the worst."

"We will hope the worst won't come," was the reply, given with an attempt at cheerfulness. "We will not meet our troubles halfway; the storm may blow over. If it does not—"

"I shall be prepared for the worst, papa."

"It may be worse than you think, my child."

"I do not care how bad it may be," she exclaimed. "Whatever happens, I shall know it was not your fault, and I shall love you as much as ever."

"Muriel," said Mr. Leigh earnestly, taking her hands, "think of what you are saying. Do you really mean it?"

"Yes."

"That, come what may, you will still love me and believe in me?"

"Yes, papa. You have spent your life in trying to make mine happy. I am old enough now to know how good you are. If the time comes to prove my love, I will not fail."

"Bless you, my darling!" he exclaimed, clasping her to his breast. "May the time never come!"

He returned to the table and began to collect his correspondence, which consisted largely of telegrams, and letters marked "Immediate—Private and Confidential." He glanced through one or two, and then thrust the whole into his pocket as John entered the room to announce that the carriage was ready.

Kissing his daughter with more fervency than usual, he left the room.

Muriel wandered to the window and saw the brougham descend the drive. She felt more than usually lonely. Her father's words had raised vague fears in her mind, and she could not quiet them.

The hour arrived for her departure to the School of Art class which had recently been opened in the neighbourhood; but this morning she felt disinclined to go, so she endeavoured to find occupation at home.

She practised for a short time, but could not fix her attention on the notes. Never had she passed such an unhappy morning.

At last she heard wheels on the drive, and running to the window, peeped from behind a curtain to see who the visitor might be.

It was her aunt, Miss Leigh. She soon entered, scarcely giving the servant time to show her in.

"Where's Bob, Muriel?" was her first enquiry.

"Gone to town, auntie. Do you want to see him?"

"I don't suppose I should have driven over here if I hadn't," was the retort.

Miss Leigh was the exact opposite to her brother. She was curt and unsympathetic, and prided herself on not being like her brother Bob, whom she characterised as a "weak backboneless sort of creature."

However, she had the respect, if not the love, of her neighbours.

"I don't suppose Bob has told you anything about what's going on at the bank," continued Miss Leigh; "but things are in a bad way from all I can learn, and I keep my eyes open."

"Papa told me that he was very anxious just now."

"He'll be a good deal more anxious before he's done with it, and so will you. He's brought you up too easily, giving you everything you had a mind for before you spoke it. It'll be a great change to you if anything happens."

"Not greater than I can bear," replied Muriel. Then, to change the subject, she added: "I am sorry I can't come and stay with you as you wished, auntie."

"As I wished! What are you talking about?"

"Papa said you wanted me to stay with you for a few days."

"It's the first I've heard of it," was her aunt's reply; "and I wish Bob wouldn't give invitations he has no right to. Not but what you can come if you like."

"Thank you, auntie; but I can't leave papa. He isn't well."

"No, I should imagine not; he'll be worse before it's all over, you mark my words. Now I think I'll take my things off. It can't be far off lunch, and I'll stay to-day, I think."

"Oh, I'm so sorry, auntie; I quite forgot to ask you. Do stay."

"Yes, I mean to," was the reply.

Miss Leigh proceeded upstairs, stopping every now and then to glance at the decorations of the house. Apparently the prospect did not please her, for she ejaculated "Poor Bob!" several times before she reached her room.

The window commanded a view of the drive. As she stood before the glass untying her bonnet, she saw a carriage turn the corner. She recognised it in a moment as her brother's. But there was a strange man seated beside the driver.

She guessed the truth; it had been present to her mind for days, and now only came as a realisation of her worst fears.

"Muriel!" she shouted down the stairs.

"Coming, auntie!"

"Look here, child," said Miss Leigh kindly; "you promised to retrim this bonnet for me next time I came. I wish you'd have a turn at it to-day. Have you a bit of black silk anywhere?"

"I'll look, auntie," replied Muriel, going towards her room.

"Don't hurry," cried Miss Leigh after her; "I'm going down to the breakfast-room."

She rushed downstairs, and met Mr. Leigh as he descended from the carriage.

"What is it, Bob?" she asked anxiously.

"The worst! Where's Muriel?"

"Upstairs."

"That's right; keep her out of sight. Quick now, get me these things."

He scribbled a short list on a leaf of his pocket-book. One of the men who had accompanied him entered the house, and proceeded to the library.

In a few minutes a small portmanteau of necessities had been packed, and the detective intimated that they must now be off.

Mr. Leigh drew his sister aside. "Tell Muriel as gently as you can," he whispered, "or else it will kill her. And remind her of her promise."

"Bob," said Miss Leigh solemnly, "you thought two years ago when I drew my money out of the bank that I was playing you a mean trick. If I hadn't done so, we shouldn't have a penny now, and I saw it then. So try and think as well of me as you can."

Mr. Leigh pressed her hand and entered his carriage, fearful lest his daughter should have seen him.

A few minutes after, Muriel descended with the bonnet in her hand, to ask her aunt's opinion on some knotty point.

"Don't ask me, child, I can't think of a thing. I want to talk to you—no, not in there," she hastily added, as Muriel moved towards the library.

"Why not, auntie?"

"That's what I've got to explain to you, my poor child," said Miss Leigh, bursting into tears, and clasping her niece.

Before long Muriel knew that her father was arrested for malpractices whilst a director of the Leadcastle Banking Company, that the bank had stopped payment, and that it was not a limited liability company. Every shareholder was liable to the full extent of his means.

CHAPTER II.

SOME eight months had elapsed since the arrest of Mr. Leigh. The trial was over, the sentences pronounced. Two years' imprisonment had been allotted to the miserable banker.

The house had been sold with all its contents; Muriel was left penniless. She found a shelter in her aunt's house, but that lady had been largely dependent for her income on her brother's generosity, and in consequence her resources were now narrow. Muriel had made up her mind that she would not remain a pensioner on her aunt's bounty, even if she had been able to endure her constant chatter.

Muriel believed thoroughly in her father's innocence of anything more than helpless connivance at the malpractices of his fellow-directors. Had he exposed them when he discovered their existence it would but have hastened the crash; by keeping silent and doing all in his power to remedy the evil, there was a hope of averting the catastrophe. But in the eyes of the law there was no difference between him and the original culprits; all were involved in a common ruin.

It was an immense relief to Muriel to receive a letter one day from Lady Pankhurst offering her the post of companion to her only daughter Constance. The letter ran as follows:

"DEAR MISS,

"Como Hall.

"My husband, Sir Joseph Pankhurst, of whom you've heard speak from someone whom I won't mention more particularly, has told me that you want a place, so if you like to come and be a companion to our Connie, we shall be very glad, and I've no doubt we shall get along very comfortably together. Let me have a line, and I'll tell them to send the carriage to meet you.

"Yours affectionately,

"SARAH PANKHURST."

It was a strange mixture of kindness and stupidity, eminently calculated to wound Muriel's feelings, but, as evidently, not intended to do so. Even the "someone whom I won't mention more particularly" was clearly alluded to in this vague manner with the idea of being considerate. Muriel read and re-read the letter, finally deciding to accept the offer.

Her father had told her in his last letter that he had some hope of obtaining something for her from his old friend Sir Joseph. Muriel remembered that once, when she was a little child, she had been taken to Como Hall for a day or two just after it had been built; she recollected very distinctly that she had been tormented by a rude boy, who was hopelessly spoilt. Her recollection was more dim of a little girl rather younger than herself, who possessed a doll of abnormal size and grandeur, which she would not let out of her hands.

Muriel would have preferred going to a house where she would have been an utter stranger, but that was almost impossible. She had made one or two attempts to obtain a situation, but enquiries had naturally been made, and when it was discovered who her father was, some excuse was found for breaking off the negotiations. Muriel began to feel what a terrible disgrace was attached to those who were connected with a felon. It was very hard to bear.

It must not be supposed that Sir Joseph and Lady Pankhurst wrote the letter of invitation to Muriel without due consideration. When Mr. Leigh's appeal to his kindness had reached the knight he hesitated some time before showing it to his wife.

"I say, Sarah," he remarked one evening as they sat alone, "you know poor Leigh has been put in gaol?"

"Yes, I read it in the paper. Poor dear man! I never thought he would come to this. It's lucky his wife died so long ago."

"She'd have made it harder for him—eh?" retorted Sir Joseph with a laugh at his own wit. Since he had been made a knight he had indulged rather freely in flashes of spontaneous merriment befitting the character he now had to fulfil of a hearty old-fashioned Englishman.

"Sir Joseph!" remonstrated her ladyship, "I'm surprised at you."

It was not the first time her husband had heard this form of words, and it had small effect on him.

"What I was going to say, my dear, is that poor Leigh has left a daughter who wants to get something to do—a place as governess or something of the sort."

"Well, Sir Joseph, I suppose you do not imagine Constance and Hugh require a governess?"

"Well, a companion then," suggested Sir Joseph.

"For which of them?" enquired Lady Pankhurst with more point than usual.

Sir Joseph laughed, but not so heartily as when he caused the merriment.

"I don't think we need find a companion for Hugh," he said; "young men pick up those for themselves fast enough, and Hugh's no exception."

"He picks up some companions he had much better let drop again," put in his mother; "a gambling, betting set, he can't get much good out of them."

"Young men will have their fling," pleaded his father; "you can't expect Hugh to be a steady old man like me yet a while. He's all right, don't you trouble about him; you look after Connie, I'll keep my eye on Master Hugh."

"Connie doesn't require much looking after," said Lady Pankhurst, "she's a dear good girl; I only wish she would make friends as easy as Hugh does, but she keeps herself alone too much a great deal."

"Hand over some of Hugh's betting friends to her," suggested Sir Joseph with a fresh laugh. "It's getting quite time she settled down with some one. Let's see, how old is she?"

"Nineteen last birthday."

"She looks about twenty-three. Hang it all, Sarah, we must let her move about a bit more; unless she sees some young fellows she can't make any impression on them. I must get Hugh to bring home someone with him occasionally."

"I hope you'll tell him to bring home someone respectable then, for those he brings here generally are the wrong sort for me; and as to Connie, she won't look at one of them."

"Well, Sarah, we're wandering from the point; how about this girl of Leigh's? Can you try her as a companion for Connie? You needn't keep her, you know, if you don't like her."

"I shouldn't think of doing so, of course. But I don't mind trying her if you like."

"I should like," acknowledged Sir Joseph heartily. "Leigh was a very good friend to me; and though we haven't seen much of each other for the last few years, I want to do him a good turn. I sold all my shares in the bank some time ago, and made a very good thing out of it, so I should like to pay him back somehow, and I'm sure he'd sooner know that Muriel is settled than anything else."

Lady Pankhurst listened to her husband's oration; but at its close, began to regret she had given her promise so easily. It was a risky thing to have in the house a young person whose father was in prison. She said as much to her husband.

"Oh, nonsense, Sarah; nobody thinks much the worse of Leigh about this business; everybody does it, but he's been found out. Anyhow, you don't imagine that Muriel had anything to do with it, I suppose?"

"But everyone who comes here will find out about it."

"Let 'em; we shall get the credit of doing a very kind action. If she's as nice a girl as she was when I last saw her, she'll be cheap at any price, and I shouldn't offer her a high one if I were you."

Lady Pankhurst still hesitated. There was a fear in her heart which she scarcely liked to put into words, in dread of calling down on herself the loud ridicule of her lord.

"Joseph," she ventured to say at last, "do you think she is a very attractive young person?"

"Why?" queried Sir Joseph.

"There's Hugh, you know, who——"

She was interrupted by a more than usually boisterous shout of laughter.

"Hugh!" exclaimed her husband, "why Hugh has been brought up to business, and knows what's what; do you think he'd be fool enough to fall in love with a penniless girl, whose father's in prison? No, no, wife; Miss Leigh's the safest girl we could have in the house."

After this decided set-down, Lady Pankhurst dared not venture on any further remonstrance, but wrote the same evening to offer Muriel the situation of companion to her daughter. Connie was not even informed of it until the letter had gone. Sir Joseph had fine old English notions about keeping young girls in their place, and Connie's wishes were of very secondary consideration in Como Hall.

Muriel resolved not to mention the matter to her aunt till she had written to accept the situation offered her. But Miss Leigh kept so close a watch over all her movements, that it was with difficulty she slipped out in the afternoon and posted her letter.

As she neared the house on her return, she saw her aunt's face peering over the wire blind.

"She saw me go out," thought Muriel; "now for it."

Directly she was in the room, Miss Leigh began to question her. Muriel had nothing to conceal now, so told her the whole affair.

"Why did you not tell me before?" demanded Miss Leigh. "Do you think my advice worth nothing?"

"I was afraid, auntie, you might insist on my staying here, and I feel I have been living on you too long already. I must do something for myself."

"Well, as you've done it, it's no good saying anything about it; and if you prefer going to live in a house where they'll treat you rather worse than the servants, it's not my fault."

"Why should you think they will be unkind, auntie?"

"Haven't they made their money, and aren't those kind of people always glad to have a chance of sitting on people who are higher up than they are?"

Muriel smiled at the incongruous images that her aunt's feelings led her to adopt. She had not smiled often during the last few months.

"We will hope for the best, auntie," was her reply.

"And prepare for the worst. How much salary are they going to give you?"

Muriel gave a slight start.

"I—I don't quite know, auntie," she stammered.

"Merciful Heavens! does the child mean to tell me that she has taken the place without knowing how much she's going to be paid for it?"

"I suppose Lady Pankhurst forgot to put it in her letter, and I forgot all about it too. But it doesn't matter, auntie, it isn't as if I had a choice of places; that's the only one, so I must accept it, even if they don't give any pay at all. And they are sure to give some."

"Let me see the letter."

Muriel obeyed. Her aunt rapidly scanned it.

"You won't have much difficulty with this woman," was her comment; "flatter her a little, and she will be all right. Who else are in the house?"

"I don't know, auntie, any more than you do. That letter is all I have had, but I know that Sir Joseph was a friend of papa's, and I think I am very fortunate."

"Very well, I only hope it may prove so," retorted Miss Leigh in a tone implying that the chances were against it.

However, she helped Muriel to the full extent of her power in preparing her wardrobe. This was a matter of selection merely, for she still possessed her former personal belongings, and as they were in a style much above that which she imagined companions generally wore, she chose the plainest and neatest, putting in her boxes two dresses only that could possibly excite the envy of her employer.

It was not a very long journey to Como Hall. Short as it was, it did not pass without incident. At the Leadcastle station, a young man, in a light suit, with a terrier at his heels, stopped suddenly in front of her boxes, which were directed to Como Hall in Miss Leigh's bold hand. A glance showed him that Muriel was the owner.

He saw her enter a second-class carriage, and then disappeared. A minute afterwards he returned, minus his dog, but carrying a small armful of papers and magazines.

Miss Leigh looked suspiciously at him as he entered Muriel's compartment, but it was of course impossible for her to object, and there was no time to change. The whistle sounded, aunt and niece exchanged a final kiss, and the train started.

The young gentleman did not lose time. There was an old clergyman seated in the farther corner, so Muriel did not feel alarmed when the stranger offered her Punch, which he had industriously cut with his ticket.

"Thank you," said Muriel, accepting it.

But instead of allowing her to read it in peace, the young stranger soon interrupted her.

"Will you forgive my rudeness in introducing myself to you?" he said; "my name is Norman—Lewis Norman."

Muriel looked up; the name brought no recollection to her mind.

"I happened to observe," he continued, "the address on your luggage. May I ask if you are acquainted with Miss Pankhurst?"

"I saw her many years ago," was Muriel's reply. She began to wonder what Mr. Norman was driving at. She knew she ought not to encourage his advances, but his tone and manner showed that he was not trying to force his acquaintance on her to amuse himself for half an hour, taking advantage of her lack of escort.

"I am going to say something very rude," said Mr. Norman, "so I ask your forgiveness beforehand. Miss Pankhurst is to have a companion from Leadcastle; she was to reach Como Hall to-day. Am I right in—?"

"You are quite right," interrupted Muriel. "You seem so well informed as regards me that I will forgive what you called your rudeness."

"I am delighted to have met you," said Norman, "and thank you very much for not taking offence at my forward conduct. Before very long we shall, I hope, be formally introduced, but may I suppose that the ceremony has already taken place, and talk to you without constraint?"

"I see no reason against it," replied Muriel. "Of course you will not object to my mentioning to Lady Pankhurst that you introduced yourself to me."

"Unfortunately, I do object, and strongly," was his unexpected reply. "I am in a peculiar position as regards Lady Pankhurst. Will you let me confide in you? I think you may take it as a compliment that a stranger is so ready to do so."

"Does that mean you wish me to render you a service?" asked Muriel with a smile.

She was surprised to find herself talking so freely; it was the first time for some months that she had spoken to anyone of her own age and station who was ignorant of her disgrace. She felt her old vivacity returning, and gave not a second thought to what her aunt might think of the impropriety of her conduct.

"It does," replied Norman frankly and earnestly. "You can do me the greatest service. I have no right to ask it, I know, but I must tell you that it is not to me alone you would be doing a kindness, but also to Miss Pankhurst, and she can claim kindness from everyone; it is her natural due."

"I must warn you before you say more," said Muriel, "that you must remember that Lady Pankhurst, and not her daughter, is my employer."

Norman hesitated. But the tone in which Muriel warned him seemed to encourage him, for he continued:

"I am sure I can safely leave my confidences in your hands. To put it shortly, Miss Pankhurst and I are engaged, unfortunately without the consent of her parents—in fact, without their knowledge."

"And against their wish?"

"In spite of Sir Joseph's prohibition. Lady Pankhurst was less obstructive."

"May I ask the reason of his refusal?"

"Certainly; it is my profession. I am an artist. Sir Joseph, as I dare say you know, is a business man; he gained his money in trade. He has the greatest contempt for artists of all sorts; he is one of the last survivors of the race of men who seem to imagine that those who enrich the world, or try to do so, should be objects of contempt to those who enrich themselves."

Norman spoke rather bitterly. Muriel felt very sorry for him and her face expressed as much.

"You see how it is," said Norman. "You will forgive my talking of myself for a minute or two. I am not rich, though I am tolerably well-to-do; I am of better family than the Pankhursts, but since he got his title, Sir Joseph thinks nothing of anyone under his own rank. My only chance is to make a name that will compel recognition. That I am rapidly accomplishing, I am happy to say. Then, at the worst, in two years Constance will be her own mistress."

Muriel listened attentively and with great interest. If only Miss Pankhurst should turn out to be really as nice as Norman imagined, there would be all the pleasures of confidences to be enjoyed, they would have sympathy with each other, and life at Como Hall might prove, after all, far from as miserable as she had anticipated.

"It seems to me," said Muriel, "that you are doing a very bold thing in confiding in me. If I wished to curry favour with Lady Pankhurst I am under no obligation to conceal all this from her."

"You will be when you have seen Connie," said Norman; "I am not afraid of your turning traitor. I am going to show you that I trust you implicitly."

He tore a leaf from a pocket-book and scribbled a hasty note.

"I am going to ask you to give this to Connie," he said. "She is forbidden to write to me, and I only occasionally have a chance of writing to her, as all her letters are scrutinised before they are given her."

"Do you mean to say they open her letters?"

"Oh no; but she has to open them in her mother's presence and tell her from whom they are, and, of course, that fixes her unless I can get a letter delivered 'unbeknown.' Isn't it a dastardly state of things?"

"It does seem hard," assented Muriel. "However, you must remember that her parents have the right to exercise their authority, and I am very doubtful if I am doing right in taking advantage of my position in the house to help Miss Pankhurst in setting her mother's authority at defiance."

"I sha'n't have the chance of asking you again for a long time," pleaded Norman; "I'm going to Devonshire to paint for three months. I don't want to go without letting her have a word."

He handed her the note, which Muriel hesitatingly took.

"A thousand thanks," he said. "You may be sure that you will be happy with Connie, she will be immensely grateful. She is the most charming girl. Ah, I wish I were you, going to live in the same house with her."

Muriel smiled, but rather sadly; going to Como Hall was not her idea of happiness.

Not long after the train stopped. Norman excused himself from coming out to assist her as the servants would recognise him and be sure to report. He once more thanked Muriel for her kindness and then hid himself behind a paper.

Half an hour after, Muriel entered her new home. As the carriage drew up Connie appeared at the window, and a moment afterwards on the steps. She gave an anxious glance at Muriel's face, and then threw her arms round her neck and kissed her.

"I'm so glad you've come," she said; "I'm quite sure I shall like you, and I hope you will try and like me."

"I am sure I shall," replied Muriel warmly.

At this moment a door opened and a tall young man appeared.

"This is my brother Hugh," said Miss Pankhurst.

"How d'ye do?" was his greeting. He turned to his sister, and Muriel heard him whisper: "What the mischief did you want to kiss her for?"

The Editor's Note Book.

GENERAL GORDON'S mission to the Soudan is so far satisfactory that it proves that the Government is aware of the fact that we have duties to fulfil in Egypt, but it would be still more to the purpose if we knew what it has been decided to do in the event of the General's failure to attain his object by diplomacy. If our words are disregarded, are we to follow them up by blows. Or, if the Mahdi proves more proficient than ourselves at the game of brag, are we to retire and give up the game?

It is generally expected that answers to this question, as well as to many others of equal or greater interest, will be extracted from Ministers very soon after the meeting of Parliament next week; but, having regard to the infinite resources of Parliamentary evasion and procrastination, this seems rather a sanguine view.

MR. HENRY GEORGE does not appear to be very successful in his efforts to convert the people of this country to his peculiar views, and has received little, if any, practical support even among extreme Radicals. A letter in the Times last week, signed B., completely and tersely exposes the fallacies and absurdities of Mr. George's views as to the ownership of land, and no better answer to them can possibly be wanted.

IF M. de Lesseps thought that the agreement at which he arrived last autumn with the English shipowners had effectually smoothed the path of the Suez Canal Company, he was counting his chickens a little too soon. The London Chamber of Commerce has urged the Government not to "commit this country to this so-called settlement with the shipowners, as covering the whole ground in dispute," and it is understood that many other influential commercial bodies take a similar view of the situation.

THIS is satisfactory as showing that, as so many different interests are involved, nothing is likely to be settled precipitately, or until the question has been thoroughly threshed out. Nevertheless, it must not be forgotten that the cost of transit through the Canal has to be paid at last by the consumers—that is to say, by the nation at large—and that any Government which attempts to settle the question must look at it from the broadest possible point of view.

ONE of the reforms which have been for some time overdue, and urgently call for the attention of the Government, is that of Private Bill legislation and of Parliamentary Committees as judicial tribunals. It is necessary, no doubt, that promoters of companies which seek compulsory powers for the establishment of profitable monopolies, should, in the interest of the public, have their claims keenly criticised by a competent independent tribunal.

UNFORTUNATELY a Parliamentary Committee on a Private Bill is not always competent, and, sometimes even, not absolutely independent, while the expense and waste of money necessitated by the present system are simply scandalous. In the old days of railway construction, it is stated in the Times, "the Great Western spent three-quarters of a million, and the Great Northern close on half a million before a spade was put into the ground," and although things are not quite so bad now, recent parliamentary returns disclose the fact that railway, gas, water, canal, tramway, and dock companies have spent in the last ten years five millions of money in parliamentary litigation, which has benefited nobody except a comparatively limited circle of agents, solicitors, and barristers.

A WEEK or two ago I instanced the Revenue returns and the subscriptions to the Colonial Loans as arguments going to prove that the state of trade in the country must be better than we are generally led to believe, and, since then, the dividends declared by the Joint Stock Banks of the metropolis have told the same story. With a very low rate of discount, and speculation slack, banks cannot make large profits unless the amount of business done is very large, and, judging by this test, there can be no doubt that the turn-over of the country last year must have been immense.

A UNIVERSAL cry of dismay has gone up from the ratepayers of London at the news that the School Board rate is to be again increased, and there is no doubt that eightpence in the pound is a very serious matter. The worst part of the business is, not only that the total cost of the Board Schools increases, but that the cost per child grows also. If the expenses increased simply because more children were being educated, there might be some excuse for the rapid and portentous rise in the rate, but, when we find that even the children we had to educate last year are to cost us more this, it becomes evident that the proceedings of the London School Board call imperatively for enquiry with a view to reform.

WHY it should be worth anybody's while to place half-a-dozen paper bags of dynamite in the Primrose Hill Tunnel, in such a way that they could not by any possibility do any harm to the train in which the Prince of Wales was travelling, is not at first sight apparent. Probably, however, they were the stock-in-trade of nobody of more importance than one of the extremely silly people who find pleasure in the imbecilities known as practical jokes.

THE first stone of the Artisans' and Labourers' Dwellings in Petticoat Square has just been laid by the Chairman of the City Commissioners of Sewers, and brilliant hopes are held out that this block, and others which are to follow, will do much to relieve the overcrowding for which the neighbourhood has long had an evil name. Judging by previous experience, the chances are that these anticipations will only be partly justified by the result. In all probability the people who have been cleared out will wander off to some other overcrowded district, and the new buildings will, as in the case of the Peabody houses, be occupied by persons of a class much superior to that for which they were primarily intended.

MR. CHARLES READE is nothing if not thorough, and his letter in the Daily Telegraph of the 24th of January is an excellent example of the direct, plain, and forcible manner in which he argues out a point on which he feels deeply. His championship of the jury in the Belt Case is vigorous and generous, and will do good service by reminding people that jurymen, who have the opportunity of closely watching the demeanour of witnesses under examination and cross-examination, are much more likely to estimate their evidence at its true value than judges who have afterwards to form their opinion of the case from reports and the interested comments of the counsel alone.

MR. READE concludes by inviting the jurors to give the public, through the medium of the Daily Telegraph, all the reasons which induced them to arrive at the verdict which they delivered. If I remember rightly, they, or some of them, did take the public a good deal into their confidence immediately after the trial. It seems to me, however, that there are manifest inconveniences in the course suggested by Mr. Reade. Surely the duty of a jurymen ought to be at an end when the verdict is recorded, even apart from the consideration that twelve men may arrive at the same conclusion by several widely different trains of reasoning.

As an instance of the possible difficulties in such cases, the letter of the jurymen after the abortive Explosives' trial may be cited. Here the statement that eleven of the jury were of one way of thinking was clearly calculated to prejudice the jury by whom the case will have to be tried again, and, similarly, if the judges were to order a new trial in the Belt Case, it is impossible to suppose that a number of letters from the first jury could fail to prejudice the result.

It is stated that the authorities of Scotland Yard have come to the conclusion that the Stoke Newington Mystery was a case of suicide and not of outrage, and that no further efforts are to be made to find the person or persons unknown whom the coroner's jury declared guilty of wilful murder. No doubt this decision has not been arrived at without careful consideration of evidence, and probably of facts of which the public know nothing, but it seems rather a strong measure to set aside the verdict of a jury and the distinct evidence of the medical witnesses without explaining the reasons why. It certainly seems desirable that such a decision should not be arrived at without publication of the fullest particulars.

THERE has lately been a good deal of talk about overwork and under-pay at some of the Stores. Although it is extremely difficult to arrive at a fair judgment in the face of the diametrically opposing and wholly irreconcilable statements which are made on both sides in a newspaper controversy such as this, there seems no reason to doubt that the managers, to put it mildly, do not err on the side of over-liberality.

THIS is undoubtedly a mistake. The profits of the shareholders in the principal Stores are very large, and the position of the businesses themselves so peculiar, that something more than the ordinary law of supply and demand ought to be considered. Possibly, also, the extensive robberies, which were not long ago discovered at one of these gigantic shops, may be taken as a proof that, from the point of view of economy alone, it is very judicious to give people who are employed in positions of trust adequate pay.

MESSRS. BARNUM, BAILEY, AND HUTCHINSON and the Zoological Society of London are, no doubt, greatly obliged to the scientific gentlemen who have got up an animated discussion about the cause of the peculiar marks on the animal which is absurdly called a white elephant. That the experts should be found taking the most opposite views on the subject is only in accordance with the custom in such cases, and will surprise no one, while the ingenuity with which somebody connected with the speculation manages to stir up the controversy afresh, when it begins to languish, is quite in accordance with the traditions of the greatest days of the astute Barnum.

Jacky Jacky.

A VERY considerable proportion of the graves in Norfolk Island, once the receptacle of our most dangerous class of convicts, but since 1856 the abode of a very different and orderly community, the descendants of the mutineers of the Bounty, was due to the frequent attempts of the convicts at revolt, attempts which could only be quelled by the most energetic and determined measures. In 1834, a conspiracy was formed, the aim of which was to destroy the military inhabitants by poisoning the wells, and then to take possession of the island. That was defeated, and thirty-one of the revolvers suffered the penalty of death. The last outbreak occurred in 1846. The object on that occasion was to destroy some of the overseers who had, by bringing men to frequent punishment, made themselves the objects of wild and savage hate. The leader was a certain William Westwood, commonly called Jacky Jacky, that name having been given to him by the natives of New South Wales, when he was leading a reckless and lawless life in that colony. By one of the convicts, who was this man's close companion, I was favoured with a Newgate Calendar of details. Like many such details, black and repulsive in the mass, they show here and there, through the mist, a glimmer of that true light of humanity which might have brightened the man's life, and changed his career.

There was, indeed, some good mixed with the evil deed that had brought Jacky Jacky into Norfolk Island. Bent upon plunder, he with his associates had one night visited a settler's house, during the absence of its master. Having secured the servants, they proceeded to the best room, in which the lady of the house and a young lady, her friend, were preparing the children for bed. Jacky Jacky briefly stated the object of his visit, and having left an unaccustomed confederate in charge of the affrighted women, went upstairs. The report of a gun, followed by screams, soon called him down again, when he found the lady of the house lying on the floor, surrounded by her screaming children, and bleeding profusely from a gun-shot wound, which had divided the femoral artery. Jacky Jacky promptly called the whole house to his aid, bound up the wound as tightly as he could, ordered the settler's horse to be put to the gig, and, as soon as the lady had recovered consciousness, had her carefully placed on cushions at the bottom of the vehicle. Then taking the reins himself, he quitted his plunder, drove with the utmost speed to the nearest township, and knocking up the doctor, committed the wounded lady to his care. Then returning to his followers, he called them off, forbidding them to remove an atom from the premises. Upon the information of the wretch who had fired the gun, according to his own statement, Jacky Jacky and his gang were soon afterwards taken in the bush. Many crimes having been proved against them, they were condemned to death; but by the earnest representation of the lady, who gratefully remembered Jacky Jacky's considerate distinction between bush-ranging and murder, the sentence was commuted to transportation for life to Norfolk Island. But he was not destined to die in his bed. He headed, as already said, the conspiracy of 1846.

Obnoxious overseers and constables were to be destroyed, and the island seized. One morning, immediately after inspection, as the various gangs were being marched to their work, the revolt was opened by a simultaneous rush, and the convicts scattered themselves over the settlement in search of their victims—certain constables who lived in detached cottages near the beach. Those who had been on duty the preceding night were in one cottage, and were barbarously murdered in their sleep. The military, after great exertion, got the greater number of the convicts back within the gaol; but some were still at large among the hills, and three or four had seized a boat upon the beach, and made their escape to Philip Island. This island is a lonely rock, lying about six miles from the settlement, inhabited by goats and rabbits, by sea-birds, and by a peculiar kind of green parrot. It used to be occasionally visited by officers of the convict garrison, for a day's shooting. On Philip Island, these three or four men for a long time were able to elude the vigilance of those sent in pursuit; at length, however, all but one were taken or had thought it prudent to surrender. For eighteen months that one man, hunted by his fellows, lived on in his desolation, and escaped from every one of the many searching-parties sent out to capture him. At length his lair was discovered. The desperate man then climbed swiftly to the highest pinnacle of rock in the small island. There he quietly waited his pursuers. With much toil they had nearly scaled the height on which he stood. Then he gave them a wild look of hatred and defiance, covered his head with his jacket, and leaped down, rebounding from rock to rock, and falling a shattered mass into the sea.

For this outbreak, seventy convicts were put upon their trial; and of these, thirteen, including Jacky Jacky, were condemned to death. They lie together in one grave, upon unconsecrated ground outside the cemetery, close to the rocky shore where the waves beat upon the coral reef. They were tried by a commission sent from Sydney. Until then, all persons charged with capital offences had been sent to Sydney for trial; but that practice was discontinued, in order that there might no longer exist a motive which had been a strange and frequent source of crime. The old hardened convicts used to amuse themselves by urging the new comers into violent conflict with each other, and inciting them to murder their companions, in order that they—the instigators—might have evidence to give, and thus for a time relieve the awful monotony of their lives by a voyage to Sydney, in the character of witnesses.

One tombstone in the old cemetery of Norfolk Island deserves record. It is sacred to the memory of Thomas Salisbury Wright, who was transported from Sydney at the age of one hundred and three for the term of his natural life. So there he died, having completed his one hundred and fifth year. To be sure he was a young man when he committed the forgery for which he was transported. That occurred when he was only eighty-three years old, and it was not discovered until twenty years after.

The Family Doctor.

THE HYGIENE OF ENTERTAINMENTS.

FEW of us will deny that we too often take our enjoyment—we mean what is called our “innocent enjoyment”—in a very unhealthy way. Our recreation is in no sense a renewing or making over again, but rather a bewitching and insidious form of destruction. By our ignorance and inadvertence we more than neutralise the benefits we gain from change of scene and from amusement.

EVERYBODY knows the stifling atmosphere which usually pervades well-filled theatres and halls. It is not only that the heat is oppressive—but there is a sense of closeness, of airlessness, which affects some people at the moment, and these probably suffer least from it, because they are obliged to flee; while others, who seem to tolerate it better, remain, and perhaps fail to connect it with the sick headache or the depression of spirits from which they suffer on the following day. It is a proof of the peculiar quality of this atmosphere, that people from tropical climates, and therefore accustomed to great natural heat, but also to free ventilation, suffer in it more perceptibly than we do, who are more accustomed to shut-in chambers. In fact, the air of a crowded and ill-ventilated building is tainted—is simply poisonous. And yet people, who carefully filter their water, and who would put aside any dubious article of food, seem content to go on breathing it.

LET us look into the matter. A large public building is usually well lighted, and the flame which gives the light at the same time uses up the air, converting it into gases, which are not only useless, but absolutely harmful to human beings. We and our neighbours in the assembly are also engaged in using up the air, and in breathing out the same harmful gas that the flame produces, as well as a small portion of a gas which is not only suffocating but poisonous. In addition to this, we breathe out certain poisonous animal exhalations from our lungs, which, in reality, give the sense of closeness which is so familiar to us all.

OF course, the remedy for these evils lies in the hands of architects and sanitary engineers. They must ever be attempting to solve the problem of how to produce the maximum of ventilation with the minimum of draught or chill. But demand creates supply; and as public intelligence on these points increases, so will the care and skill of these purveyors for public convenience. We shall find no more windows with immovable sashes; no more buildings, or corners of buildings, through which a full current of fresh air cannot be sent.

when it is desired. People educated to the value of ventilation will rather put on an extra wrap than insist on the closing of a door or a window. Those who are too delicate to bear the least stream of fresh air will understand that it is their duty to stay at home rather than to poison a whole assembly, and leave them with enfeebled bodies and irritated nerves for days to come.

THE attendants at every place of public assemblage should be rigidly instructed to set open every avenue for fresh air the moment the people depart. We fear this is often neglected, especially, if we may be permitted to say it, in churches, and on Sunday, when one service follows another in rapid succession. We shall never forget an experience of this sort we once underwent in the farthest Highlands of Scotland. The little church stood on the margin of a wide loch, sheltered by mighty pine-clad mountains. Summer was breathing out her purest and softest airs. The greater part of the neighbouring population was Gaelic-speaking, and a Gaelic service was held in the forenoon, followed by an English one for the benefit of a few residents and visitors. There was only an interval of a few minutes between the departure of the plaid-wrapped shepherds and white-mutched matrons and the ingoing of the lairds' people and the tourists, who were welcomed by a blast of hot, heavy, evil-smelling atmosphere, the legacy of the crowded congregation which had preceded them. And those who would have scorned to put on a second-hand garment, sat nodding, faint and stupefied, in a furnace of second-hand air! We carried away our own share of fretful mood and sick headache; and, during the subsequent Sundays of our stay, contented ourselves with the ministrations of Dr. Hillside. We may well ask, is not the preservation of health and strength, for the fit and cheerful discharge of our duties in life, a distinct though much-neglected part of Christian duty?

IN evening assemblies it is to be hoped that the electric light will give help in the right direction. With some form of closed electric lamp we get all the light we want, and yet the air is not rendered in the least impure or uncomfortably hot.

WHILE we guard against cold on leaving assemblies, by starting on our homeward way slowly, with closed mouths, or with the windows of our conveyance duly drawn, yet we must not forget that these precautions need not be unduly protracted, once we have habituated ourselves to the change of atmosphere. To breathe freely and somewhat largely of fresh air before going home and to bed is really important, since the fresh air is the best possible antidote to the bad or poisoned air. This, coupled with the good practice (if you can get used to it) of keeping your bedroom window open a little at top and bottom, will do much to remove the ill effects of the tainted atmosphere in which the evening has been passed, and may avert the feeling of headache, malaise, and weariness which too often results. Simple precautions of this kind are worth much, because Nature is very simple. She never demands from us hard and complicated tasks in order to preserve our health, and her behests, like those of the ancient prophet when he commanded the Syrian noble to wash in Jordan, are often despised from their very simplicity. If health be lost, however, her bearing towards us often changes instantly, and becomes relentless and exacting.

THERE are further complications in the hygiene of entertainments or social gatherings in our own houses, for there we have not only to consider what air we give our guests to breathe, but what food we set before them. Let us say, however, at the outset, that it should be regarded as a positive insult on the part of a host to invite more guests than the number which can breathe and move freely in the rooms where he receives them. To do so is only a part of the vulgar affectation and pretence which prevails in some sections of society, and those who aspire to be well-bred should study to avoid it. Sometimes a huge assembly is given as a means of paying off one's "social obligations." People have no right to incur social obligations which they can only repay in such fashion. The theory of entertainment is to give pleasure to our friends, not to drag them as victims at the chariot-wheels of our vanity.

IN some houses it seems as if it were treason to open the windows; they might all be nailed up for any use to which they are put. This is strongly to be deprecated, for a little management—the use of a curtain or a screen—will secure all the blessings of fresh air without any injurious draught. In every house, when a party is given, it should be somebody's business to see to these things. We should not leave our guests to complain of discomfort on this score; and it is astonishing how people get accustomed to bad air, and do not notice they are in it till they leave it and return to it.

THE atmosphere, when tainted, can be rapidly improved by pouring a little dilute oil of vitriol over some permanganate of potash. Ozone is at once given off, which is a powerful air-purifier. The only drawback to this expedient is that oil of vitriol is a powerful acid, and must be handled with great care.

OF the food supplied at entertainments it is difficult to say much, since it opens up the whole subject of dietetics. Of course, each guest can decide what he takes himself; but a wise latitude of choice should be allowed him. At some houses a guest has either to take unwholesome viands or nothing. Whatever is likely to disagree with the human frame at any time is sure to do so in a hot and crowded room. Many dishes usually thought "dainty," levy a severe tax on the digestive powers. There is an important nerve called the "pneumogastric nerve," which presides largely over the digestion. A certain learned professor, before dismissing his students for the Christmas vacation, always added to his seasonable good wishes the warning: "Be sure you take care of your pneumogastric nerve." It is advice which should be remembered at all entertainments.

HAM, lobster, sherry, and highly spiced or sickly-sweet dishes are not the most appropriate for such gatherings. Have a few simple, harmless dishes for the delicate and the elderly, and it is probable you will find that these will be the most popular with all. Keep beautiful goblets of water well in sight, and also provide some aerated waters. Do not compel your guests to drink wine because they grow thirsty and there is nothing else to drink. Let the wine you do provide be thoroughly good; it need not be of an expensive kind, but let it be good of its kind. Let the guests beware of resorting to wine to relieve them from the depressing influences of ill ventilation and crowded confusion. These make stimulants welcome, but they only add to the evil consequences. At dinners, wine often enables people to eat twice as much as is good for them, thus entailing on them all sorts of evil consequences, which are not always traced to their true cause.

LATE hours should be avoided. We want recreation that we may pursue our work, not dissipation to unfit us for it. Dancing-parties are almost invariably too prolonged. What should be a pleasant exercise is converted into an exhausting labour, and under such circumstances those who have any real work in life do well to avoid them. The butterfly of fashion, male or female, makes up for ante-midnight revelry by morning lounging, but the working bees must be up and doing, and to resume work with a jaded feeling is thoroughly unwholesome. The fashionable "Cinderella" dances, closing sharply at the hour of twelve, mark a step in the right direction. Bad customs can only be changed by individuals coming to the conclusion that they are harmful and wrong, and then resolutely resolving each to set his own face against them.

GREAT physical good results from wise enjoyment. The mind has a most powerful influence on the body, an influence we can scarcely over-estimate. Relaxation is a necessity to the over-worked or over-worried mind. Many serious diseases might be avoided if this was duly attended to. One finds a hundred people ready and eager to swallow any quantity of mixtures, tonics, and pills, for one who seeks how to provide fit relaxation and refreshment for himself and his household. A healthy mind, clear, calm, and cheerful, is the best bulwark of a healthy body.

An Address by Artemus Ward.

ARTEMUS WARD, after delivering a lecture once in New London, Conn., was asked by the principal of a young ladies' high school in the place to pay a visit to her institution the next day. He went like "an amosin cuss," and made the girls a speech. While walking to the academy a street runaway occurred. A terrified horse went tearing over the pavement, with what Artemus called the "fore-quarters" of a waggon clattering at his heels. This incident Artemus ingeniously utilised in his address. Said he: "The vehicular elopement which has just taken place, young ladies, has furnished us with a timely topic of discourse. Young ladies' seminaries are ever exposed to runaways. Once, when travelling with my show, I came upon a female institute. There were ladders, and lads too, as to that, at every window. Many perpendiculars carrying fainting horizontals to the ground. 'Fire!' I shouted. 'None of that,' replied a solemn voice from the orchard. 'There ain't no fire; these are only young fellows running off with their sweethearts.' There is moral entertainment for man and beast in this runaway. No horse, if attached to a waggon, that is, if sincerely attached to it, will run away with it; but the more a young man is attached to a young woman, the more he will run away with her, leaving no trace, in fact, none of the harness behind. Young ladies, since I have stood before your beautiful faces I have lost something, and if you or the boy that sweeps out should find a red object looking like a coral breastpin that has been stepped on, you may know it is my poor busted heart."

Low Spirits.

OF all the distressing things in this wearisome world low spirits are at once the most trying and the most inexplicable. They do not depend upon any external circumstances, there is no forewarning sign to herald their approach. They appear to be purely constitutional—a sort of horrible legacy with which some people are born, and neither wealth, or health, or any form of success, can save a predestined person from becoming their prey.

At the most unexpected moments, in the midst of the gayest scenes, Melancholy taps us on the shoulder, and we find him waiting like the Ancient Mariner at the marriage-feast, and insisting on being heard. In a moment, at the waving of the wand of this bad enchanter, life appears at its worst. A black cloud drops over everything, our path appears lost in mist. We seem to have been doing nothing but make mistakes ever since we were born; our parents brought us up badly; our life is a series of miseries. It is a question whether in the midst of a crowd of apparent affection we have one friend who really loves us, certainly not one that understands us. For low spirits, as they increase, make us become more and more egotistical, more alone, and from our lonely rock of despair we are only too apt to look on the mass of mankind before us as little better than a group of grinning idiots.

THERE can be no doubt that this state of things is very trying while it lasts. We can have nothing but pity for the person whose melancholy eyes, looking straight forward, can see nothing good in the present or future; whose laugh is hollow, and not the result of merriment; who is enduring in his solitary breast exquisite tortures of weariness and despair; who thinks he has solved the conundrum concerning life being worth living, and can give the most decided answer possible in the negative—we cannot but pity him, although we know that his despair will be as evanescent as it now seems real, that to-morrow's sun will see him lively, and that suddenly, in an instant, he will have forgotten his woes, and life will appear to him as rose-coloured as before. We pity this man—nay, if he keeps his sorrows to himself, we can respect him, knowing that his is one of the sensitive, highly-strung natures that are liable to alternations of rapture and despair; but if he indulges himself with a confidant, and does everything he can to foster his morbidness, why, then our sympathy is wholly reserved for his wife.

WE say "his wife," for such a man is invariably married, unless, indeed, he has a peculiarly unselfish sister who will spoil him by listening to his woes. It is easy to pick out of a crowd the wife of the low-spirited man. If we see one of those sweet, smiling creatures whose faces are as bright as the sun, and who have a disposition to make the very best of things written in every dimple of their cheeks and glance of their eye, in one moment we could stake our existence on the assumption that that is the wife of a low-spirited man. "Poor innocent creature," we say to ourselves, "what have you done—what fearful crime did you commit in some former state of existence, that you should be tied for life to the companionship of this depressed and depressing person—one who comes again and again to gather honey from your sweet store of comforting sayings; who warms his miserable wings in the sunshine of your radiance, carping at you all the time, and grudging you that cheerfulness which is in his eyes the sign of an inferior disposition?"

WHAT is to be done with such a man? The more he is indulged the worse he gets; the longer he continues, the stronger hold will his fit take of him. He must clearly be roused, if you love him well enough to undertake it, but it is indeed a thankless task. You exhaust yourself with entertaining him, firing off funny story after funny story for his benefit; you take all the ancient proverbs of cheery import out of your wallet, and present him with them one after another. "It is a long lane that has no turning," you remark, trying by dint of a smile and a cheery expression to give an air of freshness to that well-worn aphorism; and, if that fails in its effect, you find yourself trying to give a startling original reading of the fact that there is a silver lining to every cloud. You ransack your memory for every ludicrous incident you have ever heard of—old family stories, plays you have seen, anything so that your hearer would but laugh. No circus performer jumping through his hoops, or leaping with stagey smiles from bar to bar, works harder than you, as you take spasmodic jumps from one subject to another in the hope of enlivening your difficult audience.

AND now comes the hardest part of all—the recipient of your care treats you with the greatest ungratefulness. Ten to one but he rather resents your good spirits, as being the fruits of a thoughtless and insensible nature. You may laugh, he says; you do not see the state of things as clearly as he does. You have no sympathy—he has seen that long ago. Either your birth, or your education, or some strange want in your nature, prevents you from taking part in the sorrows of his sensitive soul. This invariable remark of his is certainly hard to bear; indeed, there is something in the idea of his resenting the high spirits in which you are indulging for his benefit, which would be painful if it were not so ludicrous. To be taunted with being over-sanguine at the very minute when your cheerful disposition is being so severely tasked on his behalf is certainly trying, to say the least of it, but the devoted comforter will bear even this with patience whilst looking forward anxiously for the first smile which, like the break in the clouds on a rainy day, will tell her she has succeeded in her task, and that the demon of low spirits is gone.

WE have spoken throughout as though the complainer were of the masculine sex—the consoler of the feminine. It very often is so, but there are heaps of cases where the contrary holds good, where it is the woman who wails, and the man who tries to comfort her in vain: Mrs. Gummidge, who regards the smoking of the potatoes as her own particular grievance, and Daniel Peggotty who tries to cheer her up. But of whichever sex you may be, sad indeed is your case when you have once allowed yourself to become the recipient of these dolorous confidences. The self-made martyrs will return to you again and again; like the daughter of the horse-leech forever crying "Give!" they will tie on your back all the burden of their bad spirits, departing lightened, but leaving you weary. Happy is it for you if they do not enfeeble all your powers of bearing that burden of your own whose existence they so selfishly ignore, as the vampire in old legends drank the life-blood of his victim that he might go on his own way refreshed.

Brillat Savarin.

M. CHARLES MONSELET, in his amusing essay on Brillat Savarin in the translation of his celebrated work, "A Handbook of Gastronomy," just published, says:

"It is certain that Brillat Savarin never concealed his passion for good cookery, and he upset the feelings of his colleagues in the Court of Cassation by the smell of game, which he carried in his pockets that it might get high. Once, while he was President of the Civil Court of l'Ain, Brillat Savarin was sorely tried between his duty as a judge and his inclinations as a bon vivant. A market-gardener had brought an action to restrain a neighbour from planting trees in such a position that their shadows would be thrown on a wall where peaches of a peculiar lusciousness were grown. Brillat asked to taste one of these peaches, and the gardener came into court with a fruit of lovely appearance, which he cut into quarters with a silver knife. Handing up the first quarter, he said: "Taste, sir, for the flesh." When the judge had eaten, the second quarter came up with the request: "Now for the juice." At the third quarter the gardener said, "Now for the perfume;" then proffering the last quarter, amid a religious silence in court, he exclaimed: "And now for the tout ensemble." Brillat Savarin felt bound to give judgment for the neighbour, but he ejaculated almost with tears in his eyes: "These peaches are works of art, and that man with his trees is a savage."

How to Mount Microscopic Objects.

PART I.

TO all those who have any taste for natural history, microscopic research affords an inexhaustible mine of interest, while even the most unscientific can occasionally find an hour's amusement, leading, perhaps, to something better, in the examination of a few of the wonders which are scattered broadcast in our path. But, in order to appreciate Nature's handiwork, the mere possession of even the most powerful microscope is not the only requisite, for it must be borne in mind that comparatively few objects can be properly examined unless they have undergone careful prior preparation. Moreover, it is scarcely satisfactory to view an interesting object, and then to be obliged to throw it away for lack of some means of preserving it in a fit condition for future inspection. If carefully mounted, however, the adage that "a thing of beauty is a joy for ever" finds an excellent illustration, for there the specimens are, ready to be examined at any time when an opportunity may present itself.

OF course, mounted objects may always be procured of the various opticians who make a speciality of microscopic work, and who have generally a large stock on hand from which selections may be made. But this proceeding involves considerable expense, for not even the most simple specimen can as a rule be procured for less than one shilling, while the more elaborate preparations can seldom be purchased for five times that sum. Moreover, there is not the same satisfaction in examining these as in inspecting the fruits of one's own labours, so that from all points of view, excepting, perhaps, that of the optician, it is as well that every microscopist should be able to mount his own objects.

THE requisites for so doing are few and simple. In the first place, a number of glass slides must be procured, the dimensions of which must be three inches in length by one in breadth. These must be of the purest glass, without a flaw or an air-bubble in any part, while the edges must be carefully rounded off by means of sand-paper, so that no projecting edge be left which might cause a nasty cut. These slides may be procured at any of the dealers in microscopic apparatus, but any glass-cutter should be able to furnish them at a far cheaper rate, and of equal perfection. Only let it be thoroughly understood that the glass must be of the very best quality, and that the appointed measurements must be accurately adhered to, and even the most unintelligent of workmen can scarcely make a mistake.

IN the next place, a corresponding number of glass covers, as they are called, will be required, these consisting of squares or circles of the very thinnest and purest glass, with which the objects are to be covered in order to protect them from dust and injury. These covers must be procured of an optician, for their manufacture is of far too delicate a character for ordinary workmen, and demands special tools and the greatest care and experience in their use. They are sold by weight, at so much an ounce according to their quality, and are rather expensive. But, on the other hand, it must be taken into account that a very large number go to make up an ounce, for they are of so delicate a nature that the weight of each individual cover is scarcely appreciable.

A SMALL bottle of the purest Canada Balsam will also be necessary, and this may be procured of any druggist. A little purified gum tragacanth will also be useful in mounting certain opaque objects, and may be obtained of the same tradesman, who will furnish it in the form of small flakes. These flakes, when soaked in water, swell to a most wonderful extent, two or three small fragments being quite sufficient to fill a two-ounce bottle with mucilage of the proper consistency. Add the water by degrees, a little at a time, until the mixture is of such a character that it flows with difficulty even if the bottle containing it be held upside down. A camel's-hair pencil or two will of course be necessary, together with a few simple tools formed of fine needles furnished with handles. These last are easily made by thrusting the needles, eye foremost, into ordinary lucifer-matches, until only about one-third of their length remains exposed. Some operators recommend that one or two of these needles should be curved by heating them in the flame of a spirit-lamp, bending them to the required angle by the aid of forceps, and finally plunging them while still hot into cold water in order to harden them. This, however, I think is totally unnecessary. Curved needles are far more difficult to work with than straight, and their aid is seldom or never really required.

A PAIR of fine dissecting-forceps is invaluable, and these will not cost very much. Unlike the needles, however, they are most useful when curved, but a little practice will be necessary before they can be properly used. This practice is, after all, the chief requisite in every branch of microscopic mounting. The first few attempts must be more or less failures, and it is not until some experience has been gained that the student will be enabled to mount the simplest object correctly. He may read whole books of instructions, and may be theoretically perfect in the art, but when he descends to practice he will find that the rules upon which he is to work can only point out the manner of proceeding which is most likely to lead to success, and that all the little details which are so important can be learnt by personal experience alone.

PRACTICE and patience, however, in this as in other things, will do wonders, and each attempt of a careful worker will be an improvement upon the preceding, until he finds that he has fairly mastered all the difficulties which at first beset him. Before proceeding farther, therefore, I wish it to be understood that in the following remarks I make no pretence of completeness, but merely point out the lines upon which the delicate operation of mounting microscopic objects is best conducted.

SUPPOSING objects, balsam, needles, brushes, forceps, and all the other necessities to be duly laid out in readiness for use, the first thing to do is to find the exact centre of the slide. Nothing looks worse than a slide in which this precaution has not been observed, the appearance of even the most careful mounting being quite spoiled by failure in this respect. The centre may be easily found in the following manner: Mark out upon a piece of white paper a parallelogram of the exact dimensions of the slide, and connect the opposite angles by two straight lines. The point at which these lines cut one another will be the centre. Place the slide upon the ruled space, and allow a single drop of the melted balsam to fall upon the centre. In this drop, without loss of time, place the object, whatever it may be, and lay one of the thin glass covers upon it, pressing it gently downwards, so that the balsam may spread evenly in all parts. Do not press too hard, or the cover may break and spoil the object; and take especial care that no bubbles of air remain in the balsam. These air-bubbles are a terrible nuisance sometimes, and give a great deal of trouble before they can be eradicated, which is best done by touching them with a red-hot needle before the cover is laid in its place. Heat the needle in a spirit-lamp; if an ordinary flame be employed soot will be deposited upon it, and so transferred to the balsam, utterly ruining the slide. See that the glass cover is quite free from dirt before placing it upon the balsam, for if it is not perfectly clear the view of the object will be greatly obscured when it is placed beneath the microscope.

THIS part of the process satisfactorily completed, label the slide carefully, and put it away for at least a week in order to dry, taking care to place it in some receptacle to which dust can find no access. A word or two as to the label may, perhaps, not be out of place. Let this be as complete as possible, giving the name of the object, an outline description, if necessary, and the focus of the object-glass—one inch, half-inch, or quarter-inch—through which it can be most suitably viewed. Eschew such vague labels as "mouth of beetle," "scales of butterfly," "pollen of flower," etc. There is as much variety in the mouths and scales of insects, or the pollen of flowers, as there is in the insects and flowers themselves, and slides labelled in so vague a manner are as nearly useless as it is possible for them to be. There is no difficulty nowadays in finding out the name of any insect or plant, for, if no collection be available with which comparison can be made, there are several scientific journals, such as "Science Gossip," which undertake the nomenclature of objects sent to them for that purpose, so that there is no reason whatever why the slides should not be labelled with accuracy.

OPINIONS are rather divided as to the exact manner in which the balsam should be used. Some operators place the drop upon the slide first, as above suggested, and then lay the object upon it. Others reverse this order of proceeding, and place the object upon the dry slide, allowing the balsam to fall upon it. Some, again, use their balsam undiluted, while others thin it by a judicious admixture of chloroform, until its consistency is of much the same character as that of very thin treacle. Unless the very greatest care be taken, however, this last method is not to be recommended, for the balsam, if thinned in too great a degree, is very apt to spread beyond its proper limits, while the glass-cover is less easily fixed in its place. It is as well to warm the slide before using it, as the balsam then takes longer to set, and allows more time for the manipulation of the object.

WHEN thoroughly dry, the slides may undergo the final process, which consists of the application of a ring of cement, or varnish, round the glass-cover. This process is not absolutely necessary, but adds greatly to the neatness of the slide, a moderately broad black ring giving it a very finished appearance. When quite completed and dry, the slides should be placed in a kind of rack, so that they may stand upon their edges without coming into contact with one another. They should never be placed flat, or allowed to touch each other, for fear of their receiving some injury which would spoil their value.

John Knox's Courtship.

JOHN KNOX, before the light of the Reformation broke up, travelled among several honest families in the west of Scotland, who were converts to the Protestant religion. Particularly he visited off Lord Ochiltree's family, preaching the Gospel privately to those who were willing to receive it. The lady and some of her family were converts. Her ladyship had a room, table, stool, and candlestick for him, and one night about supper-time said to him: "Mr. Knox, I think you are at a loss by want of a wife?"

To which he said: "Madam, I think nobody will take such a wanderer as I."

To which she replied: "Sir, if that be your objection I will make an enquiry to find an answer against our next meeting."

The lady accordingly addressed herself to her eldest daughter, telling her that she might be very happy if she could marry Mr. Knox, who would be a great reformer and a credit to the Church, but she despised the proposal, hoping that her ladyship wished her better than to marry a poor wanderer. The lady addressed the second daughter, who answered as the eldest. Then she spoke to the third daughter, about nineteen years of age, who very fairly said: "Madam, I'll be very willing to marry him, but I fear he'll not take me."

To which the lady replied: "If that be your objection I'll soon get an answer."

Next night at supper the lady said: "Sir, I have been considering on a wife for you, and find one very willing."

To which Knox replied: "Who is it, madam?"

She answered: "My young daughter, sitting by your side at the table."

Then, addressing himself to the young lady, he said: "My bird, are you willing to marry me?"

She answered: "Yes, sir; only I fear you will not be willing to take me."

He said: "My bird, if you be willing to take me you must take your venture of God's providence, as I do. I go through the country sometimes on foot, with a wallet on my arm and a Bible in it. You may put some things for yourself, but if I bid you take the wallet you must do it, and go where I go, and lodge where I lodge."

"Sir," she said, "I'll do all this."

"Will you be as good as your word?"

"Yes, I will."

Upon which the marriage was concluded. She went with him to Geneva. And as he was ascending a hill, she got up to the top of it before him, and took the wallet on her arm, and, sitting down, said: "Now, good man, am I not as good as my word?"

Household Gardening.

ONE of the mildest winters on record has had the natural effect of exciting vegetation before its time. Fruit buds were swelling, and Roses starting into growth with the opening of the year, and the cold weather which followed in certain districts gave the greater check to trees, shrubs, and flowers that had been summoned into activity at an unseasonable period. The very early budding of the occupants of gardens is not an encouraging sign of future productiveness; for it is almost certain that, sooner or later, sharp frosts occur, the effects of which are felt throughout the year. Mild winters and cold springs are usually the precursors of fruitless summers.

RETARDING GROWTH.

Many persons seeing young growths push from the extremities of Roses and fruit-trees endeavour to stop the dangerously forward movement by pruning. They imagine that removing the early portions by shortening the shoots checks the flow of sap, and so retards the blossoming of the trees. This is a mistake. It is quite true they check the growth towards the extremities of the shoots; but in doing so, they divert the sap into the lower buds, causing these, which are by far the more important, to start before their time. Avoid early pruning therefore, but rather defer it the longer when the growths at the ends of the shoots are too early, as these will attract the sap from the lower fruit and flower producing buds, allowing them to rest until the approach of spring.

ROOT PRUNING.

This is a retarding process, and often directly conducive to fruitfulness in the case of over-vigorous young Apple, Pear, and other fruit-trees. While we advise a postponement of pruning the branches of trees under the circumstances above indicated, checking such trees that can be operated on safely by pruning their roots, cannot be commenced too soon.

Root-pruning is a very simple process. It simply means digging a tree up and planting it again immediately. This cannot be done without severing many roots, thus decidedly checking the flow of sap by cutting off the supply.

This practice can only be advantageously adopted with young and luxuriant trees, and those that make long and strong growths, yet produce few blossoms; trees that grow fairly strong, without being exuberant, may be half dug up, taking out a trench round one side, and cutting the roots with a sharp spade; but weakly examples must not have their roots disturbed.

A tree may be regarded as very strong when it produced shoots last year upwards of two and a half feet long; moderately strong when they exceed eighteen inches, and too weak for root-pruning when they have not extended more than a foot. The matter will now be rendered sufficiently clear for all practical purposes.

The distance at which the trench should be cut from the stem of the tree is the next question the inexperienced will require answered. It is not easy to give an answer equally applicable to all cases; but few will err by taking the height of the tree as the guide, and taking half the height as the distance to commence digging around the stem.

If a young pyramid or bush tree is only three feet high, the roots may be cut through about eighteen inches from the stem; if four feet high sever them at two feet, and if six feet let the trench be opened at three feet from the bole of the tree. These distances are quite safe for checking an over-vigorous tree by disturbing the roots, and this will often—indeed, nearly always—result in the production of fruit-blossoms.

ORNAMENTAL APPLE TREES.

Everybody will admit the chaste beauty of apple-blossom, but the majority of persons have not observed the different character of the flowers of different varieties.

The blossom of some sorts is small, papery-white, and comparatively inconspicuous, while others have large delicately-flaked or deep rosy flowers, the well-laden trees in many being exceeded in beauty by few ornamental trees, and surpassed by none.

Half-a-dozen Apples having blossoms that entitle them to a place in any shrubby border or pleasure-ground will be named, and the varieties will not be the less acceptable, since the blossom is followed by excellent fruit.

Gravenstein, blossoms large with round petals, the outside of which is deep rose flaked with white. The buds just before expansion are very beautiful, and clusters are often thinned out from the trees for drawing-room decoration, more than sufficient being left for a full crop of fruit, which is of large size, good for dessert, and excellent for culinary purposes.

Worcester Pearmain, flowers not quite so large as the above, but very charming, by their silvery-white colour, streaked and pencilled with delicate pink veins. The fruit of this variety is also extremely rich in colour, which renders it one of the most handsome of medium-sized dessert Apples, and a general favourite. It is being largely planted, and should be represented in every garden.

Scarlet Nonpareil. The blossom of this always attracts attention in spring, as its handsome small rich red fruit does on the dessert-table in winter. The flowers are blush, with rose-coloured veins, shading to white, very lovely, and a tree should be included in the most select collections.

Lady Henniker, blossoms very large, often one inch and a half in diameter, the buds, when nearly ready for expansion, are of a glowing rosy-pink colour, afterwards changing to white, faintly suffused with rose. The fruit is large and valuable for culinary purposes.

Cox's Pomona, flowers large and highly effective, white flaked, and veined with rose. The fruit is also extremely handsome, pale-red, with dark crimson streaks, and is useful for cooking. The tree is also a free bearer, and the variety is being largely grown.

Lord Derby, blossoms large, rich, and beautiful, being bright rosy-pink in colour, the petals being deep pink just before expansion. The tree is one of the most attractive, and the fruit grand in size; one of the most imposing of culinary Apples, and trees in great demand for planting.

As combining beauty with utility the varieties named may be planted with confidence by all who have room for half-a-dozen trees, and they are as worthy of a place in the front-garden amongst Roses and Evergreens as in the enclosure usually devoted to the culture of vegetables.

Nor do the trees occupy much space if obtained on the dwarf paradise stock; they may, in fact, be made to blossom and bear fruit when not more than three feet high if required, and as much larger as may be preferred, their size and shape depending on the treatment to which they are subjected. If pigmies are coveted they must be transplanted frequently, and they will make little growth, but cover themselves with blossoms, and, weather permitting, eventually with fruit.

Some other fruits suitable for small gardens will be recommended, as there is still time for planting, but it is particularly important at this season of the year that the roots are not allowed to become dry during transit from a nursery.

BULBOUS PLANTS.

Early Hyacinths will now be fading. When they cease being attractive the flower-spikes should be at once cut off, and the plants be placed in a cool but very light position to develop their foliage. To this end they must be watered the same as hitherto. On the excellence of the foliage this year depends the quality of the flowers another season. The same remarks apply to Tulips, Narcissuses, Crocuses—indeed, to all bulbs that are grown and flowered in pots. The plants, after flowering, are quite as well in a frame as a greenhouse, and better in the frame than in the window of a dwelling. They need no artificial heat, but should be protected from frost.

The Liberty of the Press.

AN American newspaper gives the following account of the troubles of one of its reporters:

"We haven't any further need of your services," said the managing editor of a city daily to a reporter who had been at work only a week.

"That's rather sudden, ain't it?" replied the startled reporter.

"Haven't I done all I had to do?"

"You have done the work, but not properly, sir."

"What's wrong?"

"Well, you wrote up Mrs. Parvenu's ball, and there wasn't a word about its being a brilliant affair."

"That's just what it wasn't."

"The lady, sir, takes several copies of this paper, and her husband has his printing done in our office, and ordinary common-sense should teach you to understand your duties under the circumstances."

"But—"

"No excuse is necessary, sir. Then you brought in an article on the arrest of young Mr. Fresh for drunkenness. His father is one of our patrons, and we have a sufficient independence to disregard the wishes of the curious public to get an item of news when our patrons are interested in its suppression."

"I understand—"

"No, you don't, for you wrote Mr. Jones's obituary without saying he was a distinguished citizen, of large influence, and a man of great goodness of heart."

"I thought he was another kind of—"

"You mustn't think. The independent spirit of the press is not to be governed by reportorial thought, sir. Did you think when you wrote of Miss Angeline Shoddy's departure to the seaside without referring to her as the charming and accomplished daughter of one of our most select families?"

"Who said she was the—?"

"Do you have to hear what other people say in order to know your business? Who told you that Mr. Bottle, the councilman, was a rough? Don't you know his influence is worth money to the paper?"

"I wasn't aware that—"

"Of course you were not aware of anything. If you were, you might be useful to us. No, sir; you are not the kind of a man we need. We want a man not to know what he knows, and know what he does not know. The liberty of the press is not to be trifled with by irresponsible reporters who think, nor is its freedom to be restricted by young men who let the actual facts in a case interfere with the requirements of the occasion. You can get your pay, sir, by calling at the office."

Odds and Ends.

THE following curious legal decision, which is almost as absurd as some that have emanated from the bench in this country, is recorded on the archives of a court in India: "Four men, partners in business, bought some cotton bales. That the rats might not destroy the cotton, they purchased a cat. They agreed that each of the four should own a particular leg of the cat; and each adorned with beads and other ornaments the leg thus apportioned to him. The cat, by an accident, injured one of its legs. The owner of that member wound about it a rag soaked in oil. The cat going too near the fire set the rag on fire, and, being in great pain, rushed in among the cotton bales where she was accustomed to hunt rats. The cotton thereby took fire and was burned up. It was a total loss. The three other partners brought a suit, to recover the value of the cotton, against the fourth partner who owned the particular leg of the cat. The judge examined the case and decided thus: 'The leg that had the oil rag on it was hurt; the cat could not use that leg; in fact, it held up that leg, and ran with the other three legs. The three unhurt legs, therefore, carried the fire to the cotton, and are alone culpable. The injured leg is not to be blamed. The three partners who owned the three legs with which the cat ran to the cotton will pay the whole value of the bales to the partner who was the proprietor of the injured leg.'

"ACCORDING to the testimony of the witnesses, you were caught just as you were getting out of the window, with the contents of the till in your pocket. Now, what excuse have you got?" And the magistrate leaned back in his chair very complacently. "I know it, your honour, and I shall always be grateful to the man who caught me. When I have these somnambulist fits I am in danger of falling out of windows and hurting myself." "That idea never occurred to me," remarked the magistrate pensively. "It has often occurred to me," remarked the prisoner with unconscious humour. "That being the case, I will direct the governor—" "To turn me loose?" "No, but to have an extra bar across your cell window for fear you may fall out."

A LONDONER went to stay with the Rev. Jack Russell, of Black Torrington, for a week, in order to have a spin or two with the well-known Devon and Somerset. On the morning of the first meet it rained as it can rain only on Exmoor, and the visitor looked out of the rectory windows in dismay, loudly proclaiming his disappointment, and declaring that no one could possibly turn out in such weather. The reply of the old hunting parson was: "Young man, you have life before you, but I am seventy-five years of age, and I cannot afford to waste a single day's hunting. Get ready as soon as possible, for we must be off in ten minutes!"

"THAT gentleman at the piano is Professor Keymasher," said Mrs. C. to the lady sitting next to her, in response to an enquiry while at a public rehearsal of the Philaccordeon Society last week. "Well, I can't say that I think much of his playing," replied the lady frankly. "Why?" exclaimed the surprised Mrs. C.; "he is one of the finest performers in our society, and, besides, he is a composer." "A what?" interrogated the stranger. "A composer," replied Mrs. C. "Well, all I have to say is that it would take better playing than that to compose me. It makes me frantic."

THEY have funny ideas on the Continent as to the social manners and customs of the English people. When an Italian adaptation of "Our Boys," called "I Nostri Bimbi," was produced in Venice, it was noticed that in order to appear true Englishwomen, all the actresses wore eyeglasses, and that hot punch was the staple beverage at a luncheon which took place upon the stage. When the punch had been consumed, glasses of gin were handed round—after the British fashion, of course—with indiscriminate and lavish liberality.

WHILE a small sloop belonging to a port in Fife was entering the Firth of Forth, one night, a gale came on, which necessitated the shortening of sail. The ship was not much above the tonnage of an ordinary herring-boat. The skipper alone was on deck, and at the helm—in fact, he constituted the watch. When the gale increased he left his post, went forward to the forecabin, and called down the hatchway: "All hands ahoy! Come up, Jamie and the laddie, and bring up the wee jibby under yer airin."

A SHARP student was called up by the worthy professor of a celebrated college, and asked the question: "Can a man see without eyes?" "Yes, sir," was the prompt reply. "How, sir," cried the astonished professor, "can a man see without eyes? Pray, sir, how do you make that out?" "He can see with one, sir," replied the ready-witted youth. And the whole class shouted with delight at the triumph over metaphysics.

A MAN who never has money enough on hand to pay his bills, bought a pair of boots on credit. "How much are they?" "Seven-and-six if you buy on credit, as usual, but fifteen if you pay cash down." "How is that?" "Vell, you see," said the simple-minded shoemaker, "ven I sells on credit I know it's a dead loss, so I makes the loss as small as possible."

"MOTHER, what's a bookworm?" "One who loves to read, study, and collect books, my dear." The next evening visitors were assembled. Miss Edith, who wears rings innumerable, was present. "Oh, mother, look at Miss Edith's rings! Is she not a ringworm?"

It is said that "out of every one hundred and nine female school-teachers, seven marry every year." How awful it must be for those seven women to marry every year.

A SEASIDE visitor went to the circulating library and asked if they had the "Letters of Jane Welsh Carlyle." She received the reply: "You will get 'em at the post-office."

"SEE here now, darlint. It's a stranger I'll be afther introducing to ye—a wonderful man—spakes sivin languages, and all of 'em foreign."

THE most absent-minded of men is the professor who, when he hears himself knocking the ashes out of his pipe, will call out, "Come in."

SOME men are so lacking in hospitality that they will not even entertain an idea.

THE girl with the big hat seems to be all head until you talk to her.

SOMNAMBULISM is believed to be an unconscious trance-action.

THE tradition that Eginhard married Charlemagne's daughter Emma has been satisfactorily disproved, but the story is so romantic that French ladies will continue to believe in it, and men will wish that it were true. According to the legend, Eginhard paid visits to the Princess Emma after dark, while the snow lay thick on the ground; but as he might have been detected by his footprints in the snow, the courageous young lady used to meet him at the garden gate, carry him to her abode in her strong arms, and then back again by-and-by. A spy caught her in the very act, and reported her to the emperor, who summoned his twelve peers to decide what should be done with the young man who had used his king's daughter as a beast of burden. Eleven of the peers showed sycophantic souls by making horrid proposals for torturing poor Eginhard, but Roland, the bravest of the brave, said simply, "Let them be married;" and Charlemagne, with a laugh, exclaimed: "I think, Roland, thou hast named the best punishment after all."

A TELEGRAM that frightened a gentleman's family terribly, who were staying at a country residence, was once received by his coachman, who had been instructed by letter to be at the station and await his arrival on a certain day. While waiting, the coachman received the following despatch: "Accident. Mr. B. remains comes next train." In consequence of the lack of a comma after "remains," Mr. B., on his arrival, found an undertaker and his assistants waiting at the station to convey his "remains" to his bereaved family.

AN American newspaper reports that "Gerald Massey, an English poet, has come to this country to lecture. He brought a portion of the title of his lecture with him, and the remainder will arrive on another vessel. His lecture is called, 'Man in Search of His Soul During Fifty Thousand Years, as Witnessed by the Evidence of Bone Caves, and How He Finds It.' If man wants to find his soul during the next six thousand years, he should not stop to read the title of Massey's discourse."

"I CAN'T live without her," he said to a friendly adviser, "and I am sure that away down in her heart she has a little feeling for me. I am going to test her." He pulled out a pistol, saying: "I am going to her with this and say: 'Here, shoot me down; I cannot live without you.' 'You had better not,' said the friend; 'she might pull the trigger.' 'I don't care for that,' replied the heart-broken lover; 'I don't care for that; I have filled the weapon with blank cartridges.'"

ONE of the French prisoners in Berlin, during the last war between France and Prussia, who was earning some money by making shoes, was a very good-natured fellow, and, like Mark Tapley, seemed determined to make the most of the situation. When taunted by a Prussian for being a captive, and asked what had become of French boasting now, he undauntedly replied: "French boasting, indeed! We said we should be in Berlin in three weeks, and here we are!"

A DISTINGUISHED wit was amusing himself at a dinner-party by making puns upon the names of his neighbours. A censorious Scotch lawyer, desirous to stop these personal jokes, addressed him thus: "I think, sir, that I rejoice in a name upon which you will not be able to make a pun." "Indeed!" said the wit. "Please tell me your name?" "My name, sir, is Dunlop." "Then," retorted the wit, "you have only to lop off the end and it is Dun" (done).

A WHITE man not long since sued a black in one of our courts, and while the trial was before the judge, the litigants came to an amicable settlement, and so the counsel stated to the court. "A verbal settlement will not answer," replied the judge; "it must be in writing." "Here is the agreement in black and white," responded the counsel, pointing to the reconciled parties. "Pray what does your honour want more than this?"

If you dream you are crossing the English Channel, it is a warning to discontinue heavy suppers. If you dream you are in church, most likely your next-door neighbour is receiving a certain lecture. If you dream that somebody loves you, dream as long as you can. And if you don't dream at all, it means that you are in sound health and have nothing on your mind.

"I UNDERSTAND that you referred to me as a pig, sir," remarked a pompous elderly gentleman to a young man who had spoken disparagingly of him to a third person. "You have been misinformed, sir," replied the young man; "I hope that I know better than to refer to a person of your advanced age as a pig."

TWO servants of a coquette are discussing the visitors of the house. "It seems to me," says the first, "that nowadays we never see Monsieur—Monsieur—what is his name?—the straw-coloured beard?" "Ah yes. The Deluge." "Why do you call him the Deluge?" "Because he reigned forty days."

A YORKSHIREMAN being solicited to give a certificate of character respecting a man who had applied elsewhere for a situation, kept within the confines of truth by saying: "He is as honest as most other people; has been known to speak the truth occasionally, and is frequently sober."

A MAN fished a rich old gentleman out of a millpond, and refused the offer of 2s. from the rescued miser. "Oh, that's too much!" exclaimed he; "taint worth it;" and he handed back 1s. 11d., saying calmly, as he pocketed the penny: "That's about right."

A COUNTRY paper has this personal item: "Those who know old Mr. Wilson of this place personally, will regret to hear that he was assaulted in a brutal manner last week, but was not killed."

THE young woman who had many suitors, and from the time she was sixteen until she was twenty-one rejected them all, referred in her later life to that period as her declining years.

WIFE: "But, my dear, I shall catch cold coming down so late to let you in." Husband: "Oh no, my love; I'll rap you up well before you come down."

A LADY says that the difference between a cotton and a satin dress is material; but that's all stuff.

A BACHELOR is a man who has lost the opportunity of making a woman miserable.

A YAWN in company generally indicates a gap in the conversation.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTIONS.

A CONSTANT READER (who has neglected to observe Rule 3) will be much obliged if anyone will tell her where the following song is published, and what is the name of the author:

By the old oak tree I'm standing
As I stood long years ago,
And the sun's bright rays are falling
On the tranquil scene below;
Happy memories crowd upon me
In this dear secluded place,
For each lovely scene reminds me
Of some old familiar face.

W. S. writes: "Can any of your musical readers inform me where a part-song, called, 'Come, silent evening, o'er us,' is to be procured? It is not published at Novello's or Boosey's, Chappell's or Cramer's."

ANSWERS.

BRUSH.—You do not say whether you require a book treating of oil or water-colour painting. "Rowney's Manuals," 1s., or Vere Foster's Hand-books, 3d. and 6d., are most useful. "Leitch's Water-Colour Painting" (Cassell), 5s., is a good book for a beginner.

CUPID.—"Dot" kindly writes that "The Curfew Bell" will be found in "Bell's Modern Reader and Speaker" (Simpkin), 3s. 6d.

E. M. G.—The late Mark Lemon was only once married (to Miss Romer), and left a numerous family of sons and daughters. He died May 23rd, 1870, aged sixty-one years.

LENA.—If you will kindly send, addressed to the Editor, a copy of the poem, he will, if not too long, print it; if otherwise, forward it to the respondent enquiring for it.

IRONMONGER.—It is generally considered that the fence belongs to the owner of the house on whose side the nails are driven, but this rule is by no means absolute. When the origin of a fence separating adjoining property is unknown, it belongs to both owners of the land in equal moieties.

JUNIPER.—The lines are to be found in a farce entitled, "Tis well, it's no worse," by Bickerstaff:

When late I attempted your pity to move,
Why seemed you so deaf to my prayers?
Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love,
But—why did you kick me downstairs?

KISMET.—1. You had better advertise your zither in the Exchange and Mart, The Queen, or Sylvia's Journal. 2. If you apply to the manager of the "Smith American Organ Company," 157, New Bond Street, and of the Holborn Viaduct, you will get all information about the organs.

LITTLE RED RIDING HOOD.—You will find a recipe for making "Shortbread in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 142. The following is Miss Acton's recipe for "Good Scottish Shortbread": "With one pound of flour mix two ounces of sifted sugar and one of candied orange-rind or citron, sliced small: make these into a paste with from eight to nine ounces of good butter, made sufficiently warm to be liquid; press the paste together with the hands, and mould it upon tins into large cakes nearly an inch thick, pinch the edges, and bake the shortbread in a moderate oven for twenty minutes, or longer, should it not be quite crisp, but do not allow it to become deeply coloured."

MISS MEGGS.—It would take up too much of our space to give you the consecutive order and date of publication of the late Charles Dickens's works. You will find this information in "The Bibliography of Dickens," by R. H. Shepherd, 3s. 6d., Messrs. H. Sotheran and Co., 36, Piccadilly.

NUBIAN.—If you look in the Church Times you will find people advertising for workers of church lace. At 22, Berners Street, there is a Society for the Employment of Ladies.

OLD CUSTOM.—The cutting of the "Baddeley Twelfth Cake" dates from 1794, when Robert Baddeley bequeathed in his will, among other curious provisions, the sum of one hundred pounds, invested in the Three per Cent. Consols, the interest to be laid out annually on Twelfth Night for cake, with wine and punch, to be presented in the green-room to the ladies and gentlemen engaged at Drury Lane Theatre. The prescribed form of cutting the cake is always observed with the formal toast of "The Memory of Robert Baddeley," although the founder's bequest is largely supplemented by private contribution. Mr. Augustus Harris this year gave the entertainment to more than two hundred guests after the pantomime on Monday, January 7th. Robert Baddeley was a popular actor of the last century, and the original representative of Moses in the "School for Scandal."

PAUL PRY.—Number Forty undoubtedly "takes the cake." The Editor's reasons are numerous, but interesting only, as he judges, to himself.

PERPLEXED HOUSEKEEPER.—1. It is a most difficult matter to get rid of such a plague of fleas. If a careful search every morning does not enable you to do so, the bedding must all be thoroughly cleansed, and it may be necessary to bake some portion of it. The room itself must be re-papered, painted, and whitewashed. No half-measures in such a case are of any use. 2. We do not know of any white or coloured enamel which would answer your purpose. Goodall's Brunswick Black both wears and looks well.

SINGLE STICK.—1. The penny is first mentioned as an English coin in the laws of Ina, the King of the West Saxons, who reigned A.D. 688, and its name was regarded as a diminutive of pana, or "little pledge," or token. In Saxon times the penny meant a silver coin of 24 grains (a dwt. or "pennyweight"), thirty of which, in the time of Ethelred, would purchase an ox and twelve sheep. The silver was "sterling," a term thought to be derived from the Easterlings, or men from the East, who had the English coinage in their charge. Though pennies in copper were so late, half-pennies had preceded them by one hundred and twenty years, and tokens of farthing, half-penny, and penny were issued by traders. 2. "Foreign Cage Birds," by C. W. Gidney, illustrated and containing full directions for successfully breeding, rearing, and managing foreign cage-birds, is publishing in parts (L. Upcott Gill), 6d. each. In Part II. you will find a description of the Beautiful or Paradisa Parrakeet.

THING OF BEAUTY.—1. It is early to predict what will be worn in the summer. Next month you should get "The Ladies' Gazette of Fashion," wherein you will probably find a shadow of coming things. 2. "Golden Macassar Oil" (Rowland's) is not the same article as "Rowland's Macassar Oil," and is especially designed for the use of fair-haired people and children. It is a delicate and very agreeable preparation, and is certainly superior to anything of the kind now in use. 3. Try French chalk; scrape it on to the grease spot, rub well in, and on brushing it off you will probably find the spot has disappeared.

VERITAS I.—The verse is the seventh of "Man was Made to Mourn," a dirge, by Burns:

Many and sharp the num'rous ills
Inwoven with our frame!
More pointed still we make ourselves,
Regret, remorse, and shame!
And man, whose heav'n-erected face
The smiles of love adorn,
Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn!

W. J. B.—1. The black spots which trouble you on your face are a very common complaint called acne, for which we are constantly asked to give a remedy. The following is our family doctor's advice: "Well steam the affected part every night, after which use plenty of friction with a soft tooth brush and warm soap and water, and then apply some sulphur ointment or a lotion of sulphur and alcohol. If the spots should be raised and indolent, they might be touched with a little acid—nitrate of mercury—taking care to use a glass brush for this purpose, and drying the part afterwards with blotting-paper. If W. J. B. should not be in perfect health, she had better consult a medical man, as possibly a course of medicine might materially help to relieve her of what appears to be so troublesome and annoying to her. 2. Why not try putting a little more oil to the wax? Probably oil of almonds would answer your purpose better than olive-oil. W. S.—1. The author of "Supernatural Religion" is not known. 2. We know of no book in which the teachings of Darwin have been efficiently controverted, but the non-Christian inferences derived therefrom have been combated very intelligently by Professor Wace, Dr. Sexton, and Dr. Lionel Beale.

Anne Moroney.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

BALLINAKILL is a straggling, pretty town in the south of Ireland. It is built on a calm, even-flowing, willow-fringed river. It has a fine old church, a picturesque mill, a comfortable rectory.

There are a good many gentry in and about the village; people with good old families, and small rent-rolls, which grow smaller each year as discontent and disaffection spread through the country.

Driving into the town, down the crooked, hilly street that leads from the railway-station, the first building of any importance you must notice is a large, rambling, ivy-covered house, just over the bridge. The house proper is a square, comfortable, unpretentious block of an ancient tower, which are the pride and glory of Mr. Moroney's heart, and of which, if you have patience to listen to him, he will tell you many a thrilling story.

The Moroneys are the poorest, and far the proudest of all the county gentry. "One of their name" has lived from time immemorial in the old house by the river. Once on a time in the good old days great part of the village belonged to them, but those times are over for ever, and now everyone in Ballinakill knows that they have hard work to pay their way and make both ends meet.

The present Mrs. Moroney had been a Miss O'Brien, a great beauty without a penny of fortune, and Dennis Moroney, who had been cautioned times without end that if he wished to do any good for himself he must marry someone with money, had of course fallen wildly in love with her the very first time he had met her at a hunt-ball; had fallen in love with her and married her out of hand, in spite of everyone, and had, in spite of debts, and difficulties, and bitter poverty, never repented it. He was a loyal, true-hearted gentleman, easy-going, and good-tempered, and, having made his choice, he would abide by it; and indeed Kate Moroney was a good wife after her lights. Poor woman! hers was not an easy life.

Dennis, like every Moroney that ever lived, was extravagant. He had not the faintest idea of the value of money; all the pinching and scraping, the perpetual striving to join those two ends, that yet could never be induced comfortably to meet, fell on his wife.

She grew sharp, and worn, and middle-aged before her time. The beauty which had made her the toast of the county twenty years ago was now a thing of the past. She was a very proud woman, tenfold prouder than her husband. Had she had a son she would have schemed and planned to get him on in the world; having but a daughter, all her pride and all her ambition centred in her.

Her father's darling, and her mother's pride, who yet could never quite forgive her for not being a son, perhaps that is the best way to describe Anne Moroney at this time.

It was post-hour at Ballinakill, a delicious morning in late September. The sky was clear blue, between the yellowing boughs of the five tall poplars that skirted the garden on the riverside; the crisp bright sunshine was flooding all the shabby breakfast-parlour where Mrs. Moroney sat over her letters, a more than usual pucker on her high forehead.

"Any bad news, Kate?" Honest Dennis seldom had any letters; since he had been married he had let his wife manage all his correspondence.

Mrs. Moroney glanced towards the sunshiny window, where her daughter was standing looking out at the sparkling river, perfectly indifferent to her mother's correspondence; she knew by experience that there was seldom anything very interesting in these documents. "I have had a letter from Mrs. Hewson—Sarah Crowe that was."

"I remember her; a fine dashing girl she used to be," Dennis always had a great admiration for a fine woman.

His wife glanced at him rather repressively.

"She wants to know if I can spare Anne to her for a visit."

"Oh, mother!" Anne was all awake now. She turned from the window, a soft flush on her smooth cheeks, her eyes radiant, her fair hair shining in the sunlight. One forgot to notice how plain, even to shabbiness, was her old blue gown. Is it not Oliver Wendell Holmes who has said, and truly, "that almost anything will do to cover young and graceful curves"? and Anne's "curves" were simply delicious in their soft youthfulness. "Oh, mother!" she said, clasping her hands in a little ecstasy.

To the girl of eighteen, who never all her life had been more than five or six miles from Ballinakill, the prospect of a visit to Dublin was almost too delightful.

"You would like to go?" her mother said thoughtfully, but there was no need of an answer, no mistaking the radiant young face.

The mother sighed a little as she laid down her letters, and began to pour out tea. Was she remembering and regretting her own vanished youth?

"It is kind of her to ask you. She is your godmother, you know."

Anne did know, but the fact had not made much impression on her. She had never seen Mrs. Hewson, that she could remember.

"She and I were great friends once on a time," said her mother; "but—"

"Let me see," it was Mr. Moroney's turn to sigh now, "her husband was a very well-to-do man, wasn't he?"

"Yes," his wife answered; "he made his money in trade. We all thought it rather a come-down for Sarah Crowe to marry him; the Crowes have always been very respectable."

"I am not sure that we did not all make a mistake, my love. These ideas have quite gone out of the world."

"So much the worse for the world," Mrs. Moroney answered severely. "I should be sorry to see a child of mine marry into trade."

Before Mrs. Moroney's eyes rose a vivid picture of the man she would like her daughter to marry—a man of old family, of irreproachable name, with a fine old house, and, though this was a very secondary matter in her eyes, a good rent-roll. Such a man she had had in her eyes ever since Anne had left the schoolroom, and it was the thought of him that made her so averse to letting her daughter out of her sight.

"The child has never had a holiday," said her father. "We'll miss her; but I think she might go."

Anne was her father's darling, and, if it was a sacrifice to let her go, he was quite repaid when the girl came round, and put her fair arms round his neck, and kissed and stroked his grey hair.

"Yes, I suppose she may as well go," said her mother gloomily. And so it was settled, and the letter that decided Anne's fate was written and posted, and then arose the question of ways and means.

Mr. Moroney discovered that he had all along intended to sell a heifer just at this time, and so could supply some money for the necessary outfit.

It was too great an occasion to trust to the Ballinakill dress-maker who had always made Anne's dresses. A visit must be paid to the county town ten miles away. Frocks and bonnets, ribbons and gloves, must be chosen.

Mrs. Moroney was, as I have said, a proud woman. Since her daughter was to go, she should, as far as possible, have everything suitable to her position. What Mrs. Hewson thought of the sufficiency of this wonderful wardrobe afterwards is neither here nor there. Grafton Street and Ballinakill have different ways of looking at things.

"Just fancy, I am going away to-morrow for six whole weeks! Only think, Mr. Levers—six weeks!"

Anne Moroney was walking down by the river under the whispering poplars, "saying good-bye to it," as she said to her father before she came out.

It seemed to her that a great crisis had come in her little world. The old life was over, the first volume of her fair maidenhood closed up and put by on the shelf; and so she had come out to say good-bye to the calm, even-flowing river, with its black coal-barges gliding along under the wide arch of the bridge, its blue-grey willows, its stately poplars.

Anne knew and loved every inch of this river. There was a little wicket-gate leading out from the end of the garden on to the path, and here she often came out to dream her maiden dreams. Someone else, too, was fond of walking by the river-bank this summer. To be sure, it was a short cut from Levers Court to Ballinakill—at least, so John Levers would say. He had scarcely yet acknowledged, even to himself, that the hope of meeting a slim, blue-robed figure with eager, innocent eyes should have first suggested to him the advantage of saving half a mile of high-road.

John Levers was a tall, grave man of thirty-eight, or thereabouts, with stooping shoulders and kind grey eyes. When I say that he was Mrs. Moroney's ideal son-in-law, I have said enough for his position and social standing. He had been the great "catch" of Ballinakill any time these fifteen years, but he had never shown a moment's preference for any girl until at a Christmas party, last year, he had met Anne Moroney.

It was all up with him from that moment. He had vowed then that that slim, childish girl, and no other, should be his wife, mistress of the stately old Court, and lady of his heart.

He was anything but a conceited man, but he knew his own position, he knew how poor the little family at the Bridge House was, and he did not apprehend any great opposition, not at least when he was away from Anne; but when once he found himself in her sweet presence, all his confidence forsook him, he forgot all his own advantages, and saw himself as he was, grave, and grey, and middle-aged, and not apt at those pretty speeches girls like.

And now she was going away for six weeks! Poor John Levers! Like Anne, he thought anything may happen in six weeks, only his were all fears, hers all hopes.

"Just think, Mr. Levers," went on the girl's fresh voice, quite unconscious of the storm in her companion's breast, "I have never been away from home all my life."

"No," John answered lamely; "how they will miss you."

Should he speak now? he was wondering—should he Put it to the touch, and win or lose it all?

"Yes," Anne was grave a moment. "Father will miss me; he likes to have me with him. You must go in sometimes, Mr. Levers, and cheer him up."

"I could not make up for you."

"No," said Anne candidly; "still, you would be better than no one."

And then her momentary gravity forsook her, and she chattered on of all she hoped to see and do in town.

"You are very glad to go?" said John.

If she had not been such a child, she must have heard the pain in the man's voice; but Anne would as soon have suspected the river, or the old grey bridge itself, of any feeling about her departure as John Levers.

"Of course I am glad; everyone likes to go away sometimes."

"And you don't think what we are to do without you all this time."

She looked up at him then, with bewildered grey eyes.

John stopped and stood in front of her. There was no one in sight, the last barge had just disappeared round the bend of the river. Now was his time. He stooped, and took the little hand in its shabby glove.

Anne remembered guiltily a hole in one of the fingers she had forgotten to mend. Would he see it?

She would not have been much comforted had she known that John saw the hole well enough, and vowed in his honest heart that his darling, if she would be his, should never more need to wear mended gloves.

"Anne, I can't let you go without a word, without a promise. Listen, dear. You are very young, I know; I meant to have waited a little before I spoke." He was still holding her hand, and Anne was looking up at him with wide, wondering grey eyes. "Anne, you are going away, and I must tell you now how I love you; how I have loved you ever since that Christmas party at Mrs. Odell's—you remember?"

Anne did remember that party, and how she had enjoyed it; but she could not say that she had any special recollection of John Levers; she had classed him with her father almost, at all events with the elderly people. Harry Odell home from Woolwich, with a word and a laugh for everyone, was much more in her line; but she was beginning to understand. The sweet colour flushed up in her cheeks, a look almost of fright came into her eyes.

"I love you so much, Anne, and I want you for my wife."

Now Anne was innocent, but she was not foolish; she knew quite well in what estimation Mr. Levers, of the Court, was held in the county, and she was quite capable of appreciating the honour he had done her, but yet—but yet—

"Don't look so frightened, Anne darling, there is nothing to be frightened at." John Levers's voice was very tender, his eyes were very kind, but the girl standing in front of him looked almost scared. "I know how much older I am than you, but, trust me, I will love you better than any young man. Anne, have you no word for me? Will you put your hand in mine, and say that you will love me and marry me?"

"Oh no, no, I cannot."

She shrank from him visibly, and John's face paled.

"Why not? Could you not manage to care a little for me?"

"But a little would not do."

Anne shook her fair head sagely. John smiled. He did not much believe in her refusal.

"I would be content with it at first, and it would grow to more," he said confidently; but Anne thought she knew better, and she shook her head again.

"Your father and mother would not, I think, disapprove of me."

She knew that too. How, indeed, was it possible they should disapprove? But after all was not she the principal person to be consulted? She had read a few novels, and she had dreamt a little, as all girls do, of the Prince Charming who was to come for her some day. She was quite sure she was not, and never could be, in love with plain, middle-aged John Levers. And yet, if she had not been going away, it is more than probable that she would not have found it in her heart to say him "No!"

She was a soft, yielding girl, to whom it was horrible to have to give pain to anyone. But then there was that delightful visit, the balls and concerts, the rides and drives she had been promised. How was she to enjoy any one of these good things if her liberty were to be taken from her? Fancy if she were to go up to town engaged to be married to Mr. Levers! If, indeed—horrible thought!—under such circumstances her mother would allow her to go at all!

"Oh no, no, please, Mr. Levers," she cried, and John let go her hands, and turned away. Her refusal to love him was very bitter to him. He was not conceited, but he knew, could not have helped knowing, that there were very few girls in the county who would have said no to him. Why was it just this one on whom he must set his heart?

And yet he did not altogether despair; she was so young, she did not know her own mind, and he loved her so much. Surely—

"Please, Mr. Levers," she had said, laying her little hand on his arm, and John had turned back again.

"Don't cry," he had said. "Don't cry, it makes me feel like a brute; but, Anne, I can't take that answer all at once. You don't know how I love you. If you won't marry me, then I will marry no other woman; but at all events I will not give up hope yet, not till I hear of your being married to another man."

Anne flushed softly. She was not sure that she meant him to have no hope. She was frightened and bewildered, that was the principal feeling she was conscious of; bewildered as to the magnitude of this thing that had happened to her, frightened as to what her mother might have to say about it.

They had reached the little gate leading from the river walk by this, and John Levers felt it was time for him to say good-bye.

He had come down this walk this summer once too often for his peace of mind, if this was to be the end of it all.

He stopped and looked down at her.

"And I shall not see you again for six weeks?" he said sorrowfully, looking at her as if he must imprint every line of the sweet girlish face and figure on his memory.

"No," said Anne, with something very like a throb of joy.

"It will seem a long time. Will you forget us all down here?"

"No," she said again.

"And when you come home, Anne, I shall try my luck again."

"Are you—will you—?" Anne scarcely knew how to say what was in her mind. "Must you tell mother?" she blurted out at last with crimson cheeks.

Now John Levers knew well enough that between Anne and her mother was not that perfect union that is desirable between mother and daughter. He also knew that Anne was timid to a fault, and that Mrs. Moroney could be both harsh and severe where she conceived herself to have reason for being so. That she would consider her daughter's refusal of his very eligible self a good cause for anger he was afraid, and also that in her first wrath it would go hard with poor little Anne.

"Not unless you wish it," he answered. "It seems to me there is no use speaking. I am afraid she will be, perhaps—sorry."

"Yes," Anne knew that.

"Six weeks will soon be over, and then—why then I will try again. Good-bye now, my dear, Heaven bless you!"

John Levers's voice was scarcely quite steady as he pressed the little hands closely in his. Poor John! He was a good, true-hearted man. What a pity that he was grave, and grey, and middle-aged, or, rather, what a pity that foolish little girls of eighteen will always judge by the outside!

CHAPTER II.

"My dear child, how pleased I am to see you." It was late on the September evening when the Ballinakill train got into Kingsbridge.

Anne was dazzled and bewildered with the lights, and the bustle, and the noise, but she had scarcely set her foot on the platform when she was seized in a comfortable grasp.

"I know you must be Anne Moroney. Now, then, for your luggage. Here, John! How glad I am to see you!" And amidst these voluble exclamations of delight, Anne was borne away to Mrs. Hewson's cosy brougham.

Mrs. Hewson was a stout, brisk, comfortable-looking woman, as good-natured and unaffected as it was possible to be. Her husband had been, as Mrs. Moroney expressed it, "in trade," and at his death had left her very well off indeed. She had a pretty house in a pleasant suburban road, had carriages and horses—everything the heart of woman could desire. She would have been immensely amused had she known the pity her old schoolfellow extended to her.

One drop of bitterness certainly there was in her cup, as there is in everyone's. In her case it was that she had no child to lavish all her love and care upon.

At first she had fretted a good deal over this, but she was not a woman to waste her time in useless repinings, and so, since Heaven had seen fit to deny her the blessing of real motherhood, why, she did the next best thing, and was second mother to all the young people of her acquaintance. Little children, boys and girls home from school, come-out young ladies, young men at college, one and all loved "dear Mrs. Hewson." She was never tired of planning pleasures and surprises for them, and she had her reward.

One great failing, it must be confessed, she had. She was apt to forget, or, at least, to lose sight of, people if they were not just in her way. And so it had come to pass that for so many years she had almost forgotten the existence of her little country god-daughter, but she was resolved to make up for it now.

"You darling child!" she said in a little comfortable rapture that evening, as they sat over their tea in the pretty drawing-room; "it shall not be my fault if you do not enjoy yourself."

"Positively the prettiest girl I ever saw in my life. Kate Carew is nothing to her," declared Mrs. Sandilands, Mrs. Hewson's bosom friend, some time later. "That little air of simplicity she has is so delightful."

"But it is not an air," said Mrs. Hewson; "it is quite genuine. I don't believe she has an idea how charmingly pretty she is; she is the most absolutely simple girl I ever came across."

"That won't do her any harm. She'll learn soon enough. All the young men are raving about her. I rather think," and Mrs. Sandilands nodded her head sagaciously, "that young Brookes—"

Mrs. Hewson looked wise and said nothing. Like most good-natured, motherly women, she was a great matchmaker, and if fortune had indeed favoured Anne so far as to bring such a prize as young Brookes to her feet, why, she was a lucky girl; but Mrs. Hewson was too wise to commit herself yet.

"He is a nice, pleasant, unaffected young fellow," she said cautiously.

"And with more money than he knows what to do with. They are doing a tremendous business."

"I don't know if the old couple would like Anne's going to live in London."

"Pshaw! my dear Mrs. Hewson, how could they help liking it? She's a pretty girl, but then such men as Richard Brookes don't drop into girls' mouths every day," which was true enough, if somewhat coarse.

This little conversation took place when Anne had been about three weeks in Dublin.

Three golden, beautiful weeks they had seemed to the child. To say she was happy is to say nothing. Everything was so new, and fresh, and delightful to her. Her letters home were simply ecstatic.

Mrs. Hewson was so good, so kind.

The girl had no notion of the benevolent plans and projects towards herself which occupied her godmother's thoughts; but she had all a pretty girl's pleasure in pretty things, and she honestly enjoyed and was grateful for the pretty new gowns, the dainty gloves, and odds and ends Mrs. Hewson showered upon her, and the like of which she had never possessed in all her life.

Sometimes, but not often, when she first came up, the remembrance of John Levers's grave, kind face would come to her as they had parted that day under the poplars.

Poor Mr. Levers! she was very sorry for him; and then she would remember guiltily that he was to come to her again when she went home; but that was a long time off yet. And then, after the first few days, she ceased to think of him at all, for Richard Brookes came, and the world was changed for Anne.

He was so different from anyone she had ever seen before—this rich young fellow, with his fair, handsome face and careless, debonaire ways.

"By Jove! she is the greatest beauty I ever saw in my life," he had cried the first night he saw her. "Who is she?"

He had lost no time in getting an introduction to her, and from that very first moment had devoted himself to her in an unmistakable manner.

His friends had shrugged their shoulders, and wondered if Dick was in earnest, and if so, what old Brookes would say to his son and heir throwing himself away on a girl without a penny?

But little cared Dick what anyone said or thought. If ever any young man was in earnest, he was. He had always had his own way, and he meant to have it now. What was the use of all his money if it could not win him what he wanted? Of course the governor would be a bit cut up at first, but when he saw Anne he would forget all that.

Handsome Dick was a "brave wooer." They were a pretty sight these lovers in the shortening October days. Anne lived in a dream of happiness; Dick used to think sometimes it was good to stay away, to see the soft colour flush up in her cheeks when he came—the glad, welcoming light in her grey eyes.

He was her hero, her prince among men; she looked on to no future; she had no thought of home or mother, or of her half-promise to John Levers.

Nothing asked, nothing granted. Just two hearts perfectly happy in the consciousness of each other's love, indifferent to aught else beside. Many people will tell you this is the perfect time of love, but all perfection must come to an end, and so did this.

"I have to go back to London to-morrow," said young Brookes gloomily one afternoon. Mrs. Hewson was not in from her drive. Anne had a slight cold, and so had been left at home.

Very cosy and pretty the drawing-room looked. The firelight danced over the crimson tea-service, all in readiness for its mistress, over pictures and flowers, and dainty odds and ends, over Anne's bright head as she lay back in a deep armchair.

"I must go back to London."

"Go back to London!" the girl repeated vaguely, all the soft colour flushing up in her cheeks. Had he told her the sun would cease to shine to-morrow, and the world be in darkness, it could not have been more awful to her.

"Yes, properly speaking, I ought to have gone last week. I came over on business, and it's been done long ago; and my father is writing for me. Anne darling"—Dick Brookes had left his chair somehow, and was kneeling on the soft rug, his handsome head on a level with the girl's—"Anne darling, do you know how I love you? Will you tell me that you will try to love me well enough to marry me?"

Try to love him! It seemed to Anne as he kissed her lips, that she must have loved him all her life.

And Mrs. Hewson, coming in half an hour later, found them still there, sitting in the firelight, with happy faces that told their own tale, even if Dick had not at once come to meet her, saying in his bright boyish way:

"Mrs. Hewson, Anne has promised to marry me. Her own mother is not here, so you must wish us joy for her."

And Mrs. Hewson, even as she kissed the girl's sweet, shy face, was conscious of a little undefinable pang of something—was it fear, or was it only great love and tenderness for these two young things setting out on their journey of life?

"What do you think your father will say? I suppose it will be all right." It was next morning. Dick had called in directly after breakfast. He was leaving by the night-boat, and Anne had gone upstairs to put on her things for a walk. Mrs. Hewson seized the opportunity for a little talk. "He will be quite satisfied, you think?"

Dick reddened a little.

"Well, to tell the truth, Mrs. Hewson, I am afraid he won't."

"You think he will object?"

"I know if he could once see Anne it would be all right," said the young lover confidently; "but the fact of it is my father thinks a great deal of money."

"And Anne has not a penny," put in Mrs. Hewson.

"And does not want it," answered Dick promptly. "I know quite well that she is a thousand times too good for me."

"I don't say that, but she is a darling. It's a pity; but I suppose you are independent of your father?"

"No, that's just it; unfortunately I am not. I have my salary like the others, and he makes me a good allowance. Of course, if I were to marry, he has always given me to understand that he would do something for me."

"That is, if you marry someone whom he approves of?"

"Just so; but, dear Mrs. Hewson, don't look so melancholy. He'll cut up rough about it at first, but he'll grow reconciled to it, and when he sees Anne he must fall in love with her; no one could resist her."

Yes, that was all very fine, and she was very charming, Mrs. Hewson thought, as the girl came in dressed for her walk, in her plain, tight-fitting serge gown and fur cape, all the bright little tendrils of hair curling under her black hat, the soft, loving light in her grey eyes. Few men could be hard-hearted enough to resist her; but then old Mr. Brookes had never seen her, and Mrs. Hewson was beginning to be afraid that a penniless Irish girl would scarcely be an acceptable daughter-in-law to the wealthy merchant. But at all events, she consoled herself by thinking, Anne's people must be pleased. Dick had lost no time in writing to Mrs. Moroney, Anne sitting by him, her bright head against his shoulder as he wrote, certainly not thereby helping much in the composition.

But Dick wrote his letter with very few misgivings. He loved Anne, she loved him. His father would be brought in time to give his consent. This was the substance of it.

He was very thoroughly in love, and he was not more conceited than young fellows of his age usually are; but he had always had what he wanted, and he meant to have it now.

"Good-bye, my darling, good-bye. You will not forget me; you have got my address, and you will write. I shall let you know about my father at once; and, Anne love, I shall come over to Ballinakill for Christmas, if you will have me. Why, Anne, Anne," for the girl was clinging to him, holding him as if she could never let him go again. She had not thought it would be so hard to say good-bye. It seemed to her that she could not realise her life without him now. Dick was more moved and touched than he could say by her sweet sorrow. What had he done, he asked himself for the hundredth time, to deserve such love?

He was not a specially religious young fellow, but he did vow that night, as he walked back to his club, that with Heaven's help she should never repent her sweet trust.

"Come home at once; your father will meet the four o'clock train on Friday. Let there be no mistake."

Such was Mrs. Moroney's telegram, received on Thursday night, the same night that was carrying Dick Brookes away from Dublin.

Anne grew a little white as she read this, and a bewildered look came into her eyes. There was not, as I have said, much sympathy between her and her mother; but now at such a time, when she had told her all about Dick, surely she might have found some word to say.

"What does it mean?" Anne asked of Mrs. Hewson. "Do you think she is angry?"

"Angry! how could she be angry?" good Mrs. Hewson answered, with all the more decision because she did not feel quite sure. "I told her all about Mr. Brookes myself. As you met him here I am in a measure responsible, and Dick wrote—"

"Yes; oh, Mrs. Hewson, you don't think she could say no?"

"You foolish child!"—Mrs. Hewson kissed the sweet, wistful face—"there is absolutely nothing against it. Young Brookes is, or will be, very well off, and he is a gentleman in every sense of the word. There is no reason, unless, indeed, there was some one else."

Anne flushed guiltily under her friend's enquiring eye. She had forgotten all about John Levers.

"Then there is some one, Anne?"

"He did ask me if I would marry him, the day before I came up, but I could not; I told him so."

"Does your mother approve of him?"

"I think she is very fond of him. He said she would be sorry. He is old," pursued Anne irrelevantly, "almost as old as father."

"And what did she say when she heard you had refused him?"

Again Anne flushed redly.

"I did not tell her. He said it was no matter, and it was only the night before I came here. Oh, Mrs. Hewson, you don't think it was wrong?" and the tears came into the girl's eyes.

"Girls ought to have no secrets from their mothers," said Mrs. Hewson with a little rebuke in her voice.

What kind of woman, she wondered much, must Kate O'Brien have grown into to have failed, as she so evidently had, to win her daughter's trust and confidence.

If Heaven had blessed her with such a daughter, the childless woman thought, would it not have broken her heart to feel that she had secrets from her?

And so Anne was driven to the station next day, in the dull November morning.

It was scarcely six weeks since she had come up, looking out with bright, bewildered eyes at the new world opening before her.

Scarcely six weeks, and what experiences had been hers; what a prospect had opened before her! She was going back to her old home blessed and crowned, as it seemed to her, above all other women, with Dick's love, chosen by him out of all the world.

How she clung to motherly Mrs. Hewson as she said good-bye! It was in her house she had been so happy. She was the last link with Dick.

"I could not have believed I would miss the child so much," that good woman thought, sitting the same afternoon over her solitary cup of tea. "I wish—I wish I could be sure."

CHAPTER III.

"AND NOW, pray, what is the meaning of all this?"

Mrs. Moroney stood over her daughter in the little shabby sitting-room. She had received her frigidly, she had made no demonstration of pleasure at having her home. Anne knew that she was judged and condemned in her mother's eyes, and under their cold scrutiny she felt a child again, shrinking, and shy, and silent.

It was just so her mother had looked at her when she had been convicted of some childish misdemeanour. Life here in the old house, with the visible signs of poverty at every turn, was a different thing from life in Mrs. Hewson's daintily-furnished, softly-coloured rooms. It was only a few hours since she had left town, but already beauty, and light, and brightness seemed to have slipped away from her, leaving nothing but the cold, bare realities of life.

Poor little Anne! she was but eighteen; she had been repressed all her life; she was tired, and weary, and disappointed. What would she not have given to have thrown herself into her mother's arms, and from that safe shelter to have told her everything! But how could she speak of Dick under those cold, searching eyes? And there was no help to be looked for from her father, she knew. He had kissed her almost guiltily, and had hurried away to shut himself up in his study. Dennis was but a broken reed for anyone to lean on.

"What is this nonsense, Anne? Don't look at me in that way, child; I suppose you can speak, and tell me all about it."

"Oh, mother, we do care for each other so much!"

"So you think," said Mrs. Moroney grimly. "I must say I trusted to Mrs. Hewson to take better care of you. How long have you known this young man, Anne?"

"Three weeks," faltered the girl.

"Three weeks! Truly you must have a large acquaintance with each other's characters. He has written to me, or to your father—it's all the same. I wrote to him last night."

"Oh, mother!"

All the colour had left Anne's cheeks now—she gazed at her mother with piteous eyes.

"Yes," went on that lady composedly. She did not mean to be cruel; she was acting for the best as she understood it; "he asked for an early answer; it was better he should be told at once."

"What did you tell him?"

"Can you have a doubt? I told him I could not possibly sanction such an engagement, that your father and I had other views for you. It will be a surprise to him, I dare say," and Mrs. Moroney's thin lips curled. "He does not seem to have much doubt as to his reception, although he candidly acknowledges that he may have some difficulty in reconciling his father to his choice; I think I have as much right to be particular about a husband for my daughter as Mr. Brookes, be he ever so wealthy, about a wife for his son. A tea-merchant!" It is impossible to describe the intonation of Mrs. Moroney's voice as she uttered these three words. "I have made no secret of my feelings, Anne. I have often said no child of mine should marry into trade—vulgar, purse-proud city folk, and the young man writes with such assurance. He has nothing of his own, he is quite dependent on his father, who, forsooth, may not approve of his choice."

"Oh, mother, mother!" Anne rose and stretched out her arms to the implacable figure. "Mother, I love him so; you will not send him away!"

"You must allow me to judge, Anne; you think you love him now. In six months you will have forgotten his very existence. I did think a daughter of mine would have more pride than to wish to go into any family where she is disapproved of."

"But he said he could win his father round in time."

"Yes, and we are to wait until his lordship chooses to signify his consent. No, Anne, the refusal ought always to come from the lady's side, and so it has."

Much more to this effect said Mrs. Moroney, while Anne sat before her, white, and tearless, and miserable.

She did not yet realise the edict that had gone forth against her; she had never resisted her mother all her life, and she did not know how to begin to do so now.

She lay awake all that night in wide-eyed misery, but in the morning, as she dressed herself, a little light of hope came to her. There would be a letter from Dick. He would not suffer himself to be sent away like that, he loved her too well; and she smiled reassuringly at her own pale face in the glass. And even as she smiled, the post had come in downstairs, and Mrs. Moroney was laying a letter directed in a bold, dashing, man's hand to Anne on the fire.

Have we not all known at some time of our lives the sickness of suspense, of watching for something that does not come, that fell upon this poor child's heart now?

She had trusted Dick so utterly. All her whole heart's love had gone out to him, and now was this to be the end of it all? To rise every morning with hope growing fainter, to go to bed every night with that sickening, dull sense of disappointment, of nothing left in life worth living for.

Even Mrs. Moroney, convinced as she was that she was acting for the best, sometimes felt a little pang of pity, but it was quickly quenched in anger that a child of hers could be so wanting in pride.

It was about ten days after Anne's home-coming, that her mother came into the old schoolroom, where the girl was sitting crouching over a fragment of fire.

"I have heard from Mr. Brookes, Anne," she said with almost a radiant expression of countenance. Had the woman a heart of stone that she could be unmoved by the sudden light that shone in the poor child's face? "A most satisfactory letter. He quite agrees with me that everything is best at an end; he cannot marry without his father's consent, you cannot without yours. I am glad he takes it so sensibly."

Anne opened her lips to speak, but no words came forth. She half stretched out her hand for the letter. How could she believe that Dick—her Dick—had forsaken her, if she could not read his own words, but it was no part of Mrs. Moroney's tactics to let her have that letter. There were sundry expressions in it which it would not do for Anne to read.

She folded it up, and put it in her pocket, and then came and kissed her daughter cheerfully.

"So now, Anne, that is all over, and we'll forget all about it. After all, he could not have cared much about you when he could give you up so easily. It is really Mrs. Hewson I blame for not taking better care of you."

"He could not have cared much, or he would not have given her up so easily." How those words rang in Anne's ears!

Ah, was it not true? She would not have given him up; she could not tell that that first letter, which had been laid on the red embers, had been followed by a second and a third, and that it was only when wounded, outraged, stung to the quick by her apparent willingness to forget, that Dick had written that bitter letter of renunciation.

And so it was all over! That one beautiful, perfect love-dream. What was left to her now for the rest of her life? the child thought drearily, as she went about the shabby house with a weary, listless step. Her father was more tender than ever to her, but he made no attempt to oppose his wife's will; he was nervously anxious to avoid all allusion to her visit, and what had happened there. It seemed to him that if no one spoke of it she must forget soon, not knowing, foolish man, that it is the things we do not speak of that eat into our very heart's core, that suck out our very life-blood.

And so the dreary winter days slipped by, and scarcely a day passed that John Levers did not find his way up to the Bridge House, to talk to Mr. Moroney, to look at Anne with gravely adoring eyes. It was the old story:

My mither pressed me sair, my feyther did na speak,
But he looked in my face and my heart was like to break.

What did it matter—what did anything matter? Anne thought, when John Levers came again at Christmas, and asked her to marry him.

I fear that a great many strong-minded young ladies will despise my poor heroine, will say that having once loved, she ought to have loved for ever. No doubt that is true, and were I writing a story, as children say, "out of my head," Anne should be as constant and devoted as heart could wish; but this is a true sketch, and I must draw her as she was, a soft, tender, timid girl, who, if she had but known that Dick remembered her, that he loved her through everything, could have been very strong, and true, and devoted, but who, failing that, had neither courage or strength left her for anything.

If it would make John Levers happy, if it would please her father, what right had she to hold back? What did it matter? Married or single, Dick was as far away from her.

People said that Miss Moroney looked more like a ghost than a living girl, the morning she was married—a bleak, chill, February morning, with a threatening of snow in the air.

The little ivy-covered church was crammed to see this marriage; girls wondered, and their mothers shook their heads.

There was something wrong about it, they said. But at all events, whatever might be thought of the bride's looks, there was no doubt of the satisfaction in her mother's face, the pride and adoring tenderness in her bridegroom's. Poor John Levers, and poor Anne!

CHAPTER IV.

A STILL, sweet, April morning, the whole air full of the perfume of pale starry primroses, of violets, of the budding fir-trees, for which Levers Court is famed.

Through the wood, walking noiselessly on the thick carpet of brown fir-needles, a girl is coming, tall and slim and fair, looking the very spirit of the woods in her light spring gown, with her colourless face and pathetic, sorrowful eyes.

A young man, coming quickly round the corner, the bright sunshine full on his fair, handsome face, gives a muttered exclamation of horror as he sees her.

She has not lifted her eyes. He has come quite close before she hears him; and then all at once light, and hope, and colour leap back to her face, and as he opens his arms, she goes into them straight as a tired child to its mother, and they stand there together at last under the trees, forgetful of everything but each other.

It is Anne who remembers first all that has come and gone since then, and who draws herself back with a shudder as she lifts a piteous face to him—her handsome young lover.

"Oh, Dick, Dick," she cries despairingly, "why did you not come before? Why did you not write?"

"I wrote so often, three or four times, and got no answer; and then I had a letter from your mother, written, she said, with your full consent, saying that everything was at an end between us. Oh, Anne, how could you have given me up so easily?"

"I never heard from you, never once," the girl breathed rather than spoke.

Dick Brookes's face grew very dark for a moment, and then immediately cleared.

"Then you did not forget me! Oh, Anne darling, it is not too late!"

But Anne gave a great cry, and slipped away from him down on the damp earth.

"Not too late! Oh, Dick, did you not know? I am married—I was married two months ago."

The soft April wind sighed on through the fir-tree tops, while the girl lay there, stricken to the earth, and the young man stood above her pale and stern.

"Married!" he said at last, breaking the silence.

"Yes. Oh, Dick, Dick, forgive me; I thought you had forgotten, you never wrote, and it did not seem worth while. But it will be soon over now; I do not think I shall live much longer. Look," and she stood up before him, pushing back her sleeve and showing her fair, wasted arm; "I think I shall be glad to die."

Dick set his teeth hard.

"Is he—is he kind to you?" he said.

"Kind—yes, he is kind, too kind. Poor John!"

"Oh, Anne, if you had waited. If you had trusted me. My love, my darling, how can I leave you like this?"

Something very like a sob broke from the strong man. For one wild moment a temptation came to Dick Brookes. Why should he not take her away—anywhere? She belonged to him first, and he was a free agent now; his father was dead; this marriage of hers was a mockery. He would take her away somewhere, what did it matter so long as they were together?

But the pale purity of the gentle face raised to his rebuked that thought. No, come what might, no breath of wrong should touch her.

"Dick, you have not said yet that you forgive me; and then it must be good-bye. They told me——"

"Heaven forgive them!" muttered Dick. "Yes, I forgive you, my darling, if there is anything to forgive."

"Then it must be good-bye, Dick. I cannot bear much more. Dick, you will say good-bye to me and go."

He took her in his arms, and their lips met in one long last kiss. Surely even Mrs. Moroney, could she have seen the white misery of those two young faces, would have rued her work.

"Mother, what have you done with the letters Dick wrote to me here last November—three letters?"

Young Mrs. Levers stood before her mother, looking in the spring twilight like some beautiful, pale ghost. There was not a vestige of colour in her cheeks; her eyes were blazing darkly.

Mrs. Moroney shivered as she looked up at her.

Times were changed now. She had recognised long since that she had no longer any authority over her daughter. Since that day, five months ago now, a wall of ice had been raised between them. The greatest stranger had more of a welcome at Levers Court than the woman who had so schemed and planned to put her child there.

"I met him to-day, mother. His father is dead; he had come here to marry me; he never gave me up. Mother, what did you do with those letters?"

She could not lie to those blazing eyes. The woman raised a deprecating hand.

"I did it for the best, Anne."

"Did you burn them?"

"Yes, Anne. It was for your sake."

"Mother, look at me." The girl came close, and stood before her. She had grown since her marriage. There was a new dignity and beauty in her despair, different from the crushed, heart-broken girl of five months before. "Look at me, mother. You have broken my heart; you have spoiled my life. Are you satisfied with your work? It is not your fault that I did not go with Dick to-day. When I die, you may know it is your doing. No, don't touch me; don't come near me. I am going now."

The lilacs were blossoming about Levers Court, and the May was white in the hedges, while the young mistress, who was scarcely more than a bride, lay a-dying.

Everything was done for her that money or love could suggest.

"There is a curious failure of vital power," said the grave town doctor, who had been summoned to her bedside.

The case baffled his experience. So young, so wealthy, and apparently so beloved! Had she not everything to make life precious?

"Has she not got a mother or any near relation to be with her?" he asked compassionately.

But Anne had shaken her head, and had grown so excited when her mother was mentioned, that no one had dared bring her.

Poor Dennis sat with her hour after hour, trying to persuade himself that she was better. Poor man! he had never quite understood it all, but he blamed himself now for not having taken better care of his darling.

"Anne, my dearest, you will not leave me?" grave, cold John Levers prayed as he sat by his wife's bed, patient, devoted, unwearingly.

And Anne did not shrink from him now as she used. She seemed quieter, more at rest when he was near her.

"John," she said to him one evening, "you have been very good to me."

"My darling, who could not be good to you? You have not known how I love you."

"And I have nearly hated you sometimes. Oh, John, I ought never to have married you, but I did not care then. May I tell you? If you could hold me up a little—I am so tired."

And then in her weak, dying voice she told him what she had never breathed before, the story of Dick Brookes.

"I loved him so," she said dreamily; "I wonder if you care as much for me. I think my heart died then, nothing seemed to matter. John, I have tried to bear it, but I was not strong enough. John, you are not angry with me?"

"Angry, my darling! If you had only told me!"

"I think I might have come to care for you, John, if I had stayed at home that time, if I had never seen him. You are so good, but I could not forget him. I did try, and that day I met him in the wood, my poor Dick! He did not know I was married. I knew then I had not forgotten, and so it is better for me to die. Lay me down now, John. You won't go away?"

She was quiet for a few minutes, and then she spoke again.

"Give my love, my dear love, to father, and tell mother that I forgive her now. She did not mean it. I am so tired, I think now I will go to sleep. You do forgive me, John?"

And so she dropped asleep, gently, quietly, peacefully, as a little child sinks to sleep, to waken no more in this weary world.

And this is sweet Anne Moroney's true story. No heroine, you see, just a weak, simple, loving girl, who, when her love failed her, felt all else fail her too.

If you go down to Ballinakill, the old sexton will show you a grave which, summer or winter, is never without a few flowers, and he will tell all about young Mrs. Levers, and what a beauty she was, and how she died soon after her marriage. If you encourage his gossip, he will tell you, too, of how once a young gentleman came down, "as handsome a young gentleman as ever was seen," and how he had knelt down by her grave, and cried just like a child.

"I mind the day she was married as if it were yesterday," old Bryan says. "'Twas thought a grand match for her, for the Moroneys were poor, broken-down gentry, and for all he was old enough to be her father, they said Mr. Levers worshipped the very ground she trod on. There was a sight of folk to see them married, but she looked more like a corpse than a bride. 'Twas queer, too, she never had her own mother with her all the time she was sick. Consumption, the doctors said it was, but my missus she always held 'twas a broken heart. There's a many dies of complaints the doctors has got no names for."

To My Betrothed.

I KNOW, my sweet, how kind your heart, although
Some people say that you are proud and cold;
They know you not; 'tis but to me you show
What hidden fire your secret heart can hold.

Why of all others do I have the joy
Of winning that for which all others pine?
They equal skill and art with mine employ,
By what strange fortune have I made you mine?

Ah, my beloved! ere another week
Has passed away (too slowly will it run),
In church the magic words "I will" you'll speak,
Then even in our names we shall be one.

Book II.

CHAPTER VIII. "WHAT THE ANGELS TELL LITTLE CHILDREN."

THE first glance Ivor had given at Beryl's face as he met her in the hall, told him her fears had been realised.

She had come alone. The little lads were not with her, a fact unusual in itself.

"Do not laugh at presentiments again," she said, trying to speak more bravely than her white face and quivering lips allowed as possible. "Mine are more than realised."

He had taken her hand, and stood looking down on her with sad and troubled eyes.

"And when do you go?" he asked.

She started.

"I? Oh, I was not thinking of that. It is about the children. Next month they are to go. I—I came to see your mother at once. There are so many things to be done—arranged."

Her voice broke. She turned aside to conceal her weakness, being woman enough to know how the sight of tears tries even the strongest man.

"Has your visitor arrived?" she asked presently when the momentary weakness had been struggled with and suppressed.

"Yes," he answered somewhat constrainedly; "he is with my mother now."

"Then perhaps I shall be intruding——"

"On the contrary," he interrupted, "I am sure she will gladly welcome your presence. I don't think she cares very much for Count Savona's companionship."

"Then we will go to her," said Beryl somewhat absently.

She was thinking it was a little odd that neither mother nor son cared for the presence of this man, and yet received him as a guest beneath their roof. However, her heart was too sore and troubled to concern itself much about anything save its own grief, and in silence she went with Ivor to his mother's room.

"So that is the mysterious count," she thought, seeing only a tall, pale-faced man, with a singularly graceful presence, who rose and bowed low at her entrance. "Nothing very sinister or melodramatic about him."

"It is possible, perhaps, that the ladies may have matters to talk about which the rough and prosaic mind of man may not sufficiently appreciate," said the count after a slight interval of desultory talk. "I propose, my dear Captain Grant, that we go and smoke our cigarettes on the terrace till luncheon."

Ivor, only too thankful to take that baleful presence and those basilisk, admiring eyes from the presence of Beryl Marsden, agreed at once.

The two women were left alone.

"And has the ill news come?" asked Mrs. Grant as the door closed.

"Yes," said Beryl despairingly. "I was only hoping against hope. I—— Good Heavens!" she said in horror. "Mrs. Grant—dear friend—what is it?"

For Mrs. Grant had suddenly sunk back with a faint moan, and lay there to all appearance lifeless.

"And so that is your friend Mrs. Marsden?" the Count Savona was saying to Ivor Grant as they slowly paced the terrace together. "A pretty woman!"

"Do you think so?" answered Ivor, suppressing a strong inclination to knock down this insolent commentator on the divine looks and graces of his goddess.

"Yes, I do, and a woman with character, I should say. None of your pink-and-white sawdust dolls. A woman," he added musingly, "worth loving, suffering, sinning for. There are not many."

"You appear to have studied Mrs. Marsden very closely in your brief interview," said Ivor coldly, though a raging anger boiled in his heart at the man's insolence.

The count shrugged his shoulders.

"Life has two guiding stars—expediency and tact. Following them, one can do a great deal—can command almost any fate; so I have found. I am a close observer of human nature. It is surprising how it is alike, and yet different in likeness. Men and women interest me, and I have learned to read them pretty accurately. Perhaps you would be surprised to hear that in this 'brief interview,' as you call it, I have learnt a great deal of Mrs. Marsden. I will give you my deductions, if you care to hear them."

"Well?" said Ivor briefly.

"In the first place," said the count coolly, "she is not a happy woman—her face tells me that; but she is a woman who under different circumstances would have been perfectly content, and, by force of that content, commonplace. Next: she does not care for her husband, though she is the sort of woman to idolise children. I prophesy, for her future, storms of whose strength she is utterly unaware, and against which she may battle successfully. I don't say she will."

There was a moment's silence; then Ivor turned abruptly to his companion.

"Do you mean to tell me," he said, "that you have never seen or heard anything of Mrs. Marsden till you met her in my mother's room just now?"

"Assuredly," he answered in cool surprise. "Do you think I have read her correctly?"

"How can I tell?" said Ivor bitterly. "What have I to do with her future?"

"A great deal, I fancy," said the count very quietly. "I am something of a seer, you know, and I prophesy—"

"Hold!" interrupted Ivor passionately; "I have no desire to hear more, and you have no possible title to discuss Mrs. Marsden's affairs or mine."

"You are impetuous, my young friend," said the count airily, as he puffed a little cloud of smoke from his cigarette. "It is an error of youth—a fatal one sometimes. You ought to have listened to me. Forewarned is forearmed, you know."

The quiet meaning of his tone seemed to carry the subject out of that region of insolence and interference which Ivor had been so ready to resent. It was a tone which spoke of conviction, and which they were aimed. That mark was Ivor's own heart, and the arrow of truth struck home with the force of an intolerable pain and a deadly sense of fear.

"I am at a loss to understand your words," he said huskily. "And excuse me if I say I am in no mood for playing Faust to Mephistopheles, as you seem to hint. I like plain-speaking."

"On the present occasion?" asked the count, taking the cigarette from his mouth and knocking off the loose ash. "Well, prophecy is always an unthankful office. I won't tell you anything more—yet. How is Sir Hector?"

The abrupt change was almost as insolent as the spoken words had been. A sense of positive hatred for this man seemed to seize Ivor Grant in that moment.

"Perhaps you would like to judge for yourself," he said coolly. "You will find him in the library;" and slightly raising his hat he walked off and entered the house.

An evil smile crossed the Count Savona's thin lips.

"The iron has gone home," he said to himself. "What trans-insolence though!" he muttered savagely. "If I could afford myself the luxury of revenge he should suffer for it. But as to hurt him is to hurt myself I must make the sacrifice. I think I will take his advice, and pay my respects to Sir Hector."

Meanwhile Ivor had returned to the house with a very fever of wrath burning in his veins. A few cool words, a meaning smile, had stripped the bandage from his eyes, and shown him the sea of danger into which he had heedlessly drifted.

"Yet, how could I have helped it?" he asked himself despairingly. "To know her is to love her. Ah—"

The object of his thoughts was there before him, flying across the old oak hall with a face of terror.

"Oh, Mr. Grant!" she cried wildly, "I have been looking for you everywhere. Do come to your mother's room. She is so ill. She has gone from one fainting-fit into another, and we cannot bring her round."

Her voice and her words calmed that raging fever. Without any reply, save that one hastily-suppressed exclamation, he followed Beryl into his mother's presence.

"Some more of the handiwork of that infernal count," he muttered savagely between his clenched teeth, as he saw that senseless, stricken figure.

It was a long time before Mrs. Grant recovered, and then she was so weak and exhausted that she had to go to bed, though she still persisted in her refusal to have medical advice. Beryl remained beside her till late in the afternoon, totally unable to resist the poor lady's piteous appeals and beseeching gaze. She, too, was wearied and unstrung, and her heart was longing for the presence of the little brothers, and picturing Jack's wistful face and anxious eyes as he would keep looking out for "mummy."

Every moment of their company was precious now, and already this day was half over. She had refused to go to the dining-room for luncheon, and had taken it in Mrs. Grant's room instead.

About four o'clock she saw the poor invalid's eyes drooping in very weariness and languor. Gradually the quiet and stillness of the room seemed to soothe her long restlessness. Her eyes closed in sleep, and Beryl felt she was free to return home.

She crept noiselessly into the boudoir, gave a few parting instructions to the maid, then put on her hat, and left the Count with an unusual eagerness.

She saw nothing of Ivor as she hurried homewards, and for once the fact lost its sting of regret. One yearning desire to be with her treasures was all she felt. Soon—only too soon—would her heart ache, and her empty arms stretch themselves forth in vain—in vain! So she sped over the meadows and under the drooping apple-boughs, yet with her ears closed to the rhythm of sound filling the sweet spring air, but drowned now by the tread of her hurrying feet and the wild, stormy beats of her longing heart.

Eager eyes were watching her speeding along, light as a shadow, quick as a falling sunbeam.

"I seed mummy first," said little Jack. "Seed her longer way than you, Cyrrie."

Ivor Grant was leaning over the rectory-gate, with Jack perched on his shoulder, and Cyril astride of the topmost bar. All three had been keeping watch there for a long time—a time that would have been still longer had not those whimsical fancies and stories of their grown-up friend kept the little lads from too anxious a suspense.

"You came here? How good of you!" cried Beryl, releasing the boys from that warm embrace into which they had sprung as she reached the gate.

She had sunk on her knees on the soft grass the better to submit to those "smothering" caresses which Jack loved to lavish upon her, and she knelt there still, looking up to Ivor's face with her own all flushed and radiant, utterly unconscious of the pang that smote his heart—of the knowledge that, dear as she had become to him, she never seemed so dear as in moments of inexplicable pathos and sacredness such as these.

"I came here because I feared they would miss you," he said, speaking constrainedly, because it was such an effort to speak at all. "One good turn deserves another, you know, and you have given up nearly your whole day to my mother."

"She is better now," said Beryl, rising to her feet, and smoothing back the ruffled rings of hair about her brow. "She was asleep. I thought I might leave her at last to the care of Woods and Mrs. Bretton."

"Oos been such a long time away. Did 'oo know zat, mummy?" asked Jack plaintively.

"Yes, darling; but I could not help it. I won't be so long away again."

"Me wanted to do to 'oo," he continued eagerly; "me knows the way 'tite well, and Cyrrie wouldn't let me; said mummy didn't say nuffin' 'bout we was to go."

"I found him in great distress," said Ivor, smiling gravely, as he held open the gate for "mummy" and her sweetheart. "He was inclined to look upon me as an ogre, and the Count as a fortress. I don't believe he's left this gate since his dinner."

"Mis'r captain is a kind mans," said little Jack thoughtfully; "him's played lots of games wid us, and told us lots of stories. But it was a vewy long times, mummy!" he added with a half-pale again.

Beryl sighed. She was thinking of how the little faithful heart would suffer in future "long times," when neither cry nor prayer could reach "mummy's" ears, or bring her to his side.

Ivor noticed the shadow on her face and read its meaning. "Come," he said, "we are all going to have tea. Mrs. Bretton sent down a basket this morning for 'Master Jack.' I wonder what was in it. Have you any idea, little man?"

"Me tinks so," said the little fellow, his face losing its gravity, and the bright colour which excitement always brought into his cheeks, passing like flame into its clear, creamy pallor; "me tinks dare was a pwum-cakes, and anoder cakes, and—and— What was it, Cyrrie, in 'tittle pots?"

"Preserves," said his brother loftily. "No," said Jack with emphasis, "me tinks somefin else. Oh, jam!" he went on delightedly. "Pots of jam!"

"Well, it's the same thing," said Cyril. "Tain't the same thing," said Jack authoritatively. "Jams is jams—eh, mummy? and pwe—pwe— Me tarn't say dat. Me knows it's not nice."

Cyril regarded him compassionately. "I dare say you'll think it nice enough when you taste it," he said, "and believe it's the same, too."

"And now 'away dull care!'" cried Ivor Grant, snatching the little fellow and tossing him up in his arms; "let us all enjoy ourselves, and eat plum-cake, and 'jams,' and all the other good things that Master Jack is going to treat us with, till—we can't eat any more—eh, Jack."

"Dat would be berry geedy," said the young philosopher gravely, "and me would like some pwum-cakes for to-morrow, by-m-by."

"Provident sage," laughed Ivor. "Well, we will be sparing in our onslaughts, like the ants, you know, who always lay by a store for the winter."

"Me doesn't want to keep my pwum-cakes till so long as then," remarked Jack. "Don't tink dat's at all nice."

"What have you been doing all the morning?" asked Beryl, at last. "No mischief, I hope?"

"Cyrrie put his foot in ze duck-pond," said Jack eagerly. "Me taught a 'tittle duck, and kept it a long times; but it skeeked, and skeeked, and skeeked, and it said, 'Me want do to my mummy,' so me let it do."

"Jack tells stories," said Cyril in his usual corrective fashion. "How could the duck say that, when they can't speak at all?"

"Vevverrysing speaks," said little Jack solemnly. "Fowers, and birds, and cows, and horses, and ze butterflies, and ze wind, too. Me talks to ze wind ofens and ofens."

"What strange fancies he has!" said Ivor, looking at Beryl across the little rapt face lifted heavenwards. "I can't think how such a baby can get hold of such ideas."

"Mummy tells us a story—such a pwetty story," resumed Jack, still gazing thoughtfully up at the deep mysterious blue of the sky. "'Bout 'tittle children, and how they does to seep, and when they're aseep the angels tum right away down from the sky-ladders, and they tum to the 'tittle children's beds, and whisper sings to them. Sometimes they 'member them when they wakes up. I tink I 'member them."

"He told me the other day that the wind goes right away up to Heaven," said Cyril. "And that if we whisper something to it, it takes it along with it, and blows it through holes in the sky. Does it, mother?"

"Mummy doesn't know nuffin 'bout dat," cried Jack eagerly, "for she's grown up. Isn't 'oo, mummy?" patting her cheek with a little velvet hand, as he leant forward from Ivor's shoulder. "And when people's grown up they don't hear what the angels tell the 'tittle children."

"Would to Heaven we did!" cried Ivor, with a strange choked sensation in his throat, and Beryl, meeting his eyes with two pained and tearful ones, echoed the words in the depths of her own aching heart.

CHAPTER IX. "I CAN'T CARE FOR OTHER WOMEN."

WHAT a merry, happy tea that was in the quaint old rectory-parlour! How, in after years, every memory of its simple innocent gaiety used to come to Ivor Grant's heart with sad and tender wistfulness! How often he pictured that scene—the beautiful face bending over the cups, the eager eyes of the little lads, the brave cheerfulness with which the mother hid her own pain, though every word and sentence from the childish lips smote her heart afresh.

As for Ivor himself, with that full and terrible consciousness of his own folly ever in his mind, he yet kept it too well concealed for Beryl's eyes to detect. The joy of her presence was now turned to fear—fear of self-betrayal; fear that this long heart-hunger might tear down the feeble barriers he had erected, and so shame him for ever in her eyes as in his own.

But during this pleasant meal, bright with the children's quaint fancies and ceaseless chatter, he kept himself well under restraint. He talked, and laughed, and jested as if he had not a care in the world; he tried all the cakes, and indulged in "pweserves," to little Jack's intense delight—he, by some mode of reasoning peculiarly his own, having constituted himself the giver of the feast—probably as the housekeeper from the Court had sent that basket to her special favourite.

Listening to his quaint talk, looking at his eager face, watching the pleasant ways that ministered to the children's pleasure so unweariedly and so unselfishly, Beryl found herself again and again drifting into that old wonder how she could have so misunderstood him, or attributed only languor, self-conceit, and indolence to a nature at once so genial and unselfish.

"I hope he will never know," she thought with a pang of compunction. "I do not think he can."

Just at that moment he looked at her across Jack's dusky head, and a shadow seemed to fall across his eyes and hide their hopeful light. But the pain was growing familiar now, and at his heart a voice seemed always whispering:

"Not for long—not for very long. When she has left—when she has gone out of your life it will be time enough to give the rein to suffering."

No word had been spoken to Jack as yet of the ordeal in store for him. His mother had cautioned Cyril not to say anything about the coming separation, and the boy had kept his word, though a hundred times the secret had struggled to his lips.

Beryl wondered how she should ever find courage to tell him, knowing that the bare suggestion of "mummy's" leaving him would go well-nigh to break the little loving heart.

"Not to-day, at all events," she told herself as the merry meal at last came to an end. "We shall have one happy evening more."

The glow of sunset was still upon the sky when they sauntered out into the rectory-garden. The air was soft and warm, and full of that strange hush and sweetness which crowns the close of day.

The children ran off to their swing, which was fixed under the branches of an old elm-tree, the rector's special pride, and Beryl and Ivor followed them more slowly.

"What will your guest say to your deserting him in this fashion?" she asked at last. "Yesterday you agreed we were not to see anything of each other, and yet—"

"It is easier to make resolutions than to keep them," said Ivor with a smile that had very little mirth in it. "And my 'guest,' as you call him, does not deserve much consideration at my hands. I hate the fellow. I wish I had never set eyes upon him!"

Beryl looked at him in surprise.

"Why?" she asked innocently. "I—I beg your pardon," she continued, colouring softly. "Of course I have no right to ask. He looks a strange man—not one to be quite trusted, I fancy."

"Do not let us waste words in discussing him," said Ivor coldly; "I have had no opportunity to-day to ask you of your arrangements. When—do they go?"

He nodded in the direction of the swing, where Jack was perched, while Cyril's sturdy arms sent him flying to and fro among the green and gold of leaves and sunlight.

Beryl told him the arrangements which had been made for the boys, in a few hurried words.

"Of course I shall go and see this Miss Crawley," she said in conclusion. "I hope she may be better than my fears paint her. I have a horror of learned women."

"Yet you managed to secure a fair amount of learning yourself," said Ivor. "You have told me many things that would do credit to a 'girl-graduate' of the most blue-stocking type."

"My father educated me himself," she said as if in half apology for the knowledge she possessed, "and I have always been passionately fond of reading; but you know the type of woman I mean; and I don't want Jack's delicate little frame to combat with strong brain-pressure. I have let him learn nothing except just what he chose up to now."

"He doesn't need much teaching," said Ivor thoughtfully. "His brain is active enough as it is—too much so I often fancy for his years."

Beryl sighed.

"If I might only remain a year, just to look after them—to see how the system agreed with them, I should not mind so much. It is the leaving them to a life so new and different that I dread."

"Well, I will look them up as often as I possibly can," said Ivor with forced cheerfulness. "Woodford is not very far from here, and they shall always spend their holidays at the Court, and if you will allow me, I will write you exhaustive accounts of all their doings and sayings every mail."

"Will you—will you really?" she cried with an eagerness and delight that sprang from some subtle two-fold cause she could not pause to analyse. "Oh, how kind of you to promise that! Cyrrie is too young to write letters such as I should long to have, and Miss Crawley might not be able to enter into my anxieties; but you—you know what they are to me and I to them. I could trust you next to myself."

"Thank you," he said huskily, and a great dusky flush crept up to his brow as he stood there in the radiance of the dying sunlight. "That is a great compliment, but I will try to deserve it."

"But are you sure—sure I am not taxing your kindness too much?" she continued hurriedly. "My own great love blinds me, perhaps. My children, who are to me so much, may only seem to you as troublesome and objectionable as—as I have found those of other people."

He laughed.

"Set your mind at rest," he said. "I love the little lads for their own sakes. Besides," he continued sadly, "my life is after all rather an empty one. I shall be only too glad of an interest such as this."

"Why should it be empty?" she asked suddenly. "I have often wondered you are not married. Are you so hard to please?"

There was not a grain of coquetry in the question, or in the eyes whose frank, full light looked up to his.

He set his teeth hard, and for a moment was silent.

"Perhaps I am," he said at last; "one grows critical as years go on. I thought once I had found my ideal. But I found her—too late. Only two little words," he added with sudden bitterness, "but how they can change a man's whole life! However, I gave up romance and went in for prose. Only, somehow, I think I could never ask any other woman to share what, in my heart, I had dedicated to—her.”

“She died?” questioned Beryl softly.

“To me,” he answered. “How or when it matters not. We have all to live through some such experience, you know. In life there seems to be so many ‘chances’ of happiness, so few cases.”

“Yes,” said Beryl, with a sudden catch in her breath like a sob suppressed; “it seems very easy to be miserable, doesn’t it? Is it only that we make ourselves so, or can’t recognise happiness in disguise?”

“Of course that we make ourselves so,” he answered with a bitterness altogether foreign to his voice. “We are such blind fools at best. Heaven help us!”

“But you, surely you are happy?” she said suddenly, and looked up at his face, sternly set now in the shadows of the sweeping boughs under which they paused.

He laughed, a tuneless laugh, and one which jarred upon her ear.

“Don’t ask me that,” he said hurriedly. “There are questions one cannot answer even to oneself. Perhaps I have turned coward, and, even if I am happy, dare not ask the cause.”

The meaning of those words went home to her heart with a sudden pang of fear, and set every nerve and fibre quivering like those of a frightened child.

The words that would have rushed from her lips without break or stay she crushed back in a sick and nameless horror. A silence as of death fell between them. The falling shadows seemed to have grown chill and dense as clouds, and all the golden west faded out as if a mighty hand had swept it into the blackened vaults of night.

For a moment everything was forgotten as in the stunning horror of a great shock. Something that her life had missed, rose and faced her with jeers and smiles of mockery. Something that his might have won, completing, ennobling, elevating all that was best in his nature or lacking in her own—all this swept over her in that second’s space of awaking, and she shrank affrighted from the picture upon which she gazed.

“Do not grieve for my troubles,” said that brave and kindly voice, hushed and solemn now, as if some purer hand had struck the chords of passion. “Lonely I may be, but no man is ever the worse for having loved a good woman.”

“And so she is—dead!” said Beryl brokenly. “But the dead are soon forgotten. And you will not be lonely always, I hope. There are so many other women.”

“Yes,” he said sadly, “but somehow I can’t care for—other women.”

Devoted.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

ONCE upon a time men and women took vows of asceticism upon themselves, devoting themselves to the service of their fellows; one does not nowadays look upon this as the highest form of devotion.

Three people we have seen living devoted lives, but what did they think about the matter?

Just nothing at all.

Giacinta or ‘Cinta Idyane, the girl, certainly thought not one word about “devotion” or “sacrifice,” or indeed of anything with so grand a name to it.

Look at her! running through the long coarse grass of the fated region. Her brown feet and arms are bare, her head uncovered, although the women of the south do not stand in the mid-day sun uncovered if they are wise. Her face is brown, and with the delicately-chiselled, straight features which perhaps come from her unknown Greek ancestors, who in the dim past had landed on those shores; her raven hair is knotted on the crown of her head—you may see numbers of such girls’ heads if you look at an old frieze.

Her garments are poor, but they are not ragged; she has on a grey cotton skirt—very probably the cotton is a Manchester print, all the nations of the world use these things; she wears above this a loose, short-sleeved bodice of rich blue cotton, such as a man’s blouse is made of; tied round her throat is a kerchief of orange, and round her waist, with its soft ends trailing below the looseness of her bodice, is a wisp of scarlet stuff. This last is put on for finery, as a maiden of another class bedecks herself with jewels. The orange kerchief would be shading her head if the sun were shining, but, though it is mid-day, the girl’s head is bare.

But what a heat bears down upon the land! what a damp, murky, pestiferous fire seems to burn one up, to drag the very spirit of life from one’s limbs!

‘Cinta, running and springing through the grasses, stops, then moves languidly her lazy feet. Is this some weariful, voluptuous, Eastern clime, where one dreams and sleeps the soft hours away? where it “is always afternoon”—where “all things always seem the same”—where there is not life, but some luscious, vague thing called existence?

Not at all.

It was once a famous land. Greek heroes trod its shores and reared mighty temples upon it. There they stand to-day, grey and silent, strangely perfect, rearing their carved pediments against the sunless fire of the blue sky. It is a cloudless sky, an airless region; pestilence walks along it unmasked, and miasma is one’s yoke-fellow and comrade all the days one passes there.

All about it is a level, marshy plain, whence fetid odours rise, and whose sole masters are herds of buffaloes which men call tame—they may be so. The plain is washed by the shining Neapolitan waters; across the Bay of Salerno stretches the marvellous beauty of the Amalfi coast. One may imagine round the cape the blue glory of the Bay of Naples. At Paestum the very sun in heaven is darkened and conquered by the living death of the place.

The temples must be guarded; they belong to the nation, and they have set a fence about them, and they exact a toll from sight-seers, and one man at least must be told off to do the work.

A soldier must fight for his country. What matter whether he fight against flesh and blood or against a poisoned air?

A year ago, Ludovico Idyane was chosen, from out the hundreds who filled the monster barracks of Salerno, to take the post.

A brave man thinks naught of danger. Duty was enough, but duty did not tell him to take his wife and ‘Cinta to Paestum with him. There was a house for him, and a soldier is handy. He could, as they say in another country, “fend for himself.” He issued his commands. Wife and child should stay on at Salerno, and he bade young Giovanni Peluso take heed to them.

Now, do women obey such commands? Not generally. The loyal sort do not, and Lucia was loyal to her husband, and young ‘Cinta—she was fifteen then—was loyal to father and mother.

A year went by, and ‘Cinta was tall. She ran lightly, but she as often wandered wearily. Ludovico, the man who admitted the tribes of tourists—he was tall, and straight, and soldierlike, but what a fire was in his dark eyes, how thin was his olive cheek, and what a scarlet patch burnt upon it!

The foe was conquering him.

But your Italian carries a light heart in his breast, and Ludovico, if he coughed huskily, hid it away under a bright word. Perhaps he should fight through. For the sake of wife and child he would be his strongest.

‘Cinta was running, as we have said, through the tangle of coarse grass that separates the Temple of Neptune from the farther ruins. Ludovico himself had come soberly along from his cottage into the vast weird avenues of columns that now make the roofless temple. A string of English people had just arrived; on the far side were a German bride and bridegroom; coming past ‘Cinta were three American tourists, young men with knapsacks, and opera-glasses, and the inevitable scarlet volume of Baedeker.

One English lady was unearthing what she possessed of misty Greek lore, and romanced about sacrificial rites and priestly functions and vestals.

“Can you fancy it possible?” she waved her hand round. “Was there a roof, do you think? I should say an awning would have been best, if the air then was like the air now. Dear me—the heat!” She was driven to fan herself, and she wiped the dew of faint heat from her upper lip. “There would not be this grass—”

A girl kicked at the uneven stones the grass hid.

“Certainly not, tanta mia,” cried she; “there is polished marble if you like to look for it, of course.”

“And processions of youths and maidens singing, perhaps dancing, and flowers, and incense, and—”

“Don’t particularise too much, dearest, or you’ll put us all in a fog. We shan’t know whether we are talking about a Greek festival in honour of Neptune, or a Roman fiesta—shall we, Dick?”

“I don’t know.” Dick was standing and sketching, or rather had been standing and sketching; just now he stood and pointed. “One of the natives, I suppose—Greek or Italian, aunt?” he lazily asked.

“Very probably of Greek origin.” For the nonce the aunt was absorbed by a worship of the Hellenic element.

“Gracious!” scorned the girl, Bessie, “she’s an Italian peasant; she’s very pretty.”

This referred to ‘Cinta.

“I’ll go and speak to her.”

The rest watched. As the English girl advanced, making signs of friendliness, the Italian girl retreated.

“Afraid, poor thing!” ejaculated the kindly aunt.

“Gammon!” responded Dick. “She’d let me paint her if I asked her.”

“Signora.”

The trim, blue-uniformed figure of Idyane had come close up to the party without being heard. The man touched his forage-cap, and again said :

"Signora——"

"Ah !"

"I have some photographs of the ruins ; we are allowed to sell them for ourselves ; the signor will buy ? Very good ones—by Sommer of Naples—the best, and true. See, signor !" and he held one aloft.

"It is good," one said, and soon all the photographs were being pulled about by one and another.

"You'll make your fortune out of us !" cried a younger edition of Dick.

Idyane shrugged his shoulders and shook his head with the good-humoured Italian smile.

"I do not understand, signor."

"No Inglese—no, no," Dick translated volubly and laughed. "We are wide awake," he added, or rather he gave some Italian words which very fitly copied that expression.

"No, no ; I make no fortune here," and as swiftly the face fell to melancholy.

"They pay you well ?" jerked the aunt, who had indulged in the Greek rhapsody.

"Enough." A stoical shrug of the shoulders and a spreading forth of lean brown hands answered. "I do not complain."

"They ought to pay a man double—treble for taking his life in his hand and sitting down here !"

The man laughed.

"The signora thinks much of the danger—what is it ? One may have fever anywhere, and they give us quinine—plenty."

"They do ?"

"Certainly, signora. We must die without the quinine ; we take it and drink the red wine—we should not drink good wine like that if we were not in the midst of the malaria."

"You are a single man—no wife, no child ?" The lady meant he ought to be.

"Signora, no," and he laughed. "No, no ; if I were alone I—I think the fever would be stronger than I am. Now I am stronger than the fever. Yes, yes, I am strong. Signora, that is my girl," he coughed a hollow, dry cough. "That is 'Cinta, signora," he panted. "She is a good girl."

'Cinta was nodding and gesticulating. Perhaps Dick was right, and she had no fear, but just the shyness of a creature who is half untainted.

The fair English girl, trim and dainty, and the picturesque, free grace of the Italian, made a good and pleasing contrast as they strolled along through the long grass.

"She ought not to be here," decided the lady.

Idyane looked frightened.

"She is not ill. What shall I be, what will Lucia be without our child ? Ah, she is good, signora ! she would not stay in Salerno ; she comes with us here. The time will not be long—a year has gone."

"And it has told upon you."

The man had coughed again.

"I fight the enemy, signora," he said cheerily, lifting his grey head, and straightening his tall figure. "And we will conquer, we are strong."

The photographs were bought, and Idyane's pockets filled, and very soon after everyone was strolling wearily along towards the gateway. No one dared stay long in that killing atmosphere, the dear life seemed dragged out of limbs which at home were used to the invigorating winds of the north. Bessie, the gay, declared she was quite "done up" when she had climbed the little outer staircase of 'Cinta's home, had talked with the mother Lucia, and had come down again. As for Dick, he must also have collapsed, for he talked not at all.

It was no more than two hours past mid-day, and they must go. Antiquities were very interesting to see, and the wonders of Greek art are alluring, but it was like drinking nectar from a poisoned cup—they must fly before the dews of the fading day should rise from the marshes.

Children, ragged, and dirty, and laughing, called for coppers ; pests of beggars, pests of curiosity vendors, besieged the carriages about the gate. What a wild, weird crew ! and what a wild, weird, and gloomy scene was all about ! Desolation and the perfection of art, squalor and the vision of the greatest voluptuousness the world has ever seen, a past which bore eternal life, and at the same moment a present which was a death in life.

The driver shouted to his horses and cracked his whip, the carriage rolled along. Ah, who was calling ? what was forgotten ?

'Cinta Idyane was running and calling. Bessie suddenly roused.

"I'll speak to her," said she.

"Mystery—eh ?"

"Signorina, it is one word—one word !"

But the girl's face was rosy red, and she fell silent.

Bessie leaned down over the side of the carriage. "I know," she said, in easy Italian, "it is a message for—for that friend you told me about. Say it quick, the horses want to fly."

"Signorina, the horses of Palco do not fly," laughed 'Cinta.

"Where shall I find him ?" Girls soon appropriate each other's secrets.

"Go to the big gate of the barracks and ask for Peluso—Giovanni Peluso."

"What then ?"

"He sent me a letter, and I have not written one to him ; say I am sorry and give this to him." She put a bunch of poppies into Bessie's hand, and then took a little silver cross from her bosom, kissed it, and gave that to Bessie. "Say it bears my kiss upon it, say that 'Cinta——"

"Tchuh—tchuh ! The horses are wild, they are like fire, they tear my arms off !" cried the coachman.

'Cinta sprang down from the step of the carriage, and waving her hands gaily, ran off.

Summer came, and autumn and winter, and all the English people were away in northern homes. The busy town of Salerno went on with its merchandising, ships went and came, and trade kept all alive.

Regiments, too, quartered in the big new barracks were changed. So it is no soldier is long at one place. Amongst others Giovanni Peluso, 'Cinta's friend, had been drafted up to the north. He was on the heights above Genoa, from which city he had written her a letter. He did not know whether she ever received it, at any rate no friend had come his way to bring him poppies again, or to give him a silver cross. Ah, that silver cross ! He wore it always. Perhaps he should never see 'Cinta again ; perhaps she had forgotten him ? No, he did not believe that. He would pray, holding the little cross in his hand, that he might one day get sent again down Salerno way.

What was happening to 'Cinta ?

Peluso thought about her—the English girl, Bessie, thought and talked about her, wondered whether life brought as good a love to her as it did to some people.

Ah ! "Some people !" Prosperity and good days enlarge one's soul, widen one's sympathies, and open one's heart largely. Grim philosophers preach the contrary, and set on high the advantages of adversity ; have they themselves tried the dose ? No ; prosperity is the thing which sweetens life and action—for those souls, we mean, who have any inherent sweetness in them.

Bessie and Dick were cousins once, they were closer than cousins when a new year came in.

It was springtime again, and the honeymoon had lasted for three whole "moons." Dick was an artist, but he had wealth besides, and so he was taking pleasure and studying at the same time. It goes without saying that he and his wife were in Italy, and that lady being a person of some gay whims, carried her husband more than once away from the acknowledged schools of art to regions she fancied she would like to see.

"It is ridiculous going to Salerno," grumbled he, knee-deep in packing.

"Is it ?" pouted she. "Where is the picture you were once going to make, and to call 'Ancient and Modern'—did the hymn-book suggest the title, by-the-bye ?" She nodded at him, and then absorbed herself in the folding of a dress upon the bed.

"I have forgotten all about it ;" and he punched an obstinate boot into an already stuffed portmanteau. "Jog my memory."

"Pæstum—antiquities—two lovely girls—eh ? Now you remember ?" His wife looked up, pursing her lips, and setting up a would-be gravity.

"Ah yes. I remember a picturesque girl—one girl."

"Only one ? Indeed !"

"Perhaps your second made the foil for the first." He became all at once anxious. "Did you put my drab suit in the Gladstone, Bess ?"

"I did," said she. "Now, Dick, listen. Picture or no picture, my heart is set upon finding that girl again ; she ought to be married by this time."

"To the fellow you unearthed at the barracks ?"

"Of course—who else ?"

Two days after they were at Salerno, and Dick had gone out "prospecting." Bessie walked out by herself, sauntering along the shore. No, first she loitered in the fine public gardens, and she looked about for 'Cinta amongst the passers-by. After a while she got outside the town, and then she was by the shore. Women with gaily kerchiefed heads were washing at big oblong tubs ; other women and girls straggled out beyond these, washing in the sparkling waves of the blue sea as it broke on the sloping shore. Rubbing and beating with stones, swishing and rinsing in the water, laughing and chattering—all went on together as the girls knelt and sat on their heels at work.

"Cinta !"

The exclamation was involuntary on Bessie's part.

A girl heard it, turned, sprang up, threw down her half-washed garment, and ran up crying: "Signorina, signorina mia!" She was laughing, and her face was alight. Alas! in a moment she burst into tears.

What was wrong?

Ah me! much was wrong.

Ludovico Idyane was dead. The fever had killed him when the damp miasma of the autumn came. Lucia, his wife, fell ill from sadness of heart, and when the heart is bowed down what power has a weak body to fight against poverty and weariness? The day was not far distant when 'Cinta would be alone.

Alone?

What of her lover—of Peluso?

No one knew certainly. 'Cinta knew naught. When people like these get separated, it becomes truly a separation. They do not fly to letter-writing at once. 'Cinta was truly a child of the people, and the learning she had was small. For her lover to go away meant—well, that he had gone, that she must wait, perhaps wait for all her life.

"That is all nonsense!" This ejaculation Bessie made aloud, but it was in English and unintelligible.

She went home at once, and, being a young person of energy and determination, set to work to solve the difficulty, and to find the missing man. She found, as people do who have the will to set a matter straight, that some friend of hers knew the Commandant of the troops in Genoa, and, to make a long story short, she found that Peluso was still in the barracks on the heights.

A week later 'Cinta was motherless as well as fatherless. Lucia, the brave wife, just slipped away, fainting out of life which had become to her an empty possession.

The girl 'Cinta must work. To keep life in her she must work, but down in the genial south one needs little, and she was young, and the older women about her nodded their kerchiefed heads over their washing and said: "Wait a while, she will mend, she will laugh again."

Another week went, and as yet there was no sign of their prophecy being fulfilled.

Bessie, the English lady, came and went, and said cheerful words; then one day she again strolled down to the shore, and her face was expectant and radiant.

Was there ever such a beautiful day? The sea rolled and tossed, playing grandly. In tiny circling bays were gems of sapphire-blue, all around fringing these dashed opal spray and froth; misty islands made vague forms in the distant hazy heat; above all blazed the sun in a golden radiance, while the white town and the masts of the shipping declared the business and the fulness of life.

'Cinta Idyane, with a scarlet handkerchief upon her dark head, saw a white lady and a huge white umbrella in the distance; she tossed down her washing, and she ran up the gentle slope of the shore.

"La signora! La signora!" she cried.

"'Cinta," began Bessie, "I have had a letter. Have you had one, too?"

"It is here, signora," and the girl pulled a big letter from her pocket; "shall I ever forgive myself?"

"What is wrong now?" asked her friend.

"No wrong, signora, but only so much good that I am ashamed. Was it not a sin in me to say that he was forgetting me? Surely it was for him to say that of me—of me who wept and who cried to la madre that Madonna was cruel. Ahimè! and la madre does not know now. Do you think she does, signora?" and 'Cinta clasped her brown hands fervently, and gazed at Bessie with shining eyes, as if her faith in her friend and her faith in Madonna were one and the same.

Bessie evaded the question.

"Do you know what is in my letter?"

"Ah, signora, what do I think of any letter but my own? I will go to Genoa—Giovanni will be glad—when I work some few days more. There will be enough money then. How much, signora, must I pay for the train?" Her head was set on one side, thinking, pondering in simple wonderment.

"Peluso sends me a letter, too!" cried Bessie.

"Ah!"

"He does. Yes, and there is money in it, 'Cinta;" and she drew the girl so that she might watch the unfolding of the letter. "He sends money enough to take you to Genoa, and you are to go the first day you can."

"Then I will go to-morrow, signora."

Bessie laughed softly.

"It is not wrong, signora?" puzzled the girl. "He asks me, he wants me, and do I not belong to him?"

The Beck.

THE little beck foams fretting on its way,
Chafes at a pebble, eddies round a root,
Murmurs impatient at the old arch foot,
And o'er the fern-frond splashes pretty spray;
But as it broadens slowly, day by day,
The deepening stream rolls on, serenely mute,
As fain its growing strength and power to suit
The ocean homage, that its end must pay.
So youth will strain its fetters—laugh aloud,
Or deluge petty ills with passionate tears,
Slowly attaining grief or joy to shroud
In the proud calmness of the growing years;
Till age wins its serenity sublime,
Ere in eternity it merges time.

Through No Fault of Hers.

(A STORY IN FOUR WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER III.

MURIEL received from each individual of the whole household a welcome after his or her peculiar manner. Sir Joseph was loud and hearty, Lady Pankhurst a mixture of cordiality and suspicion. Hugh scarcely noticed her; Connie was kindness itself. Muriel waited a day or two before she confided her adventure on the railway to Miss Pankhurst; but, at the end of that time, concluded that she was quite fit to be trusted. After all, she was hired to be her companion and not her governess.

And true companions they rapidly became. Their tastes were similar. Connie was either ignorant of any disgrace attaching to Muriel, or else acted as if unconscious of it; in every respect she treated her as an equal. Muriel was ignorant of the duties belonging to her position, and applied to Lady Pankhurst for instructions the day after her arrival. That worthy lady had frankly confessed she didn't know anything about it, and advised her to speak to Connie.

"You see, my dear," said her ladyship, "Connie is different from us in most things. Perhaps it's partly her bringing up, for we've given her the best education that money could buy. I think she'll be able to tell you best what she wants; but, anyhow, I hope you'll do pretty much as you like, and don't let Connie make you learn those outlandish things she always is studying if you'd sooner sit still and do a bit of fancy-work."

So Muriel applied to Connie accordingly. That young lady had very decided opinions on the subject.

"I want you to do just what you like," she said; "and as we like the same things, we shall be together a good deal, I hope. And you are so much cleverer than I am in nearly everything, that I'm going to learn a lot from you without your knowing anything about it, and so make you a governess as well. And I mean to tell you all my secrets, so that you see you will have plenty to do."

"Have you so many secrets, then?"

"Not very many; but they are important."

"I think I know one of them," said Muriel.

Connie looked at her in surprise.

"What is it?" she exclaimed. "Is it anything about——"

"About Mr. Norman? Yes."

"You know Lewis?" she asked eagerly.

"Yes, slightly. I heard all about you before I saw you. You can imagine the sort of description I received."

"You won't tell papa?" pleaded Connie.

"No—at least not yet; I'll wait to see how you behave. You see I shall be able to hold that threat over you."

"But I shall be able to threaten you, too. What do you think papa would say if he found you were abetting me in my disobedience?"

"You can try," retorted Muriel with a laugh. "I have something for you, but I don't think I shall give it you unless you withdraw your threat."

Connie entreated and promised until the note was delivered. She kissed it before reading it.

"Poor fellow!" she said, on finishing it; "he's going away."

"Does he tell you his address?"

"Yes, Post-office, Clovelly. Didn't you think he was splendid?"

"I thought him very nice; but I wish he had not chosen me as a messenger. However, this is the last time."

"Oh no, it isn't," said Connie, "and I'll do the same for you some day."

"You must wait till I have a lover," laughed Muriel.

"I sha'n't wait long, I think," said Connie; "in fact, I doubt if I need wait at all."

"You must, indeed," replied Muriel. "But don't let us waste time talking about what doesn't exist. Tell me more about Mr. Norman."

"Call him Lewis," said Connie.

"No one knows you are engaged to him?"

"Oh no; they think I've forgotten all about him, except, perhaps, Hugh, and he doesn't care much."

"Does he like Lewis?"

"Tolerably; but they didn't get on very well; Hugh's tastes lie in another direction. He is great on horses, and dogs, and things of that sort. He doesn't care much about art."

Connie spoke in rather a melancholy tone. It was evident there was not much sympathy between her and her brother.

"I don't quite know what to think of Hugh," she went on. "He spends a great deal of money, and I'm afraid he is in debt; but papa believes he is all right, and mamma is afraid to say anything. He has got into a fast set, and he plays cards a great deal, I'm afraid."

"That is unfortunate," assented Muriel.

"I only wish, Muriel, you could do something to take him away from all those men. He doesn't care for my influence, you know. I'm only a sister, and he doesn't get on with girls as a rule, I'm sorry to say."

"Does he try?"

"Yes, but they don't care about him. It's a pity, because it drives him to the society of people who don't do him any good. I wish, dear, you would pay him a little attention. I know he isn't quite what you would like, but you might sacrifice yourself sometimes."

"Of course I shall be happy to do what I can," said Muriel a trifle stiffly, for she remembered what had happened when she arrived. "But you see I am in rather a delicate position here. If I were to exercise those arts of fascination you so kindly credit me with, it might naturally be said, that—you can imagine what."

"I didn't think of that," said Connie reflectively. "But I don't think there's any danger."

"Thank you," laughed Muriel.

"I don't mean it in that way," quickly added Connie. "I mean that you can take care of yourself if he were to be foolish. At any rate, we will try and get him into the drawing-room after dinner to-night instead of letting him go out."

As the event proved, there was no difficulty about persuading the hope of the house of Pankhurst to abandon his usual evening pursuits in favour of those of the rest of the family. It was raining hard, and after a look at the weather, he gave a growl, and wandered to the drawing-room.

The growl was a sham one. He had quite made up his mind not to go out in any case; the weather gave him a good excuse for staying in.

Before Muriel's advent he had given it as his opinion that "No more petticoats were wanted about the house," and for the first day after her arrival he had acted accordingly. By the time he had met her at half-a-dozen meals he was reconciled to her presence, and something more.

In Muriel he saw a girl who was assuredly accomplished and clever enough for him, and who, in appearance, put most other girls in the shade. No one need know that any disgrace attached to her, although that fact would act favourably in making her willing to receive his little attentions with welcome. So he soon resolved to commence a mild flirtation with his sister's companion; no harm could come of it, for he would of course be very careful to say nothing to her which could be construed too seriously.

Lady Pankhurst looked up with surprise when her son entered the room.

"Are you going to stay with us to-night, my boy? Do, there's a dear."

"It's raining like thunder," was the gracious response.

"Well, never mind, I'll have a game of cribbage with you. It's a long time since we had a game together."

But this was too much for Hugh; another minute, and he would have fled, but Connie bravely stepped into the breach.

"I'll have a game with you, mamma," she said; "I don't think Hugh cares about it."

She bustled about and got out the cards, leaving Hugh to settle himself where he liked. He soon sat down near Muriel, sufficiently far away from the card-table to be out of earshot.

"I hope you don't find it dull here, Miss Leigh?" he began after a pause.

"Not at all," replied Muriel; "everyone is so kind."

"It's rather a slow sort of spot," remarked Mr. Pankhurst, "and when the governor takes it into his head to have some company, it's generally only a big dinner, which is worse than having nobody."

"I suppose it must be rather lonely for you, not having another man in the house."

"It is precious slow, I can tell you," was the fervent reply. Hugh was now on a subject about which he could wax eloquent.

He did so at some length, winding up with the remark: "'Pon my word of honour, Miss Leigh, I look upon your coming as a perfect godsend."

"Thank you very much," replied Muriel with a smile; "that is quite a compliment. I hope we shall get on better together than we did the last time we met."

"I didn't know we'd ever seen each other before."

"Oh yes, we have. I came here with my father when I was quite a little girl, and you bullied me most unmercifully."

"Did I?" exclaimed Hugh, much disconcerted. "'Pon my word, I'm awfully sorry, I am really."

"Oh, it doesn't much matter now."

"Are you quite sure you've forgiven me?"

"Quite; I'd almost forgotten it."

"I can't quite make it out," said Hugh in a confidential tone, "how it was that I'd forgotten seeing you. I shouldn't have thought it possible."

"It's clear I didn't make much of an impression on you."

"You've changed a good deal, you see," replied Hugh with meaning.

Muriel smiled, but turned the flow of his eloquence by asking: "What does it mean when Lady Pankhurst says 'Two for his heels'?"

"Don't you play cribbage?" asked Hugh.

"No."

"Would you like to learn?"

"I don't know; is it a nice game?"

"Not at all bad; would you let me teach you?"

"Really I don't like to give you so much trouble."

"'Twould be no trouble at all; 'twould be a pleasure," he exclaimed eagerly.

He soon collected a pack of cards, and in a few minutes Muriel was deep in the mysteries of the game, and rapidly mastering its details. Hugh enjoyed himself immensely; he could not have believed that it was possible to play cards with pleasure unless money was on the game.

When the ladies had finished their game, they came to Muriel's side and assisted the lesson, not altogether to Hugh's satisfaction. When it was over, Connie proposed a rubber at whist, which occupied them till half-past ten, when Sir Joseph entered the room, having had his usual evening nap.

"Hallo, Hugh! not gone out? You see, Miss Leigh, the force of your attraction."

"It was raining, sir," said Hugh.

"'Twould be a good thing if it rained a little oftener," remarked his father, as he settled himself in his armchair. "Connie, give us some music."

But this was the signal for Hugh's departure, and they saw him no more that night.

Four months have passed tranquilly by, and Muriel finds with each week that her position at Como Hall becomes still pleasanter. Connie proves to be not only a companion but a real friend, and the two girls form a close friendship. News comes at the end of about three months that Norman has returned from Devonshire, and is now staying in Eastcote, the nearest town to the Hall. He has not ventured to call, knowing that his presence would be unwelcome to Sir Joseph and Lady Pankhurst, but he has managed to communicate with Muriel, who has shown the letter to Connie.

However, Muriel, feeling that she was in a false position, has given him to understand that she would much prefer that he should not use her as a go-between any further, and in spite of Connie's strongly expressed wish she has been firm on this point—the only one on which the two girls do not agree.

Hugh has not been idle all this time; he has spent a good many evenings at home, and has succeeded in initiating Muriel into the mysteries of cribbage. He has also developed a decided taste for music, and does not seem to get easily tired of listening to her singing and playing; he has even gone so far as to take lessons himself, and manages to growl out occasionally a bass song with more or less success. All this is very welcome to Lady Pankhurst, who is delighted to find that her son is becoming more domesticated. Connie, too, is glad to find that her brother seems to be getting more steady, and that he has less liking for the companionship of those young men who had formerly led him into difficulties. On one occasion Hugh went so far as to purchase a rather expensive volume which he had heard Muriel say she wished to read. However, to his disappointment, she refused to accept it, although she thanked him very warmly for his kindness; but she did not decline to receive the book as a loan, and as Hugh refused to take it back again it lay about the house with a disputed ownership.

It happened one day that Sir Joseph picked up the volume, and as it was on a subject in which he felt some little interest, began its perusal. One evening he enquired in a casual way to whom it belonged.

"I think, papa, it belongs to Muriel," said Connie.

"Indeed!" said Sir Joseph. "I hope you don't object to my reading it?"

"It is not mine," responded Muriel. "I believe it belongs to Mr. Hugh."

Hugh was seated in a distant corner of the room. He generally found it advisable to vacate his seat next Muriel when his father was present.

"Why, Hugh," said Sir Joseph, "I didn't know you went in for this kind of thing."

Hugh muttered something about his having heard it was a good book to read, and then left the room, feeling that if enquiries were pushed any farther, an awkward explanation must necessarily follow. Sir Joseph said nothing more, but continued to read. However, the next day, after the ladies had retired from dinner, he turned to his son, and told him that he wished to speak to him.

"What is it, sir?" asked Hugh, fearing that something unpleasant was about to occur.

"Look here, my boy, I want to ask you a question or two. I cannot help seeing that during the last month or so you have been staying home a great deal more than you used to. It is not that I object to that—in fact, I am rather glad of it, for I don't altogether approve the sort of fellows you used to spend your evenings with. How is it, though, you have dropped them so much lately?"

"I don't know, sir, I am sure," replied his son; "the mater wants me to be at home in the evening occasionally, and Connie said something about it too, so I thought you would not object."

"Are you quite sure those are the only reasons?" asked his father.

"As far as I know, sir."

"All right, my boy; if this is all I have nothing more to say, but I cannot help fancying that there is some special reason for the change in your habits. Your mother and sister have wanted you to stay at home for the last two or three years, but you have not seen fit to comply with their wish. Has Miss Leigh's coming here anything to do with your spending so much time at home?"

Hugh looked slightly uncomfortable, but replied with tolerable complacency:

"Well, sir, you must acknowledge that she makes things livelier. Mother and Connie are not the gayest companions for a young fellow night after night."

"Well, my boy, you ought to know how to take care of yourself; you're old enough, and big enough too. But I must just give you a word of warning. You know who Miss Leigh is, you know what her father is. I have taken her here out of charity—out of kind feelings for her father; but you ought to look for a very different girl when you mean to settle down. It is not that I object to Miss Leigh; as a girl she is everything that could be desired; but, not to mention more than one point, you know she has not a penny in the world, and with your prospects you ought to marry well."

"But, my dear father," said Hugh, "you don't imagine I want to marry Miss Leigh?"

"Well, no, I scarcely thought you would be so stupid as that; still, sometimes young men do not know how easy it is to entangle themselves. Very possibly you may be raising ideas in Miss Leigh's mind which may cause her pain, and that you certainly have no right to do. You see you would be a great catch for her, and, seeing no other young man, she very likely may fix her affections on you without knowing it, and the kindness which you naturally show her—and which it is quite proper you should—she may interpret as a somewhat warmer feeling."

"Oh, nonsense, father," said Hugh, who nevertheless felt very much flattered. "You don't think I have only to show myself to a girl for her to fall in love with me."

"No," replied his father, thinking at the same time that he wished suitable girls showed more tendency to do so. "I shall be very glad to see you settled down, but I hope when you do make your choice that it will be some one whom we can welcome into our family, and not a penniless girl who has a disgrace attached to her."

"All right, father, you need not be afraid," responded Hugh reassuringly.

He rose as if to close the conversation, feeling that he had got out of his scrape a great deal more easily than he had expected.

"Wait a minute, my boy," said Sir Joseph; "there's another thing I want to speak to you about, and I may as well take this opportunity. How about Connie?"

"What about her, sir?"

"Well, you remember that stupid affair with young Norman last year. Do you think she has quite given up all idea of him?"

Hugh hesitated. He had never felt the overpowering objection to Norman that his father had—in fact, he thought him rather a nice fellow, although his tastes did not lie in the same direction as his own. His opinion was that if Connie wanted to marry him, why, the best thing was to let her do so. He had a much greater opinion of his sister's firmness and constancy than her father had. Sir Joseph had been so accustomed to consider his will as absolute law that it was almost beyond him to imagine that it could be set aside by a girl of nineteen; but Hugh knew better. However, not wishing to anger his father, he temporised.

"Well, I really don't know, sir; girls think a great deal of their first romance, you know. However, they have not seen each other for an awful time, so I dare say she has forgotten all about him. Absence does not always make the heart grow fonder."

"No," said Sir Joseph; "but I shall never feel quite safe until we have Connie engaged to some other young fellow, but the worst of it is she has so few opportunities of seeing anyone; she is not like ordinary girls who are always running after the men, she sticks at home, going on with her painting and music, and seems quite content even if she does not go outside the grounds from one month's end to another, and it is all her mother can do to make her go with her when she makes her calls on the people around."

"Well, sir, what can I do?" asked Hugh. "I have brought fellows up to the house several times, but they don't seem to get on with Connie, nor Connie with them."

"No, they're the wrong sort," said his father; "is there not anyone else you can think of whom you can bring?"

Hugh reflected for a moment or two, and then mentioned one or two names which were utterly unknown to his father, who was therefore unable to judge concerning them.

"Lady Pankhurst has been mentioning to me that she thinks of giving a ball," continued Sir Joseph; "if she does, that would be a very good opportunity for you to bring up all the young men that you know; and then, if any one seems struck with Connie, or vice versa, it would be easy enough after that to invite him to the house."

"Very well, sir," assented Hugh; "I will do my best. It would be a great deal easier to get them to come to a dance than to bring them up to the house for nothing in particular."

"All right; then I will tell your mother to send cards to all those whom you mention to her. Who are these men you named?"

Hugh gave details regarding one or two, and amongst others mentioned Venables.

"Oh yes, I used to know his father," said Sir Joseph. "Ask him by all means. Does he live at Eastcote now?"

"He has only just returned from abroad, sir, but I believe he intends settling down here for the present at any rate."

"Very well; be sure you ask him. Theirs is a very good family, and if anything were to happen between Connie and him, I should think it a very lucky business."

This time Sir Joseph rose, and Hugh understood that the conference was at an end. With his father's permission, he mentioned to his sister that the ball was decided upon. Connie did not feel very much interested in the announcement. Still, it must not be supposed she was altogether averse to gaiety in which Norman could not join, whilst Muriel anticipated with some amount of excitement a change in her rather monotonous life. When the two girls were together, they had a long confabulation over the guests who were to be invited, Muriel wanting to know all particulars about the various visitors, and Connie entering into the necessary details with considerable animation.

"I declare, Connie," said Muriel, laughing, after a long list had been detailed, "it seems to me there is not a single pleasant person coming from your description."

"Well, I really don't think there is," said Connie decisively; "you see, we are in a very awkward position as regards people round here. The rich swells won't call on us because they know what papa was, and so we have to fall back upon those who, like ourselves, have risen from a humble beginning, and I am obliged to confess that very few of them are really interesting."

"Never mind," said Muriel, "I am quite sure some of them are better than their description. But why is Lady Pankhurst giving this ball? Do you give one every winter?"

"Oh no," said Connie; "I think I can guess the reason of this one—it is the old story, you know. Papa wants to get me married, and he will never be satisfied until I am turned off; he thinks I am still hankering after Lewis."

"That says a good deal for papa's penetration," rejoined Muriel.

"I wish he hadn't quite so much," returned Connie; "isn't it a shame that these people will be coming here, and will have a right to ask me to dance with them, whilst poor Lewis will be at Eastcote all the time, knowing that all his acquaintances will be able to spend the evening with me whilst he is kept at a distance."

"Yes, it is hard lines," assented Muriel; "however, it will come right some day."

During the evening Hugh made out a list of those whom he wished to invite, which was inspected by Lady Pankhurst, and approved. It was then handed to the girls to make out the cards. Muriel looked down the list, and stopped when she came to the name of Venables.

"Who is this, Connie?" she asked.

"I don't know, I'm sure," was the reply. "I never heard the name; have you?"

"Papa used to know a Mr. Venables, but he did not live at Eastcote," replied Muriel carelessly.

She then passed on to the next name, and Connie forgot all about Mr. Venables.

CHAPTER IV.

THE three weeks previous to the ball soon went by. Connie spent several mornings at Eastcote, deep in the pleasant trouble of choosing her dress. Muriel did not intend to have a new one; in the first place the expense would be too great, in the next place she wanted to wear one of the two she had brought from home. Connie did her best to make her have a new one at her expense, but Muriel refused, not wishing at all to put herself in rivalry with Miss Pankhurst.

The night before the ball Sir Joseph sent for his daughter.

"What is it, papa?" asked Connie, as she entered his room.

"Not much, my dear; I only wish to tell you that there is a gentleman coming to-morrow night to whom I wish you to be very civil. He is a friend of your brother, and the son of an old friend of mine."

"What is his name, papa?"

"Venables; he is a very nice young fellow," said Sir Joseph meaningly.

"Very well, papa; is there anything else you wish to say to me?"

Sir Joseph hesitated for a moment, and then said:

"You are growing up, you must remember, Connie, and it is almost time that you thought of getting settled."

"Are you in such a hurry for me to leave home, papa?"

"No, no, my child; I should be very glad if you could live here always, of course; but still we know what young girls are; they are always thinking about leaving their old home, and having one of their own."

Connie was silent. She could not deny that that had been her wish, and it was still a sore point that her father had so peremptorily forbidden her lover to become her husband.

"You know, Connie," resumed Sir Joseph hesitatingly, for he did not find it so easy to talk to his daughter as to his son, "you had a foolish little affair about a year ago, when you compelled me to act in a peremptory way. But you were a mere girl then, and could not know your own mind; and I am quite sure you have grown much wiser now, and forgotten all about that silliness. You must see that it will be much wiser to marry someone in your own station in life—one who is able to give you comforts to which you are accustomed."

"But, papa——" broke out Connie.

"Don't interrupt me, my child," said Sir Joseph somewhat stiffly; "I do not wish to hear a word from you on that point. You may return now to the drawing-room, and don't forget what I mentioned to you about Mr. Venables."

"Oh, Muriel!" cried Connie that night when they went to bed, "I am so unhappy."

"What is it?" enquired Muriel, putting her arm round Connie's neck.

"Papa has been talking to me again. He is just as determined about dear Lewis as ever; he won't even let me mention his name, and tells me I must forget all about him; and, worse than that, there is a man coming to-morrow night to whom he wants me to be very civil, and I know what that means—it means that he has found out that he is well off, and he wants me to marry him."

"Oh, come," said Muriel consolingly; "a stranger coming to a house is one thing, but his wanting to marry you is quite another, although for the matter of that I could not be surprised at anyone who saw you wanting to win you."

"Oh, I wish I was ugly," sobbed Connie, "or else very poor. Ever since papa has been made a knight I have been miserable with thinking that he never will let me marry anyone who is not rich. Now you must be kind to this man, and promise me one thing."

"What is it?" asked Muriel.

"Why, that when he comes to-morrow night you will do all you can to keep him away from me. I will introduce you to him early in the evening, and you must make yourself very charming to him; and I'm sure if you try he will forsake me and keep with you all the time, for no one is as charming as you when you try to make yourself so."

Muriel laughed. "But what will your papa say to me?" she said.

"Oh, he cannot say anything," returned Connie; "besides, I am going to be very rude to this man, and I expect when he finds he cannot get on with me he will only be too glad to come across someone who is more flattering."

"Very well," replied Muriel, "I will see what I can do for you. Don't trouble yourself about it, at any rate; you must get a good night's rest, and be sure you don't cry, or else you will not be fit to be seen to-morrow night."

Next day the house was upset. A small army of extra servants from Eastcote invaded the Hall; the furniture was turned topsy-turvy, the rooms were cleared for dancing, the billiard-room turned into a supper-room, and a big marquee built out beyond the conservatory for those who preferred conversation in the cool air to dancing in a heated room. Hugh, who had not seen much of Muriel since his conversation with his father, had bought two enormous bouquets, one of which he presented to his sister, and the other to Muriel. He had hesitated some time before taking this step, but he had been far from contented with himself during the past fortnight, and had determined that, in spite of his father's wishes, he would renew his attentions to Miss Leigh. He did not see any harm in it; he only felt that Como Hall was a different place when he could talk freely with Muriel, or sit by her side hearing her sing or play, to what it was when he was constrained to absent himself from her society. "At all events," he argued to himself, "the governor could not object to my giving her a bouquet: that is mere civility. She ought to have one, and unless I give it her I don't see who is to."

Muriel received the bouquet somewhat graciously. She had noticed that Hugh had absented himself from her company for the last two or three weeks. She had not objected to this, for her sole object in making herself agreeable to him was to please Connie and Lady Pankhurst, who were delighted to find that he seemed to become more reconciled to spending his evenings at home. She thought that her acceptance of the bouquet would show that she was still ready to treat him on friendly terms, and she moreover fancied, if she refused it, it would seem more marked than if she accepted it.

"I hope, Miss Leigh," said Hugh, as he presented the flowers, "that you will be good enough to keep a couple of waltzes for me."

"I don't think it is necessary for you to ask for them now," laughed Muriel; "do you imagine that my programme will be so full as all that?"

"I don't know, I'm sure," responded Hugh; "but at all events I should like to make sure if you don't mind."

"Oh, by all means," said Muriel; "which would you like?"

"The first and the seventh dances, if you don't object."

"Very well; those will do as well as any others."

"I am afraid," continued Hugh, "that you won't know many of the fellows; but if you are hard up for partners at any time I hope you won't mind mentioning it, and I will introduce you to any number."

"Thank you very much," replied Muriel; "I don't mean to dance often—in fact, I did not think of dancing at all."

"Oh, don't say that," pleaded Hugh; "I really don't see any reason why you should not dance."

Muriel turned away with a look of pain on her face. It was evident to what Hugh alluded.

"I'm awfully sorry I said that," began Hugh; "I didn't mean to pain you, really."

"No, of course not," replied Muriel; "I'm quite sure you did not."

Hugh murmured some inarticulate consolation, but at that moment he heard his father's footstep along the corridor, so he judged it better to retire. Muriel went to her room, carrying her bouquet in her hand, wishing that Hugh had given it to his mother rather than to herself.

The guests began to arrive about half-past nine o'clock, and from then till midnight there was a more or less constant stream of comers. Sir Joseph was in his glory. He received everyone with an air more befitting that of a monarch receiving his court than of a retired tradesman receiving his guests, the majority of whom despised him. He was particularly cordial to Venables, who arrived very late, and informed him that he had had the honour of knowing his father—in fact, they had been intimate friends. This was somewhat of an exaggeration, but Venables was unable to contradict it, for his father had been dead many years. Connie was introduced to him with a word or two of commendation from her father. Venables, as in duty bound, asked her for a dance. He thought she was a very pleasant girl—in fact, she looked charming that evening, and had it not been for the fact that she was the daughter of the hostess, and as such would naturally be much in demand, he would have asked her for a second. He said as much to her in the interval after his waltz.

"Thanks," said Connie negligently, "but I don't think you need trouble to say so."

"May I enquire why?" said Venables.

"I think that if you had very much wanted another dance with me you would have asked for it, and not have paid much consideration as to whether I were much in demand or not."

"Then I will ask for another now," returned Venables.

"Thank you—after what I said a moment ago I do not consider your request a compliment."

"Then it only remains for me to express my regret at your refusal," said Venables.

"Wait one moment," said Connie, somewhat more eagerly; "there is a girl here—a very charming girl—that I want to introduce you to. You will find her a much pleasanter companion than I am, I'm quite sure. Will you give me your arm?"

Venables obeyed. They crossed the room and entered the conservatory. Muriel was seated on a low cane-chair, under a palm-tree, which was hung with Chinese lanterns, and Hugh was standing by her side.

"Hugh," said Connie, as they approached, "I wish you would try and find partners for the Wilsons; they are all sitting together in a row, and looking perfectly miserable."

Hugh darted a glance at his sister not expressive of much pleasure.

"Oh," continued Connie, as if in reply to his look, "I have brought a partner for Miss Leigh; you need not be afraid of leaving her for the present."

Hugh strode out of the conservatory, throwing a not very cordial nod of recognition to Venables.

"Muriel," said Connie, "will you let me introduce Mr. Venables to you? He has heard so much about you that he wants an introduction."

Venables stood for a moment surprised, and then advancing he held out his hand to Muriel, and turning to Connie, said:

"I don't think your introduction is needed in this case. Miss Leigh and I have met before."

The Editor's Note Book.

THERE was a great deal in Lord Randolph Churchill's Blackpool speech from which none but prejudiced party politicians would be likely to dissent. The complaints that our public departments waste a shameful amount of money, that there is little to choose in the matter of extravagance between Liberals and Conservatives, and that Parliament devotes a great deal too much time to so-called legislation and a great deal too little to the transaction of useful business, are all perfectly just.

BUT Lord Randolph was less happy in that part of his speech which was practically devoted to a bitter denunciation of free-trade. All our industries, according to the speaker, are either dead or dying, and the floods of foreign silk, leather, wool, iron, and cotton goods, which are constantly coming into the country duty free, are hopelessly underselling our own products and driving our industrial population to emigration, to the workhouse, or to the prisons.

THESE statements are not strictly correct, seeing that the statistics of crime and pauperism show steady improvement, and, even if Lord Randolph's statements could be taken as strictly accurate, there arises the curious question, how does it happen that a people, so completely ruined as we are, can afford to pay for all the foreign iron and silk and all the rest of it?

OF course Lord Randolph was troubled with no doubts, and only paused to ask his hearers if they understood the reason of the deplorable state of things which he described, frankly confessing that he, for his part, did not. I wonder whether he is in any better position to explain why American speakers and writers are continually pouring forth similar Jeremiahs about the condition of the manufacturing industries of the United States—perhaps the most protectionist country in the world.

LORD WOLSELEY has told us that the Army—men and officers alike—is in all respects equal, if not superior, to any army of which the country has ever been able to boast. If this be so—and if anyone is competent to speak on the subject it is surely Lord Wolseley—debate on the subject of short against long service may as well be discontinued as mere waste of time.

ON one important point Lord Wolseley did not touch. The cost of this admirable little army was not, indeed, one of the branches of the subject on which he was expected to speak. But, now that our army is all that can be desired, it will be well for the experts to address themselves seriously to the question whether its enormous cost cannot fairly be reduced.

IT is curious to read, as a commentary on the history of British policy in South Africa, that Cetewayo, in attempting to escape from Ekowe, was recaptured by our troops. It appears, then, that, after all the indignant disclaimers of the Radical wing of the Government, the "sable monarch" is nothing more or less than our prisoner. Why, then, should his prison be just in the very place where he must necessarily be the centre of disaffection and conspiracy? To the complexion of the Melbury Road we shall have to come again at last.

SIR SAMUEL BAKER has been at the pains of pointing out the danger which General Gordon runs in the attempt to make his way, almost unaccompanied, to Khartoum, and, indeed, his position, whether he has a large sum of money with him or not, must be critical in the extreme. Desperate cases require desperate remedies, and perhaps in the existing dead-lock the General's mission may be the best expedient that could have been devised, but it is to be hoped that, if he succeeds, the Government will not come to the conclusion that it is safe always to trust to a general with £40,000 for an army.

THE story of Fanny Jordan, who died the other day, after malingering and confining herself to her bed for twenty years, is at first sight an extraordinary one, but will be found on examination to be only one of many very similar cases which are recorded in the history of imposture. This unhappy creature's explanation was that she had kept up the deception because people called her "a great lazy," and that she thought she would do something to make herself "look bad." In all probability the thing originated with some form of hysteria, and was kept going because the contributions of the credulous and the benevolent made the speculation profitable.

MR. DAVIS, Mr. Barnum's agent, has now written to the papers to explain that the great merit of the so-called white elephant consists in the fact that it is not white, but that it has certain other peculiarities of marking. Mr. Davis further expresses himself so well satisfied with the animal that he is prepared to give £40,000 for another elephant exhibiting precisely the same characteristics; though it does not appear who is to decide whether the new comer (if he does come) fulfils Mr. Davis's requirements or not. Meanwhile the manager of the Zoological Gardens simply advertises the animal as the Burmese elephant, as he ought to have done from the beginning.

THE Belt jurymen have responded with alacrity to the invitation addressed to them by Mr. Charles Reade, and have addressed some half-a-dozen letters to the Daily Telegraph of varying degrees of argumentative and literary merit, but it cannot be said that they have thrown any appreciable amount of light on this apparently endless controversy.

THE only points which come out with any distinctness are that the majority of the jury had made up their minds before Mr. Baron Huddleston's summing-up; that they are very angry with Lord Chief Justice Coleridge; and that they had among their number at least one weak-minded individual, who regretted his verdict as soon as it was delivered, and who is a type of a class, one specimen of which at least is to be found in almost every jury-box.

IT is the fashion to extol the builders of ancient cathedrals and castles at the expense of their successors of to-day—with how much reason the description of the state of Peterborough Cathedral very clearly shows. It appears that the core of the great Norman piers is nothing but dust, and that their foundations are only small stones laid on loose gravel, although, if the builders had gone some three feet lower, they would have touched the solid rock. In truth, there is nothing new under the sun, not even the "jerry" builder.

THE man Copeland, who, when he was visited by the police, took a harlequin leap through an open window, was described as a notorious burglar, well-known to the police. It is one of the defects of our law that habitual criminals of this class should be allowed to follow their profession, until they are clumsy enough or unlucky enough to be found out in some particular crime. It is now a good many years since Lord Kimberley's Habitual Criminals' Bill was introduced and upset by the humanitarians. If it had been passed, we should be hearing a great deal less just now about gangs of professional thieves, notorious burglars, and the like.

A CHILD died the other day near Dudley, under circumstances which induced the medical man, who attended the case, to declare unhesitatingly that the poor little thing absolutely died of pressure on the brain, brought about by overwork in the board-school. To this the official defender of the "department," having had the inestimable advantage of not having seen the child and of knowing nothing of its symptoms, except from such inferences as he chose to draw from hearsay, stated that the unfortunate scholar might have died from disease, and that, therefore, there is "nothing in the evidence, beyond Dr. Bradley's dictum, that leads to the conclusion that 'over study' was the cause of the child's fatal illness."

PUTTING aside the fact that the evidence of a person who actually sees a thing is worth more than that of any number of people who do not, and admitting for a moment the validity of the plea of the official apologist, it still remains certain that reform in the management of the board-school at Pensnett, Dudley, is urgently called for. There must be something wrong in a system, under which a poor child, suffering from a fatal disease, can be crammed by teachers up to almost the last hour of its miserable little life.

THE Proprietor, Secretary, Committee, and Members of the Park Club are evidently determined to give Mr. Howard Vincent as much trouble as possible. Mr. Poland and Mr. George Lewis are familiar figures in Bow Street, but, when the defendants add to these Mr. Charles Russell, Q.C., things are likely to be lively for Mr. Wontner on the other side. It is well that the point at issue should be raised, but it will cost somebody a good deal of money to get it finally settled.

WE have it on the authority of Ovid that the study of the liberal arts softens the manners and prevents ferocity, but it cannot be said that the same rule applies nowadays to journalism, more particularly to that branch of it which is conventionally known as dramatic "criticism." Let me take, as an example, the passage of arms which has taken place over Mr. Hamilton's "Our Regiment." The gentleman who writes the dramatic notices in the Times began by accusing Mr. Hamilton of all sorts of malpractices in connection with his play, averring at one and the same time, with no little inconsistency, that it was merely a copy from the German, and that it was taken bodily from an American play on the same subject. These statements, being entirely baseless, were answered and refuted by Mr. Hamilton with plenty of spirit and energy, but with a due regard to courtesy. This, however, did not satisfy the editor of the World, who took up the cudgels on behalf of Mr. Hamilton, and stigmatised the Times gentleman as an "uncooked Scotchman."

ON the whole there would seem to be something that requires immediate reform in the dramatic criticism of the day. The elements of private and personal likes and dislikes are allowed to have far too much influence; and actors, and especially actresses, are habitually judged, not so much on their own merits, as with reference to the interests of that other artist whose train the critic happens for the time being to swell.

A CASE in point, I think, is Miss Mary Anderson's performance of Clarice in Mr. Gilbert's new play—as to the merits of which, not having seen it, I can, of course, offer no personal opinion whatever. The first-night notices were almost all bad, and, as I have been assured by at least twenty thoroughly capable judges who were present on the occasion, altogether unfair. Certainly, to those who could read between the lines, the animus displayed in more than one paper was gross and palpable.

PLAIN DINNERS.

A LEG OF MUTTON.

IT seems a pity that English people do not, as a rule, find themselves able to gratify their taste for "plain roast and boiled" without leaving on hand such a quantity of cold meat. Delicious as every one must admit a fine leg of mutton to be when roasted to a turn and served hot, it certainly is the reverse of this when cold. It has, probably, the appearance of being economical in the cold form, because, without an undue consumption of pickles, so little of it is eaten. But, in the long run, it cannot prove economical to give the family food which does not supply the highest amount of nourishment, and cold meat is allowed by all dietitians to be less nourishing than hot meat.

While we admit that many excellent dishes can be made of cold meat, we contend that it is a point of good management to have very little left over from each day's dinner, and very rarely to serve meat cold.

Let us suppose that a leg of mutton is in question, and see how we can have three hot dishes of freshly-cooked meat out of it instead of one. Get the butcher to saw off from the loin-end of the leg as many chops as will make an Irish stew; then have the middle cut for roasting one day, and the knuckle for stewing or boiling another. Should there be any left over from the last two dishes, it can be used as suggested in the last bill of fare, which is of the nature of a make-shift dinner, but very good if carefully managed, and decidedly cheap.

In choosing a leg of mutton, observe that it is plump in the middle and short at the knuckle. Inferior legs of mutton are often cut with a portion of the chump of the loin attached. The characteristics of good mutton are white fat, the lean somewhat dark in colour, the bones small, the legs short. Housekeepers of former generations always insisted on being supplied with mutton at least four years old, and they were right, for immature meat has neither the savour nor nourishment of that which has attained its proper age.

It is rarely now that mutton, even two years old, is to be found in the markets; and it is generally fatted too rapidly. In London a large proportion of the mutton sold is foreign, and is apt to be dry and flavourless. It is more economical in the end to pay a good price for home-produce than to have this cheaper and less satisfactory meat.

DINNER I.

LENTIL PUDDING.

Wash half a pound of lentils, rubbing them with the hands, in several waters until the last is clear. Put the lentils to soak in three pints of cold water, with a bit of soda the size of a large pea. The next day boil the lentils in this water until tender, adding more water as required, but allowing it to dry up at the last. When the lentils are cooked enough beat them up as smoothly as possible; add an ounce of butter, pepper and salt; stir over the fire until mixed; then press the mass into a buttered mould or basin, and after it has stood a minute, turn out on a dish and serve.

IRISH STEW.

Fry the chops very quickly, just to brown the outside. Put them into a stewpan with sufficient hot water to cover them, salt, pepper, and four or five onions, sliced. Simmer gently for one hour, or until the meat is beginning to be tender, then drain off the gravy, from which remove every particle of fat. Put a layer of sliced potatoes at the bottom of the stewpan, then the cooked meat and onions, over this another layer of potatoes. Pour in the gravy, well seasoned with salt and pepper; cover the stewpan closely, and simmer until the potatoes are done, usually in about half an hour.

Many cooks parboil the potatoes before putting them into the stew, and they do this under the impression that potatoes contain some poisonous property, which is drawn into the liquid in which they are cooked. This may be described as a popular error, and Dr. Pavy says that "if there is any poison present, it must be either insignificant in amount, or be destroyed by the heat to which the potato is subjected before being sent to table." As the flavour is finer if the potato is put raw into the stew, it is as well to know that no harm can arise from so doing.

There can, however, be no doubt that Irish stew is too rich, and therefore indigestible for most people, when the potatoes are allowed to absorb all the fat of the meat. By freeing the gravy of grease as directed above before adding the potatoes, this objection to Irish stew will be obviated.

RICE PUDDING.

This recipe is for a good family pudding; the eggs can, if desired, be omitted.

Boil a quarter of a pound of rice until soft, drain it dry. Pour a pint of milk, whilst boiling, on two eggs well-beaten; sweeten with two ounces of raw sugar, and flavour with grated nutmeg or lemon-peel. Mix this custard with the rice, add an ounce of beef-suet shred very finely. Put the pudding into a tart-dish, and bake it in a slow oven for an hour.

If more convenient, the rice may be baked in water instead of being boiled, and the pudding be finished in the same manner in either case.

Recipes for dishes of the remaining bills of fare will be given in a following number.

How to Mount Microscopic Objects.

PART II.

THERE is a vast variety of opaque objects which do not require to be mounted in balsam in order to prepare them for microscopic observation, and which may be treated in a far more simple and easy manner. Procure some slips of wood of the same dimensions as an ordinary glass-slide, that is, three inches long by one inch broad, and about one tenth of an inch in thickness. In the exact centre of each of these must be perforated a circular hole from one-half to three-quarters of an inch in diameter. They are to be used in the following manner. Take some stout paper of the peculiar colour known as "dead black," and paste a piece about an inch square to the lower surface of one of these slides, so that the central hole is completely closed by it. See that it adheres thoroughly in every part, and put it upon one side until quite dry. You will then have a kind of cell in which the object is to be placed. Now take the gum tragacanth, the manufacture of which was described in the preceding paper, and transfer a small quantity to the centre of the cell, laying it upon the black paper which forms the bottom. Having done this, place your object upon the gum, press it down slightly with one of the needles you will have ready to hand for that purpose, and then lay it aside until it is thoroughly dry. If time is an object the slide may be placed upon a warm mantelpiece in order to accelerate matters, but in no case should it be dried too quickly. On the other hand it must never be completed until every particle of moisture has evaporated, for if the cell be closed while the object is still damp, mould is almost certain to ensue before many weeks have passed. This is trying enough even with simple and easily obtained objects, while with those of a more valuable nature, the damage done may be irreparable.

HAVING satisfied himself that the condition of the newly-mounted object is all that can be desired, the operator may proceed to the final stage of the business, which is a matter of perfect simplicity. Take one of the thin glass covers, either circular or square, and close the cell with it, fastening it firmly in its place by gold size, Canada balsam, or by ordinary cement. The slide may then be finished off in any style most fancied by the operator, a very simple plan being to cover it entirely with white paper, while a coloured label may be affixed at one end on which the name of the object, etc., may be written. A band of black varnish painted round the cell itself will add greatly to the appearance of the slide.

MANY objects may be satisfactorily prepared in this manner, which has many advantages over mounting in balsam, inasmuch that it is far more rapidly conducted, and requires but little practice before perfection is arrived at. On the other hand, of course, transparent objects cannot be mounted in this way, as the nature of the cell effectually prevents the transmission of light from below which is so necessary for their examination. Such specimens, however, as small insects, seeds of plants, pollen, and many others, are quite suitable for this method of preparation, and may always be procured without much difficulty.

MOUNTING objects in fluid is far more difficult than either of the processes already explained, and is, indeed, hardly suitable for description in these pages, for it is of little value excepting to those who are making the microscope a special study, and for whom, of course, these remarks are not intended. It is principally employed when it is required to show the internal organs of insects and other minute beings in situ, and therefore requires the exercise of great skill in dissecting the object to be prepared, as well as in the actual mounting itself.

Now as to the method of collecting the objects to be mounted. It is as well to make a point of invariably carrying in the pocket one or two receptacles for any objects of interest which may be met with, for it is impossible to be sure that some curious and valuable specimen may not turn up during even the shortest of strolls, and it is very aggravating to be obliged to pass it by for want of the apparatus with which to secure and carry it home. No insect-hunter worthy of the name thinks of stirring from the house without at least a box or two in his pocket, and the microscopist should take pattern by his example. Two or three chip pill-boxes, such as are employed to hold ointment, and can be procured of any druggist at the rate of from four to six a penny, will be useful for holding large specimens such as insects and other small animals, while a glass phial fitted with a cork (not a stopper) will serve to contain more minute objects. This phial should be of the same dimensions throughout, for if furnished with a neck it is often very difficult to induce the contents to come forth when they are required for use.

ANY small insects which are taken alive, and are required for immediate use, may be instantly and painlessly killed by dashing them into boiling water. Take care, however, that the water is absolutely boiling, and remove the insects from it without delay after they have been killed, for, if allowed to remain, the action of the water will cause them to fall to pieces. If it is desired to keep them for any length of time, they may be dropped into methylated spirits of wine, which will preserve them uninjured for months, or even years, if need be. The larger insects, also, and any creatures which are intended for dissection, must be kept in spirits for a time, in order that they may become partly hardened, for their bodies are so full of fat, and the tissues are so soft and delicate, that they cannot be manipulated when freshly killed. In this case the spirit should be diluted with one-third part of water, for otherwise the hardening process will be too complete, and the dissection rendered a matter of great difficulty.

It may not be out of place here to remark that most useful tools for insect dissection may be made out of the needles thrust into handles as before described, at the cost of very little trouble to the operator. All that is required is to rub them down upon a stone until they assume the form of fine double-edged knives, whose edges are capable of taking the greatest keenness. These simple implements are really invaluable, and are the principal tools employed by one of our leading entomologists, whose wonderful dissections of beetles so small as to be almost invisible to the naked eye have won for him fame throughout the scientific world. A pair of fine dissecting scissors will also be useful, and can be obtained of any dealer in microscopic apparatus.

EXCEPTING for the very minute species, I am inclined to think that a magnifying-glass is of little use in dissection, and should seldom be employed while the actual work is going on. For it should be remembered that, if a magnifying-glass is used while the dissection is in progress, the implements are enlarged in exactly the same proportion as the subject, so that working at a small insect with an ordinary needle is much like attacking a stag-beetle with a poker. In some cases, however, its use is absolutely necessary, and it should be fixed on a stand at the right focus in such a manner that both hands may be free to carry on the work. It need not be a powerful one, and an ordinary pocket lens, with two or three glasses of different focus, will answer every purpose.

THERE is no part of an insect, or other small creature, which is not full of interest when viewed through a microscope, so that quite a variety of objects may be procured from a single specimen. The various parts of the mouth, the eye, the scales, the breathing holes and tubes which pervade the body, the gizzard (when present), and many other parts of the structure, may be mounted without any great difficulty, as may also vegetable tissues, etc. It must be remembered, however, that, before mounting, all portions of internal structure must be steeped for a time in a moderately strong solution of caustic potash, while vegetable fibres, such as those of leaves, must be soaked in water until partial decomposition has set in, when the delicate cuticle may be easily removed from the framework by means of a camel's-hair pencil. A speedier method is to immerse the leaves for a few minutes in dilute nitric acid, but this process requires some little care, and is not always equally satisfactory.

SECTIONS of wood are very beautiful objects, but can scarcely be prepared without a special machine, and as this is somewhat expensive it is pretty well as cheap to buy the slides outright. There is, however, such a vast variety of objects to be obtained without difficulty, and which need no special care in their preparation, that it is quite unnecessary for the microscopist to waste his time and money over this branch of the work, unless he should happen to be making a speciality of that line of study.

IN conclusion I would offer a few suggestions in recapitulation of those which I have already set forth. In the first place, do not be discouraged at a few early failures. These are inevitable in any work requiring skill and delicacy of touch, and must be expected by every one who enters upon a course of study with the microscope. In the second, never lose patience while mounting an object, no matter how troublesome the operation may be. Loss of temper invariably means a spoiled slide. And, lastly, be very careful to see that all slides are thoroughly dry before the final touches are put to them. If this precaution is attended to, and if the necessary perseverance is forthcoming, proficiency in mounting objects for the microscope will be merely a matter of time.

An Encounter With a Wild Cat.

THE following anecdote is told by the Brooksville correspondent of the Mount Desert Herald: "Towards the latter part of an afternoon recently I was coming from Sedgwick on foot, and alone. When about half-way down the hill above Black's school-house I heard a very peculiar kind of a purring sound, with an occasional low, snapping noise at the same time, which seemed to be very near the road (the land on the Brooksville side of the road was quite thickly wooded with spruce and fir trees, the limbs growing near the ground). After listening a minute or two and locating the sound as near as I was able to, I stooped low in the road, and looking under the branches of the trees, I saw a large wild cat some fifteen or twenty feet from the road, very busily engaged with something so buried up in the snow that I could not tell what it was. Not really expecting to get near the animal, I went back a few rods and succeeded, after some trouble, in getting a small stake from the fence on the opposite side of the road, and started for the wild cat. By creeping very easy through the snow I got within five or six feet of him before he saw me. I saw that he was very busy eating a rabbit he had just killed. As soon as he saw me he jumped into the limbs of a small spruce directly over his head, with the rabbit in his mouth. By this time I was within reach of him with my stake, and struck at him through the limbs of the tree, which, however, were so thick that, although I hit him on the back, I didn't seem to hurt him. But he dropped the rabbit and turned towards me with a savage growl. He looked wicked, and I put myself into a posture of defence, and none too soon, for he immediately leaped from the tree directly at me. I was ready for him, and met him with my stake fair in the forehead. It dropped him in the snow, and broke my stake short off, leaving the longest part in my hands. Before he could recover himself I got my foot on him, and got in half-a-dozen more good licks on his head, that finished him. I dragged him home (about a mile distant), having to stop many times on the road for people to examine my trophy, for he attracted considerable notice. The next day I took his ears to the town treasurer, who paid me two dollars and a half for them, the town at that time paying that amount of bounty for every wild cat killed within the limits of the town."

Household Gardening.

WE last week referred to the importance of keeping the roots of fruit-trees moist when out of the ground during the process of removal. As much transplanting is being done now, it will be well to observe that the drying of the roots which is either thoughtlessly or carelessly and certainly needlessly permitted, is one of the most fertile causes of failure.

Thousands of trees and shrubs fail to grow satisfactorily, and many refuse to grow at all, because the sap has been allowed to evaporate from the roots by exposure to air. On this account, fruit-trees, evergreens, Roses, and other deciduous flowering shrubs with parched and shrivelled roots, should not be purchased in markets, nor from barrows that traverse the streets of large towns, however apparently cheap the examples offered for sale may be.

We have seen Roses innumerable sold for twopence each that certainly were not worth twopence a dozen, for not one in twenty of them could grow and flower satisfactorily.

Many persons are in the habit of purchasing what they do not want when they see articles that they consider cheap. There is, in truth, no economy whatever in a policy of this kind, and by far the better plan is to decide on the number of plants or trees that are really needed for furnishing a garden satisfactorily, and then to obtain them from a dealer of repute, who will supply them in such condition that with reasonable care they may be expected to flourish.

USEFUL FRUITS FOR SMALL GARDENS.

DWARF-GROWING APPLES.

Without a knowledge of the habits of the different varieties of this useful fruit, mistakes must inevitably be made in planting. For instance that excellent and popular kind, the Blenheim Orange, is so robust and spreading in growth as to be quite unfitted for the narrow border of a suburban garden, and others could be named similarly unsuitable where space is limited.

The best early autumn dessert-apple for small gardens is the Irish Peach. The tree is a compact grower and good bearer of attractive and delicious fruit. Following it, and good for both dessert and cooking, are Duchess of Oldenburg and Cellini, both dwarf growers, and early and good bearers of medium-sized and beautifully-striped apples. For use in November and onwards till January, we have Cox's Orange Pippin, the prince of dessert-apples for Christmas, the tree being compact and productive. This splendid apple should be in every collection.

We pass now to note four more strictly serviceable varieties that produce large fruit abundantly for culinary purposes. These are Stirling Castle, a noble fruit almost as round as an orange, and often produced freely on trees three feet high. Similarly productive in a small state is Prince Albert, a sure bearer of medium-sized, rosy-cheeked fruit; then comes Eclinvile Seedling, one of the finest and most profitable. Warner's King completes the quartette, and under good cultivation it is not uncommon to see fruits of it eighteen inches in circumference. The varieties named may be planted without hesitation by all who have room for a few trees. It were easy to extend the list, but the probability is that the longer it is made the less useful it may be to the majority of readers.

When dwarf early-bearing trees are desired, they should always be grafted on the French Paradise Stock, which is used by all good nurserymen, large standard trees for growing in orchards being worked on the Crab Stock. It is important to remember this, and order trees accordingly.

CHOICE PEARS.

Undoubtedly one of the best early Pears is William's Bon Chrétien, the fruit being of the first size and quality, and always in demand in its season. Succeeding it, and very delicious, is Beurre Superfin, a very juicy and buttery Pear of the first excellence. Also of high quality and handsome in appearance is Louise Bonne of Jersey, which must never be overlooked, nor must the superior but less known Doyenne du Comice. The two late Pears we recommend are Josephine de Malines and Bergamotte de Esperen, which will afford fruit of the highest merit from January till May. This is a very choice half-dozen, and if planted in positions where the trees will grow well, and the fruit mature and develop its qualities, will give satisfaction to the most exacting connoisseurs of this esteemed fruit. If a very early Pear is wanted for training to a wall, plant the Jargonelle.

A FEW GOOD PLUMS AND CHERRIES.

The most useful of early Plums is Rivers's Prolific. It has been mentioned before, as has the Cluster Damsion, and both must be grown. These, however, are small fruits. A large Plum that should be grown everywhere, when this fruit will flourish, is the Victoria, a very fine red, egg-shaped fruit, that is produced in such abundance as often to break down the branches. Larger still, also red, is Pond's Seedling, but the tree needs more room than the others. It is a magnificent kind, and fruits of it were sold last season for threepence each. Round Purple Plums of great merit are the Czar and Purple Gage; and the most productive and serviceable of the yellow Plums is Magnum Bonum. Perhaps the richest of all is the Greengage, but the tree is not a great bearer, and is usually best secured to a wall.

Cherries are also best trained to walls, as they are there less liable to be devoured by birds than in the open, where the fruit is seldom allowed to ripen, unless protected by nets. Early Prolific, nearly black; Governor Wood, red; Elton, amber; and Black Tartarian are among the finest and richest. The Morello, as has been previously intimated, is the only one that birds do not attack voraciously. This is because it is not sweet, but it is withal very useful, and may be planted wherever space can be found.

PEACHES, NECTARINES, AND APRICOTS.

Every year there are persons who desire a tree of each of these fruits for covering a vacant wall having a southerly aspect, but out of the great number of varieties prepared for sale, they know not which to select. As a Peach, then, all who desire a tree will not err by planting the Grosse Mignonne, which is very fine and delicious.

One of the best Nectarines is the Violette Hative, and the finest Apricot the Moorpark. It may not be known to all that the Nectarine is merely a variety of the Peach, having a smooth shining skin, that of the Peach being downy, but the flavour of the two is totally dissimilar. By the term variety, as employed here, we mean that if any person were to raise a tree from the stone of a Peach it would be as likely to bear Nectarines as Peaches, while if a Nectarine stone were planted the resulting fruit might be a Peach. This curious fact proves that the two are simply differing forms of the same fruit, just as one Gooseberry is smooth and another hairy.

PLANTING TREES.

First bear in mind the above injunction of keeping the roots moist, then make an excavation much wider than the roots extend when spread out. Let the tree be placed in position so that when the roots are covered and the soil levelled, the stem is just as deep in the soil as it was before removal, and this point may easily be determined by an examination of the bark.

If any of the roots are bruised, cut off the injured portions with a sharp knife, and spread out the remainder quite straight, not doubling them. Work the soil well amongst them with the hand, then make it tolerably firm by treading, and cover the surface of the soil over them, and for a foot beyond their extremities, two or three inches deep, with manure. This will exclude frost and the virtues of the manure will be washed down and afford nourishment for the roots.

Secure each tree to a stake or to the wall, as the case may be, to prevent their being twisted by the wind, but care must be taken that the ligatures employed do not injure the bark. It is always desirable to attach the names to the trees. Smooth deal labels covered with white paint, and written on with a very black pencil while the paint is still wet, last for years, the names remaining legible, as they are practically "sunk," i.e. through the covering of paint.

HYACINTHS IN GLASSES.

It is not often that the bulbs that have flowered in glasses of water are of any use for another year; still, some of them may be so preserved that they will afford small flowers.

There is no better way of preparing them than to transfer them from the water to flower-pots, working cocoanut-fibre refuse or leaf-mould carefully amongst the roots and keeping it moist. If by this means the foliage can be kept fresh for a considerable time, the bulbs may be useful for planting four or five in a pot in the autumn; these small bulbs often producing a number of slender spikes of flowers even more suitable for cutting for bouquets than the larger spikes, which are too massive for that purpose.

Buying Pictures.

As we arrange our payment of pictures at present, no artist's work is worth half its proper value while he is alive. The moment he dies, his pictures, if they are good, reach double their former value; but that rise of price represents simply a profit made by the intelligent dealer or purchaser on his past purchases. So that the real facts of the matter are, that the British public, spending a certain sum annually in art, determines that of every thousand it pays, only five hundred shall go to the painter, or shall be at all concerned in the production of art; and that the other five hundred shall be paid merely as a testimonial to the intelligent dealer, who knew what to buy. Now testimonials are very pretty and proper things, within due limits; but testimonials to the amount of a hundred per cent. on the total expenditure are not good political economy.

Do not therefore, in general, unless you see it to be necessary for its preservation, buy the picture of a dead artist. If you fear that it may be exposed to contempt or neglect, buy it; its price will then probably not be high; if you want to put it into a public gallery, buy it; you are sure, then, that you do not spend your money selfishly; or, if you loved the man's work while he was alive, and bought it then, buy it also now, if you can see no living work equal to it. But if you did not buy it while the man was living, never buy it after he is dead. You are then doing no good to him, and you are doing some shame to yourself.

Look around you for pictures that you really like, and in buying which you can help some genius yet unperished—that is the best atonement you can make to the one you have neglected—and give to the living and struggling painter at once wages and testimonial.—Ruskin.

Odds and Ends.

THE Marquis of Lorne, in the interesting paper which he read before the members of the Society of Arts on "Canada and Its Products," said: "We can now return to the plains, and look at the Indian nomad tribes. A law exists throughout our territories against the sale of whisky, a law vigorously enforced. Whisky is the bane which drives the savage wild, and is the fruitful cause of every crime amongst the white men in the American Western villages; and the prohibition placed upon its use does much towards preserving order among the young communities of a British soil. You do not hear in villages in our land, as you do hear it said farther south, that 'Shooting was pretty lively last night.' There is a story that, in a Colorado ball-room, it was necessary, on account of the manners and customs of the inhabitants, to write in large letters over the head of the unfortunate gentleman who had been detailed to perform music for the evening's amusement: 'Please don't shoot the pianist; he is doing his best.' If trouble occur in our Canadian West, it is promptly suppressed, and the guilty ruffian handed out."

ONCE Lord John Russell called a cab in the evening to carry him from the House of Commons to Chesham Place. To the cabman he gave a coin; but when, with proper care, he balanced his accounts that night, he found 19s. short. He rightly concluded that he had given his driver a sovereign for a shilling. On the following day he asked the waterman in Palace Yard if he remembered the cabman. The cabman was found. Lord John reminded him of what had occurred. The cabman knew all about it, and acknowledged his rascality. Lord John suggested the immediate return of the money. "Can't be done, your lordship," said the cabman, grinning. "Can't! why not?" rejoined the immortal Whig. "Why, my lord, I thought a great nobleman like you of course meant to give me the money as compensation for the honour of driving you; so, as my boots was werry old, I went and bought a pair—and here they are," pointing to his somewhat shapely legs. "They're werry nice boots, my lord. Some calls 'em Wellingtons; I calls 'em Russells."

RECENTLY a well-known barrister was concerned in a case where the question involved was as to the mental condition of the testatrix. The witness under examination, herself an aged lady, had testified to finding her friend failing, childish, and that when she told her something she looked as though she did not understand. Counsel, cross-examining, tried to get her to describe this look, but did not succeed very well in doing so. At last, getting a little impatient, he asked: "Well, how did she look? Did she look at you as I am looking now, for instance?" The witness very demurely replied: "Well, yes—kind of vacant—"

THE cashier of a bank in the city reports the following incident: A German gentleman approaching the counter, requested that a cheque payable to the order of Schweitzercase be cashed. "Ja, dot's me," he nodded reassuringly in answer to the cashier's look of enquiry. "But I don't know that you are Mr. Schweitzercase. You must get yourself identified," said the cashier. "How vas dot?" asked the German with a puzzled look. "You must get some one to identify you," repeated the bank officer; "I don't know you." "Ah, ja!" cried Hans, much relieved. "Dot's all right. I don't know you neider."

WHEN Fouché was appointed minister by Louis XVIII., the king asked him whether, during the Empire, he had not had him watched. He wanted to know the name of the spies. Fouché hesitated to reveal them; the king insisted; Fouché spoke at last: "If your majesty must know, it was the Duc de Blacas," said Fouché. "And how much did you pay him?" asked the king. "Two hundred thousand francs per annum," came the answer. "It is well," said the king; "he has not cheated me; we went halves."

A BIT of wholesome advice is credited to Washington Irving in Orville Dewey's autobiography, as follows: "Mrs. S. told me that one evening he (Irving) strolled up to their piazza and fell into one of his easy and unpremeditated talks, when he said, among other things: 'Don't be anxious about the education of your daughters; they will do very well; don't teach them so many things—teach them one thing.' 'What is that, Mr. Irving?' 'Teach them to be easily pleased.'"

IT was my custom in my youth (says a celebrated Persian writer) to rise from my sleep, to watch, pray, and read the Koran. One night, as I was thus engaged, my father, a man of practised virtue, awoke. "Behold," said I to him, "thy other children are lost in irreligious slumbers, while I alone awake to praise God." "Son of my soul," said he, "it is better to sleep than to wake to remark the faults of thy brethren."

A GOOD wife never grumbles. A good horse never stumbles. A good child never tumbles. A good cart never rumbles. A good actor never mumbles. Good yarn never jumbles. Honest work never humbles.

A MAN loved by a beautiful and virtuous woman carries a talisman that renders him invulnerable; every one feels that such a one's life has a higher value than that of others.

TELEGRAMS were published a week or two ago which gave a summary of Henry Ward Beecher's deliverance on Theatres after he had seen Mr. Irving. It appears, from the New York papers, that the statement was made at the Plymouth Church week-night meeting, at which Mr. Beecher often replies to questions put to him by any person in the audience. A white-haired old gentleman at one of these meetings wanted to know why Mr. Beecher, who had sometimes spoken against the drama, had recently gone to see "Pinafore," and other plays—whether his objections had been removed, and if so, from what cause? The Brooklyn pastor, seated comfortably in his chair, explained that he had been brought up to regard the theatre as a bad institution, and to consider that going to such a place "was almost as bad as going to the devil." For many years his time was too fully occupied to pay much attention to the subject, but at last he went to see Salvini in "Othello," and was glad that he went. The question as to what he would advise was adroitly fenced. "I advise every young man to follow in my footsteps," said the wary old minister, "and when you are seventy years old, go and see the best actors you can find."

MR. HAWKINS, Q.C., engaged in a cause before the late Lord Campbell, had frequently to mention the damage done to a brougham, and this word he pronounced, according to its orthography, brough-am. "If my learned friend will adopt the usual designation, and call the carriage a bro'am, it will save the time of the court," said Lord Campbell with a smile. Mr. Hawkins bowed, and accepted his lordship's pronunciation of the word during the remainder of his speech. When Lord Campbell proceeded to sum up the evidence, he had to refer to the omnibus which had damaged the bro'am, and in doing so pronounced the word also according to its orthography. "I beg your lordship's pardon," said Mr. Hawkins, very respectfully; "but if your lordship will use the common designation for such a vehicle, and call it a 'bus—'" The loud laughter which ensued, and in which his lordship joined, prevented the conclusion of the sentence.

THE Gaelic bard, Jan Lorn Macdonald, whose loyal and satirical effusions are well known in every corner of the Highlands, pursued with the most unrelenting rancour of his verse the celebrated Marquis of Argyll, the enemy of his clan, and the head of the Whig interest. The marquis, like all Highlanders of the period, felt sore at being the object of a bard's ridicule, and, happening to meet Jan Lorn soon after the composition of one of his satires, asked him in Gaelic: "Wilt thou never cease to gnaw me, Jan?" "Never," replied Jan with asperity, "never, until I can swallow you."

A COURTIER in France, in the reign of Louis XIII., playing at picquet in an open gallery, observed the President (whose name was Gaussant) talking very freely of his method of playing, and, having purposely made some trifling mistake to draw him still further, he exclaimed: "What stupid play! I protest I am a mere Gaussant!" "You are a mere fool," replied Gaussant. "True," replied the other; "that was what I meant."

"MISS FITZROY—aw—are you not fond of etchings?—aw—you know, they are deuced clever—some of them are." "Ah yes, indeed, Mr. Featherweight. And, do you know, there is something about you that reminds me very much of an etching?" "Why, really—aw—how charming!" "Yes; there is about you such a foggy suggestion of something that isn't there, you know."

THE mistress of a house in the city said to a young servant-girl fresh from the country: "Maria, go see if Mr. Scott, the pork butcher, has pigs' feet." The servant-girl departed and returned a few moments later. "Please, ma'am, I don't know; I couldn't see!" "But what did you say?" "I didn't say anything. I looked at Mr. Scott—he had boots on."

A SCOTCH farmer had determined, in spite of the bad times, to pay his rent if it were his last shilling, and, saying to his landlord, who received it, "It is my last shilling," he threw down a roll of notes. The landlord counted them and said: "There is fifty pounds too much." "Odds, man," said the farmer, "I put my hand in the wrong pouch."

A STORY is told of a Welsh jury, who, when a learned counsel had opened his case and concluded by saying, "Now, gentlemen, I will call before you witnesses who will bear out the statements I have made," replied unanimously: "Oh, Mr. Williams, you need not give yourself the trouble: we can believe you."

A MILLER had his neighbour arrested upon the charge of stealing wheat from his mill, but as he was unable to prove the charge, the Court adjudged that the plaintiff should apologise to the accused. "Well," said he, "I've had you arrested for stealing my wheat. I can't prove it, and I'm sorry for it."

JONES and Brown were talking of a young clergyman, whose preaching they had been to hear. "What do you think of him?" asked Brown. "I think," said Jones, "he did much better two years ago." "Why, he did not preach then," said Brown. "True," said Jones; "that is what I mean."

ANXIOUS friends were informed in the Times of January 22nd that "Mr. Spurgeon is compelled to prolong his absence at Mentone, but is full of confidence that he will soon be well." If this popular gentleman's "absence" is at Mentone, where may his presence be?

"Do you know why you and George remind me of two shades of one colour?" asked a young lady of a companion, who had been engaged for a good many years. "No," was the reply. "I'll tell you, then; it's because you don't match."

NEIGHBOURS are very considerate in Norway. When a baby is born, a placard is nailed up on the door informing the community of the fact. Those who wish to move out of the vicinity are thus enabled to do so in good season.

"You bachelors ought to be taxed," said Miss Lachford to a resolute evader of the noose matrimonial. "I agree with you perfectly, ma'am," was the reply, "for bachelorism certainly is a luxury."

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.

QUESTIONS.

LENA writes: "I should be much obliged if you could give me the verses of a poem called 'Sympathy.' The idea expressed therein is, a man and maid are both lost in a wood (I think); both have been crossed in love. Meeting each the other, they propose, 'for sympathy,' to drown together. Many other things they propose 'for sympathy,' each alternate verse ending with these words."

LONDON SPARROW wishes to know where he can find the quotation, "O Purblind Race of Miserable Men," and who is the author of it?

M. A. B.—Can anyone give this correspondent the name of a magazine published in November in which an account of the application of petroleum to fruit-trees was given?

O. E. W. will be glad to know if Thomas Hood's poem, "A Grave in the West," has been set to music; if so, by whom?

ANSWERS.

BUXTON.—"The Branks" was an instrument used for the punishment of scolds. It fitted over the head and locked behind; a tongue-piece projected, intended to enter the mouth to keep down the unruly member of the subject operated upon. The instrument, no doubt, was in general use throughout the country, and was known in Worcestershire as "The Cranks." Brand, in his "History," gives a portrait of a woman wearing it. In the Mayor's Room at Newcastle-upon-Tyne an ancient crank used to be exhibited for the edification of scolds, and his worship would, in the case of contending female witnesses, point significantly to the instrument.

C. A. C.—1. It was to the so-called "hot water cure" we referred in our answer to Elia, and not to the use of hot coffee, tea, or other such beverages as those which you name. Much difference of opinion exists as to the ultimate effect on delicate membranes of the continued use of hot water, that is, water at a temperature of 110° to 150° Fahr., and we adhere to our opinion that the "hot water cure" should only be tried under medical advice. 2. The word "calenture" is derived from the Latin calco, to be hot. It is a kind of delirious home sickness, well known to sailors, and is caused by exposure to the heat of the tropics. Swift says of these fancies in the following extract:

So by a calenture misled,
The mariner with rapture sees,
On the smooth ocean's azure bed,
Enamelled fields and verdant trees.
With eager haste he longs to rove
In that fantastic scene, and thinks
It must be some enchanted grove,
And in he leaps and down he sinks.

As regards our opinion of De Quincey's style, we can only say that it is masterly, but should not recommend his writings to any but persons of matured judgment. As we do not know which edition of De Quincey's works you have, we cannot tell if it contains all the autobiographical sketches. You may, however, judge for yourself, as these extend from 1790 to 1803. 3. Your father's opinion of your handwriting is too severe. Could you not try and improve your style by writing from good models?

COUNTRY COZ.—The stockingette bodices can be had at any of the large drapers' shops in London.

EAGER ENQUIRER.—1. Such light refreshment implies a standing supper, guests placed informally round a room, seated or not, as space and circumstance permit. If the dishes provided are numerous enough to arrange upon a centre table, plates laid all round facilitate the waiting; also allow gentlemen to attend to the wants of the ladies they take into the room. Should, however, the refreshment be merely for a few friends, a "tray supper," or upon a side table, the plates can be kept together close to the dishes. As dessert is the last stage of dinner, and guests are seated, there is but one arrangement possible—to place a plate before each person. 2. The young lady can write the invitation herself, introducing her mother's name in it, as hoping for the pleasure, etc., etc. Unless the friend invited be very juvenile, still in the schoolroom, the formality of the mothers addressing each other is quite unnecessary.

HELEN.—A paper on "China Painting," giving a few practical hints to beginners, appeared in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 5.

J. E. P.—Apply to Mr. G. Buck, mechanical tool maker, 242, Tottenham Court Road, who will sell you appliances for bevelling the edges of cardboard mounts.

LONDON SPARROW.—"John's British Birds in Their Haunts," 7s. 6d. (Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge).

MARIANNE X.—"Change" is by J. W. Doune, and is to be found in "Poetical Quotations," published by Groombridge:

In bower and garden rich and rare,
There's many a cherished flower,
Whose beauty fades, whose fragrance flits
Within the flitting hour.

Not so the simple forest leaf,
Unprized, unnoticed lying—
The same through all its little life—
It changes but in dying.

Be such, and only such, my friends;
Once mine, and mine for ever;
And here's a hand to clasp in theirs,
That shall desert them never.

And thou be such, my gentle love,
Time, chance, the world defying;
And take, 'tis all I have, a heart
That changes but in dying.

O. E. W.—"The Brave Young Comrade" is published in a book of Volkslieder, at Augener's, in Regent Street.

ONIONS.—According to the Act, Vic. 37 and 38, Sect. 8, "If any child shall have been registered, and within twelve months after such registration, have any additional or different name given to it in baptism, the parent or guardian or other person may deliver to the registrar or superintendent registrar, a certificate, in accordance with the Act, signed by the minister who baptised the child, and thereupon, on payment of an appointed fee of one shilling, the registrar or superintendent registrar, must add such baptismal names to the entry on the register, without any erasure, and certify accordingly to the Registrar General."

THALES.—1. Cribbage.—Too many or too few cards constitutes a misdeal, the penalty for which is taking two points by the non-dealer. Ecarté.—The dealer must give five cards to each, by three and two, and two and three at a time, which must not be changed during the game. An incorrect deal, playing out of turn, or a faced card, necessitates a fresh deal. 2. The published price of "Dickens's Dictionary of London" is 1s.

THE LASS HE LEFT BEHIND HIM.—"Black Watch," so called from the sombre colour of their tartan, to distinguish them from the regular troops, who were called the "Red Soldiers."

T. J. L.—Try hot soap and water with a little soda, but turpentine is best.

VERITAS.—If an oil-painting is of any value, it is always best to have it cleaned by a professional hand. The method of cleaning depends much upon the state of the picture, the varnish, etc. We hope shortly to give a paper with some general hints upon this subject.

W. McW.—Lena kindly writes that you will find "My First and Last Appearance on Any Stage" in "T Leaves," by Edward Turner; it can be copied in the Reading Room, British Museum.

ZODIAC.—As regards the Star of Bethlehem, the star that guided the wise men, it is a matter of history that about one hundred and twenty-five years before Christ a bright star appeared, and gradually increased in brilliancy, so as to be seen in the daytime, about the time of our Saviour; it gradually decreased in brightness and disappeared. It was the appearance of this star that induced Hipparchus to draw up his catalogue. It was situated in the constellation of Coma, or Koma, not far from Virgo. Its great peculiarity would be that its appearance had been predicted some fourteen hundred years before. From its position it would culminate, or be on the meridian, about twelve at night in the latitude of Jerusalem. It is a fact, independent of all hypotheses, that at the precise hour of midnight, when Christ was born, and Christianity appeared, the celestial sign which mounted above the horizon was Virgo. R. C. Trench speaks of this star "shining in calm and silent splendour, larger, lovelier, and brighter than any of the host of heaven."—R. C. Trench's "Star of the Wise Men."

Valentine's Day.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

It was on the 14th of February, 187—, a damp, soft day.

Along a country road, leading down a long, low hill, a young girl was making her way, rather hurriedly, lest she should be missed from home and asked where she had been; for this she particularly wished to keep to herself.

She was not half-way down the incline when she heard wheels behind, and in another minute a pony phaeton overtook her, and was pulled up alongside of the pathway, and a cheery young voice called out:

"Oh, Myra, I wanted to see you. Did you get many valentines this morning?"

Yes, Myra had got two.

"Only two! I've got quite a bundle of them, and I do want you to come and see them. Bring yours, and we'll compare notes about them. Mamma said if you would come to tea the boys would see you home. They're with us, you know, for two days' holiday—Jim and Arthur, I mean."

The speaker was a bright, merry girl of eighteen, rosy-cheeked, and rather pretty.

The pony she drove was fidgety, and the old lady beside her, who was her grandmother, got fidgety also, and was glad to second the invitation and receive an answer in the affirmative so that they might move on.

"Cecilia little knows how indifferent I am to valentines," thought Myra Conway, as she hurried on towards a stile which led into Oakdene Wood, and, crossing it, went on through the trees. There was no footpath, but she knew the way well.

The day was still; there was neither wind nor sun, but something in the air told of spring, some whisper of new life—a little, just a little freshness, mingling with the odour of last year's leaves as they lay thick and damp on the ground.

Overhead, rooks were consulting, and cawing, and fighting about sticks, and among the brushwood small birds were gathering in groups, and then scattering with a general twitter that seemed to say nest-keeping cares were at hand.

A few shy primrose-buds might have been found had Myra looked for them, but she hurried by, intent on reaching one particular spot.

It was where an old oak-tree grew, no grander than many of its fellows, but to Myra a very particular tree indeed. Its gnarled roots rose up around its trunk, as if it had stood there so long that the earth had decayed and shrunk down round them.

On these gnarled roots Myra took her stand, and clasping her arms round its mighty stem, she pressed her lips on some figures cut in the bark.

It was simply a date—February 14, 187—, no name or initials—nothing but the date, and it was of five years before.

Below it were three other dates following each other, being the dates of three successive years from that time on.

The date of the present year was wanting, and the girl, taking a penknife from her pocket, cut it in the bark, reached up again and kissed the topmost inscription, and then hurried away as she had come.

An hour afterwards she entered her father's study at Oakdene, where they lived, and said quietly:

"Father, will you be lonely if I go up to the Maitlands' this evening? Mrs. Maitland sent to ask me, and Jim and Arthur are at home, and will bring me back."

The gentleman she addressed was sitting writing at a table, where sheets of paper, more or less written on, lay thickly over books or whatever else may have been beneath them. The carpet round him, too, was littered over in the same way, although a waste-paper basket stood near.

Mr. Conway was a literary gentleman—at least he considered himself such. Any way he was always writing, and sometimes his productions were published. He had a good many peculiarities, and one of them was a habit of objecting to everything when first it was presented to him for approval.

Those who were used to him knew that he objected this way without ever considering why or wherefore. So they paid no respect to his utterances, and merely waited to see what was the best way of bringing him round to what they required, a little adroitness being all that generally was required.

"To the Maitlands' this evening? Weather like this! How can they think of it?"

"The evening will be quite mild, father, there is no prospect of rain, and the roads are very dry."

"Ah, roads indeed! If you had a carriage to go in now, it would be different. Mrs. Maitland never thinks of that, and she might know well enough how girls get cold going out in winter in evening-dress."

"There is no occasion for me to dress; they are alone."

"There it is! If they had any one worth meeting, their own neighbours would be forgotten. If they are quite alone, what does she want you for?"

"Cecilia has got such a number of beautiful valentines. She wants me to see them."

"Valentines! the very things I am writing about—to prove the mistaken, the wholly false ideas there are about valentines. I thought I should have had my essay ready for this evening's post, but it will be impossible, there are so many authorities to consult. Just sit down, my dear, for a few minutes until I read this to you. One can always judge of one's own composition best by reading it aloud, and I have no one now to listen to me."

He said this with a deep sigh, and Myra knew what he meant. She knew how patient and forbearing her dead mother had been with him, how she had listened to his wandering lucubrations about things she cared nothing for, and how she had never told him she was tired, or that she wanted to do something else; and Myra was fond of her father, and excused his teasing ways, as she thought of all the troubles he had gone through.

She sat down on a foot-stool beside him, and laid her head on his knee. She was very sad herself. Her afternoon walk had roused a great depth of painful feeling in her mind, and, like her father, she had no one to listen to her. Thought and emotion were all pent up within herself. Not for the world would she have suffered the faintest breath of the feelings she held so sacred to be exposed to the "idle questioning of idle tongues and eyes."

There was something restful in laying her head on her father's knee, and feeling his hand stroke her soft hair while he read:

"Antiquaries have an unthankful task to perform when, in the interest of truth, they endeavour to disabuse the public mind of errors, sentimental in their nature, and venerable from the length of time during which they have retained their hold. Not the less is it their duty, when searching into the records of the past, fearlessly to uproot those ideas the falsity of which imposes upon the present generation, while it misrepresents the past. Of these none are more flagrantly mistaken than the popular notion that Valentine's Day is a Christian festival, having any right whatever to be associated with the saint and martyr whose name has thus been wrongfully appropriated. That this holy man was beheaded at Rome on the 14th of February, A.D. 270, there is no doubt, and this because he assisted the Christian martyrs during the terrible persecution of Claudius; but it is absolutely impious to associate him with the feasts in honour of Pan and Juno, which were held during that same month—the Lupercalia, as they were called, when, amidst many heathenish ceremonies, the names of unmarried women were put into a box for men to draw out as chance directed. 'The heathen's superstitious custom,' this has been called by ancient writers, and from this has come our modern Lupercalia, with its amatory and anonymous correspondence, ornamented by artists and colour-printing, and—"

Here the dinner-bell, pretty loudly rung, made Myra start, and warned her father to wash the ink off his hands. He never excused anyone else if they kept dinner waiting, so he could not well do it himself, and he had to stop reading.

"What do you think of my article?" he demanded of Myra. "Of course, that is only the beginning. A biography of Bishop Valentine will be introduced."

"It's very clever, I'm sure, father, only I wish you had not told us Valentine's Day was heathenish; it seems to spoil it, and where will you get a biography of the old bishop?" To which question Mr. Conway, waving his hand majestically towards the table, replied, "he had his authorities."

The Maitlands were a large and prosperous family, who lived in a new, handsome house not far from Oakdene.

Mr. Maitland was a rich man according to the estimate of a neighbourhood where no modern millionaire had ever dazzled his fellow-creatures. He had inherited his income, and had never in any way earned money, or found it necessary to exert himself. He was very fond of personal ease and luxury, out of the midst of which, in an indolent kind of way, he found fault with people and things, this being indeed most of what he had to do.

It was a mild, dry evening, with good moonlight, when Myra Conway, with her father's old gardener for an escort, walked over from Oakdene, having previously arranged with the sister next to her to see after the younger children, and to take care that their father had his tea in proper time. For Myra was the female head of the family, their mother having died some time before.

Next to her in seniority was a brother whose course had been sad and disastrous. No one knew exactly where he was now, and that he might be permitted thus to bury himself in oblivion, Mr. Conway had undertaken responsibilities which were proving more than he had anticipated, or than he could meet without injuring the interests of his other children.

But perhaps he judged wisely in thinking he had not bought too dearly their exemption from the shadow that criminality when exposed seems ever to cast upon near relatives.

Besides this consideration there was another. He thought thus to save their mother's life; she was sinking under anxiety and dread, but when the worst was past she was unable to rally. The pressure upon the springs of life had been too heavy, and even in the rebound they broke.

Thus it will be seen that Myra Conway knew a good deal about the possibilities of life, besides what was connected with the inscription on the old oak-tree.

She was a slight girl of good height and graceful figure, with pretty features, pale, clear complexion, brown hair braided in a coil round the back of her head, and deep, calm, yet weary-looking grey eyes.

Her heavy crape-trimmed dress was this evening, for the first time, relieved by delicate tulle frillings, and amused by the merry chatter that went on round a table where Cecilia and two cousins who were staying with her had spread a shoal of valentines, some of this and some of other years, Myra's pale cheek had flushed, and Mrs. Maitland, as she watched her brightened face, thought to herself:

"How handsome that girl would be if she were only brought forward more."

Mr. Maitland, lolling on a soft, low couch, with a shaded lamp on a stand placed at exactly the right spot, was amusing himself with the illustrated papers.

"Here," he cried to his wife, who sat near with crewel-work in her fingers, "here's young Lawrence coming to the front, appointed interpreter to the Embassy to Burmah, and a whole heap here about him; accomplished linguist and so on. Here's a picture of the Embassy arriving on elephants; which of them is Lawrence, I wonder? The fellow in front, I suppose, going on first to speak. You remember him, don't you?" to his wife.

"Oh yes, certainly; Miss Harding's nephew."

"The old cat!" said Mr. Maitland, "she ought to have left him her money. County Hospital indeed!"

"It's very useful, though," said his wife.

"They are an extravagant set," replied he; "they raised every salary in the place as soon as they got her money, and I'm told they give the people forty-shilling port."

No one had observed that while this was passing Myra Conway had become like one who was going to faint.

Her head leaned heavily on her hand, as she strove to steady her elbow on the table, wondering whether she was falling off the chair, for she felt very like it. The remembrance that she never had fainted, even when passing through circumstances that might well have excused any girl for doing so, helped her to fight against the icy, pulseless feeling that was creeping over her, and she strove to maintain consciousness to hear what they were saying.

Through the singing in her ears came Mrs. Maitland's voice:

"Splendid, handsome young fellow he was; I always admired him."

"Too tall and lathy," replied her husband, who was himself short and broad.

"Oh," thought Myra, who was battling with the weakness that followed the agitation that had assailed her, "oh, if I could only see that paper!"

Before the evening was over she had recovered her habitual self-control, so as, without any apparent consciousness of too much interest, to lift the paper, look with outward calmness on the beloved name, and on the pictured procession, one of the figures in which was surely his, and read the words of eulogy that memory so quickly made her own, and laid up amongst her choicest treasures.

Miss Harding, whom Mr. Maitland had so irreverently termed "an old cat," had owned a nice property, that lay between the neighbourhood we have been telling of, and the not very distant county town. Reaching as it did to the suburbs of this town, it was of considerable value.

When she died it was then found that she had directed her whole estate to be sold, and the proceeds invested for the benefit of the County Hospital. Very great surprise was felt at this, as it was known that she had a widowed sister with a family by no means well provided for.

Miss Harding's entire property was at her own disposal, having been left to her unconditionally by a person who was a very distant connection.

The will under which it now passed to public purposes had been made soon after she became the owner, and had never afterwards been altered or added to.

That she had no ill-will to her sister's family was proved by her being accustomed very frequently to have some of them staying with her, more especially Archie, the eldest, on whose holidays and spare time she made such continual exactions that a considerable part of his early years had been passed with her.

The grounds of her residence adjoined the Oakdene Wood; naturally he was very much at Oakdene, and naturally—indeed, it was almost impossible it should have been otherwise—he fell in love with Myra Conway.

She was seventeen and he was twenty, when this fact became revealed to both of them.

Of course every sensible person will say: "Quite too soon for young people to think of anything of the kind." But, oh, the bliss of those delicious days—the vividness of the awakening to such intense delight!

It may be that with some it all fades away like morning's rosy hues, but there are others who never lose its glow, who hold by it as their very life, and live and die under its influence.

Whether this faithfulness to that which, as time goes on, sometimes becomes but an idea is suited to things as they are we do not say, but it exists, and Myra Conway could no more have taken back the love she had given than she could have changed her nature. Had he to whom she gave it proved unworthy, it would have ceased to exist. It could no more have been called forth by any other than the Dead Sea could teem with life.

CHAPTER II.

OUR lovers were simply and perfectly happy for a time, and then a great wrench came.

A friend of Mrs. Lawrence's was going to India to join a relative engaged in indigo-planting, and he offered to take her son Archie with him, and put him in the way of making a living. While his mother hesitated, his aunt, Miss Harding, urged him to go, and offered the first substantial assistance she ever had offered to her struggling sister.

It was to pay Archie's passage and all expenses of outfit. The young man himself hesitated. It seemed like parting with life to go away from Myra, but he could not go on for ever remaining at his aunt's, and roaming about Oakdene; and to get forward in some way, and make an income, was essential before he and Myra could be anything more than lovers.

His mother knew nothing of their attachment, and he thought his aunt did not either; but in this he was mistaken, and it was to break off the matter that she so urged his going to India.

Miss Harding had no dislike to Myra—no one could have had—but she possessed an undying hatred to her father, for she had once in a spiteful kind of way known something of love herself, the fact being that after her fashion she had loved him, and she believed that he had jilted her.

But people who remembered the facts of that period said it could not have been so, for the attentions were all on her own side, and apparently he never noticed them. Anyway, she hated him, and was determined that her nephew should not marry his daughter. As for the lovers themselves, when it was determined that Archie should go, the only consolation they could see lay in an engagement and the prospect of continual correspondence.

What was their consternation when on young Lawrence making known to Mr. Conway the state of feeling between himself and Myra, that gentleman, in the sternest and most uncompromising manner, forbade either the one or the other; and not only so, but severely reprimanded the young man for attracting his daughter's affections without the knowledge of her parents, and while she was at such an early age that it was impossible she could judge for herself; or know her own mind. All which would have been more applicable had her lover himself been a little older.

He could obtain no mercy whatever from Mr. Conway, no modification of the stern refusal to admit that he ought in any way to consider his pretensions or his feelings. As for his daughter, at her age—little more than a child—she would soon forget such folly. So he said, asserting, as we often do, what he knew nothing of.

The day before Archie Lawrence made his avowal to Mr. Conway, he and Myra, standing under the old oak-tree, had exchanged assurances of love and faithfulness for all mortal life and time; more than each might hear again from the other words that were so dear, than with any idea of creating additional security; for to them nothing on earth seemed more stable than their love.

It was Valentine's Day, and Archie cut the date upon the tree. In all the sanguineness of youth, he thought perhaps a year might pass before he could be there again, but as for any longer time—impossible.

He would work so hard, he would get on so fast. Besides, longer than that he could not exist in banishment from Myra. And then they talked romance about life in the glowing East, and so on. Of the two, this turn of mind belonged more to him than to Myra, and when he asked her, if he should not be home quite in time for next Valentine's Day, would she come to the tree, and cut another date? she said, "Yes, and every Valentine's Day until he came."

Her lover looked at her reproachfully for such an implied suggestion. The possibility seemed not to have occurred to him.

On the very next day they parted under that same tree, with the parental ban on all and everything except this one farewell.

Mr. Conway's edicts in his own family were never disregarded. A pope's interdict, a law of the Medes and Persians, were not, in their different spheres, more effectual. Myra had no resource but to obey. Her nature would have revolted from any deceptive course, even had her lover proposed it.

No letter was to pass between them, no engagement to exist. Ah, but it did exist, and neither her father nor they could undo it—not now, at least.

It might in time rust through, if the magnetic influence of any intercourse whatever were still to be withdrawn; but as to snapping in a moment these first bright links of youthful faith and love—Mr. Conway was talking nonsense, as, indeed, he often did.

Early in the first winter after young Lawrence left, Miss Harding died.

When the contents of her will became known, people said she had treated her nephew very badly, after always leading him to suppose he was her heir. At the same time, this "leading" consisted chiefly in continually urging him to stay with her, and perhaps she might have intended at some time to make a different arrangement of her property, for she never thought of dying so suddenly, and might reasonably have expected some years of life to be still before her.

Had her nephew also been dead, Myra would have heard as much about him. No sign came from him, but this was as Mr. Conway had said it must be.

It was a lonely shrine before which Myra's memory and love still burned a hidden lamp.

This parting with her lover seemed to make the first great chasm in the peace and happiness which had hitherto marked her life. Her childhood and early youth had been passed in a pretty country home, among brothers and sisters, with an indulgent but sensible mother, whose gentle management rendered the petty tyranny of the father of the family of less account than it would otherwise have been.

And yet with all this Mr. Conway was an affectionate man, and his children knew this, nor during their childhood was there much opportunity for too hard a pressure from his unbending opinions. It was as they emerged from childhood into the years when, being old enough in some measure to judge between good and evil, the responsibility arose that none can resist who understand the bent of their own actions; it was then that Mr. Conway went astray, in thinking that the mere assertion of his will should be sufficient to change the tastes and wishes of those who were fast advancing to manhood and womanhood.

It was thus that he could not be held altogether blameless with regard to the misfortunes that his eldest son had brought upon them, after being forced by his father into a position that was repugnant to him.

The lad was clever, and wanted to go to college and be a barrister. His father had taken up a notion that there is nothing like business, no way by which a man will so soon be independent and ultimately so rich, and he applied to an old friend who had become a successful merchant, hoping to place his son in this gentleman's office.

But the friend could not at that time take him. Such openings were eagerly sought for, and all he would have for two or three years were promised. In the meantime, Mr. Conway, by way of preparing his son for his turn when it should come, placed him in a bank, and himself gave the requisite security.

A year after this the merchant died, his business passed to a brother with a number of sons, and young Conway's chance in that direction was gone. "Chained for life to a desk in a bank, at a starvation salary," was his description of his position, and sullenly and angrily he listened to an acquaintance who showed him what he called "a royal road to fortune."

There were pitfalls in this road, however; fortune, like the luminous vapour passing over a marsh, was always just on before, but near—very near; only to catch her she must be bribed by gold, and Conway's friend alternately jeered and importuned him on the subject of this gold, which it would be so easy for one in his position to borrow for a little, and then pay back again, after it had multiplied itself many times in their hands.

There was no crime in this, he argued, when Conway, the son of an honest gentleman, and brought up to be one himself, hesitated and drew back. The other knew his man. Had he been met by the indignant, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this?" he would have backed out as if he had been jesting; but he understood the wavering resolution that, like the lightly scorched moth, played over the flame until it fell into it.

Conway made a clumsy business of what he had to do. He was never meant for such work, and his associate got off safely with the spoil, while he was left ruined.

The word does not express what it was, for ruin may mean only loss, and he was disgraced.

No need to describe the subsequent scene at Oakdene. Myra alone shared it with her parents. Her mother would have died if she had had none but her husband to speak to of what had happened, for he in bitterest wrath poured blame upon their son, and she could have blamed him.

But she did not do this, she did better. She herself went to those in authority who had been wronged, and so worked upon their compassion that they gave up the necessity of "making an example," and consented to let the culprit escape by a bridge of gold, which his father was to build.

This implied making good the forfeited security, as well as all other loss, and, the Conways not being rich, the sacrifice to them was very great.

It is not always at first that a pecuniary loss makes itself felt. In this case some time was given for arranging matters, and the cramping and drying up of old resources was gradual, but it ended in the loss of Oakdene.

Mr. Conway foresaw this before his wife died, but latterly he concealed from her the great difficulty he experienced in making the payments to which he was pledged.

Carriage and horses had been given up, and the number of servants reduced, but Mrs. Conway passed away without knowing that the old home would be lost, and her children be taken to a small house in a London suburb, the education of the younger ones to be carried on at the neighbouring day-schools, and the elder to be shut out by narrower means from the society in which their place would rightfully have been found.

When Myra returned from the Maitlands' on the evening of which we have told, she went at once to her father's study, thinking to wish him good-night, and then escape to the solitude that would so relieve her excited and overcharged feelings.

"Father," she said, going up beside him and softly laying her cheek against his, "won't you stop writing now? It is time we were all asleep. Have you not finished the poor old bishop yet?"

Mr. Conway took off his glasses, rubbed his eyes, and said:

"I have been wanting you this long time, Myra. Finished the bishop! I have only begun him. But I have finished the most complete proof that he had nothing to do with the 14th of February, and that the observances belonging to what is ignorantly called Valentine's Day are thoroughly heathenish."

Myra thought of the dates on the oak-tree and held her peace while he continued:

"I shall send my paper on the subject to the Antiquarian Review. I'd like you to hear this part of it; and she sat down patiently while he read. "Now," said he triumphantly, as he laid down the manuscript, "that ought to convince people—eh?"

Myra said she supposed it ought.

"The surest test in a matter like this," he continued, "is one's own conviction. Don't you see the heathenism of the thing? Why, it is absolutely keeping up Paganism in the land—Pan and Juno!"

Myra could stand it no longer.

"Will you excuse me, father?" she said. "I am quite stupid with being up so late. It will all be plainer to me to-morrow. I must say good-night."

But the subject was not renewed on the morrow, for the morning post brought letters to Mr. Conway relating to the liabilities which still lay upon him on his son's account, and made it but too plain to him that he could no longer avoid parting with Oakdene.

By May Day he and his family were cramped up in a high narrow house in Camberwell, and feeling as if they were in a prison.

For some time after the memorable evening when Myra had so unexpectedly heard of her lover she lived in continual expectation of some communication from him.

Never for a moment had she doubted his parting assurance that, as soon as he had made a position for himself, he would break through the silence that her father had so rigidly commanded, and assert his right to claim her hand. Yet year after year had passed without her even knowing whether he still lived. Year after year she inscribed on the old oak-tree the date that he thought would be cut but once before he returned, yet her faith in his love never failed or wavered.

But, oh, the heart-sickness of long-deferred hope—the weary waiting, the disappointment that seemed each day heavier, and its pressure sorer, since that chance news of his advancement! And it was all the harder to bear when cut off from every place that had been associated with that old happy time, the remembrance of which was so vivid among the scenes where their love had begun and grown.

The first dull season in London had passed, the first winter was almost gone, when Mrs. Maitland, being in town, urged Myra to return with her for a few weeks, and while she hesitated about leaving home, where she seemed to be indispensable, Mrs. Maitland attacked her father on the subject and fairly overpowered him into consent before he had time to raise objections.

Any one might have seen, as Mrs. Maitland did, that Myra's pale, fair cheek was absolutely colourless, and that there was pain in the wistful, weary look of her deep grey eyes. But no one observed these things, nor the gradual change that such signs told of. Her younger sisters were too inexperienced to note it, and her father, who spent most of his time in the reading-room of the Museum, too pre-occupied.

One reason known only to herself rendered Myra more ready than she might otherwise have been to accept Mrs. Maitland's invitation, for blank consternation was expressed in the household as to how its routine was to revolve correctly when the central pivot was gone.

But Myra had a tryst to keep in Oakdene Wood. A year had almost passed since last she had stood beneath the old tree and made another entry in the register of love and truth that it recorded.

Lately she had often pondered, but in vain, on how the next record was to be made, for, Pan and Juno notwithstanding, the day called Valentine's was close at hand, and the suppressed eagerness with which, when her father's consent was gained, she arranged to accompany Mrs. Maitland, was taken by that lady as a personal compliment.

For some days she avoided going near Oakdene. It was inexpressibly painful to her even to speak of the dear old home now passed to strangers, and when she did so, she heard that the new owners were gone for some months to France. There would, therefore, be no difficulty in making her way to the wood unseen and unnoticed, provided only that she could go unaccompanied by any of the young Maitlands.

The morning post on the 14th was eagerly watched for by them, and great was the fun and laughter as they carried in their numerous valentines, the largest number of which were for Cecilia, the eldest girl and the prettiest.

Under cover of going to see the old man who had been her father's gardener, Myra managed to leave the house alone during the forenoon, and the position of old Job's cottage rendered it easy to go thence by a quiet pathway to the wood.

The spring was late that year; there were no primrose-buds, or early nesting birds; but long, though not heavy frost; and this day, as Myra turned into the wood, every familiar tree, every climbing ivy and trailing bramble, stood out in all the purity of frosted silver.

The thin coat of frozen snow on the ground cracked lightly as she passed along, and the low, chill wind whispering through the leafless wood had a weird, unearthly sound.

The intense loneliness gave Myra almost a feeling of awe. Not a bird passed by, nor a scudding rabbit; not a sound was heard, unless when some lifeless branch gave way under its load of frosted snow, and, as it cracked in that thin, still air, sounded like a shot.

There are times when we seem intensely alive to impressions; when every sense is quickened, and we feel as if on the verge of some new and untrod experience.

At such times the past is very vivid, and like a flood its memories and recollections sweep in upon us.

It was so with Myra now.

Reaching the great oak-tree, and stepping on to its high roots, she looked round on the chill, lonely scene, and then up to the figures cut in the rugged bark that told such a tale of tender and lovely faith.

Suddenly a great rush of feeling came over her; the memory of the past happy time that seemed as far back as if belonging to some other life—the silent loneliness in which she still maintained her love, the future's blank uncertainty—it was all too much. For once she let feeling have its way. There were none to see or know, and she yielded to the pent-up emotion that was making every pulse throb with pain, and, flinging her arms round the mighty trunk, she laid her face against it and wept.

Through the wood, by a direction different to that by which Myra had come, a figure was approaching, passing swiftly among the snowy trees, treading fast and firm on the frozen way.

As he came near the oak-tree—for the figure was that of a man—he slackened his pace, attracted probably by the singularity of seeing a lady standing leaning against the tree with her face turned to it.

But though the man slackened his pace, and seemed as if treading softly, he still went on, until he paused a few paces from the oak-tree, and stood there.

Not long, for Myra turned round.

Why, at that instant, she could not have told, but she turned with a consciousness that some one was near.

As she did so, her hat, loosened by the way her head had been resting, fell off. The stranger sprang forward as if to lift it for her, but before she had time to be alarmed by thus suddenly finding that she was not alone, their eyes had met. Her lips parted as though to utter a cry, but no sound came, and in another minute she would have fallen, but the strong arms of her lover were around her, and his passionate kisses on her lips and brow brought back from unconsciousness the spirit that had bravely borne long years of sorrow, and failed only under this sudden and overpowering joy.

The date of another Valentine's Day was cut on the tree that day by the same firm hand that had traced the first six years before—nearly as long a time as the old patriarch served for his beautiful Rebecca.

"I may go with you to the Maitlands', may I not?" said Archie Lawrence as they left the wood. "They will let me in for an hour, I think. I used to know them a little."

Myra assured him he would be made very welcome, "and," she said, "I think I will just tell Mrs. Maitland all about it."

Poor Myra felt then the loss of her own mother, but Mrs. Maitland was a true-hearted woman, and Myra was right in trusting her.

The secret of the success that had justified Archie Lawrence in thus returning to claim his love lay in a natural aptitude for acquiring languages, and an untiring industry in using that aptitude.

The work he had engaged in on first going out had left him some leisure, and though without seeing in what manner such knowledge would be of service to him, he at once began to learn some of the principal dialects of India, feeling sure that their attainment would not be always valueless.

This story is of some years ago. Probably, if an embassy to Burmah were starting now, there would be more applicants for the post of interpreter than could then prove their fitness. Anyway, Mr. Lawrence's qualifications procured him the place, and though its advantages did not last long, it brought him into notice at headquarters, and led to his obtaining a permanent and well-paid secretaryship.

As soon as possible he obtained a short leave of absence, and hastened to England to seek tidings of Myra, of whom, during the past six years, he had heard no more than she had heard of him. Since Miss Harding's death, his mother, who lived in the extreme north of Scotland, had no connection whatever with the neighbourhood of Oakdene, so that in letters from her or his sisters, the Conways were never named, nor did they know that Archie had any particular interest in hearing of them.

On reaching England he at once made his way to the neighbourhood of Oakdene, which place he found had been sold by Mr. Conway under painful circumstances, believed to be connected with his son; but though there were several conjectural accounts of the matter still in circulation, the real facts were well concealed. One thing was certain, the Conways lived in London, and old Job, who used to be their gardener, could give their address.

Before starting for London in search of them, Lawrence set out for Oakdene Wood, to see whether the old tree bore any record that in silent eloquence would mark the endurance of a love lasting as his own.

In what a sudden revelation that knowledge came to him has been told. All this and more he related to Myra as they sat in Mrs. Maitland's little boudoir, where she had installed them until dinner-time.

"And now, dear love," said he, "I see by your pale cheek, and by this," as he fondly stroked her thin hand, "that it has all been rather too much for you, but the long trial is over. Your father, I feel sure, will be reasonable now. Won't you be happy and grow strong?" and Myra promised that she would.

By the night mail he went to seek Mr. Conway, and to show him, among other things, how Valentine's Day had been turned to account.

Myra's marriage was hurried on so that there might be a little time to go to Scotland and stay with Archie's mother, and his leave was short.

They were married in a little ivy-covered church down in a Kentish village, and Cecilia Maitland being bridesmaid, met her fate in the person of Mr. Lawrence's best man, an officer home on leave from his regiment, and before the year was out she followed her friend across the Indian Ocean.

Mr. Conway never succeeded in upsetting Bishop Valentine as the author and patron of the observances that bear his name.

Probably those who read his article in the Antiquarian Review knew more about the good bishop than they had ever done before, but as to dating back to Pan or Juno, or any other deified myths, the observances of the bishop's day, and forsaking them on the ground of Paganism, Young England would in no way agree to it.

Leave us, oh, ye antiquaries and men of science, leave us some at least of our time-worn legends! A flaw in their origin does not matter. We want something more to help us along besides downright material reality. Like the little children we want something to amuse us.

Men and women will not do their daily duty any the less, and they will sympathise with young life a great deal more, if they themselves have joined in, and can still be amused by the time-honoured celebration of Valentine's Day.

A Broken Vow.

I VOWED I would not love thee,
Oh, fickle maiden mine!
Nor ever more trust eyes of blue,
Or rosy lips; alike untrue,
As that sweet face of thine.
I vowed, and in an agony,
I turned away from sight of thee.
I vowed that I would hate thee,
With hatred deep and high;
A hatred time should never fade,
And so to hate each fickle maid
Aneath yon fickle sky;
I vowed with fierce hot words of pain—
I vowed—alas! I vowed in vain!

Book III.

CHAPTER. I. JACK'S MAP.

It was full summer.

The days had been long and sultry, and the earth looked parched from long drought. The corn was ripe for the harvest, and the hedges were scarlet with poppies. Everywhere an intense heat and cloudless radiance brooded in settled calm, making the toilers in the fields long for cool breezes or heavy rain-clouds.

In the heart of a little wood where the last lingering rays of light slanted through the fir-boughs, three children were sitting in the enjoyment of truant liberty. Before them was spread a feast of dainties—cakes, toffee, pears, tarts—all those sticky and unwholesome specimens of confectionery in which the juvenile mind delights.

Through an opening here and there a glimpse of the sea could be caught, and a sense of coolness seemed to shut itself in with the shading boughs and drooping branches.

"This is first-rate," said the eldest of the group, a sallow-faced, large-headed boy—no other, in fact, than the heir and hope of the Crumpletons before mentioned. "Guess old Creeps will be looking out for us considerable before she finds us this time."

The heir and hope, it must be observed, had picked up a number of phrases and expressions from an American youth of great precocity and piratical tendencies, who had been an inmate of Miss Crawley's select establishment for the brief space of one term; after that he had been summarily expelled, having contrived with untiring perseverance to be in mischief during every hour of his stay, and to make the lives of all the inmates of the aforesaid establishment one perpetual misery and martyrdom. This youth, known to the boys as "Yankee Doodle," had been the bosom-friend of the heir and hope, consequently that interesting youth looked upon it as a point of honour to emulate his fidus Achates, as much as some small natural drawbacks in the shape of inherent cowardice and meanness would permit. His favourite occupation was to plan various schemes and projects, all more or less harmful to anyone but himself, and the bold, fearless nature of Cyril Marsden served him as a capital scapegoat for his own innocent inventions.

"Well, you needn't collar all the jam-tarts," said Cyril, perceiving that in his elation at cheating the vigilance of his venerable preceptress, the heir and hope was unconsciously taking possession of the larger portion of the feast. "Leave some for Jack and me."

"Don't you be so skeered," said the interesting youth; "I ain't goin' to eat 'em all. Besides, my money bought 'em as well as yours."

Rules of grammar being somewhat rigidly enforced upon the juvenile minds at the establishment, it became a point of honour with them to set all such rules at defiance on every possible opportunity. Young Crumpleton was especially successful in this noble insubordination.

His American friend had once observed to him in a moment of enthusiasm:

"Lord, major, how darned easy it does come to you to be vulgar!"

The major—so called from a habit of constantly introducing his father's name in boastful attempts to assert his own superiority of birth and breeding—had accepted the compliment with becoming modesty, and naturally felt impressed with the necessity of continuing to merit it.

"I don't like jam-tarts," said little Jack, who after a year at school had dropped many of his babyish expressions; "they's so greasy and sticky. I like fruits better."

"Yes, but you're not going to have all those pears," cried the major, making a hurried grab at the three pears piled on the leaf of an exercise-book by way of dessert-dish.

"You leave those alone," cried Cyril emphatically. "They're Jack's. He bought them with his own money. You stick to your stale old jam-tarts. You only got those because they were a penny; and the pears were twopence."

"You said we'd share all the things," remonstrated the major sulkily.

"Very well, so we will. Jack can have two pears. I don't want any; and there's one for you."

The major caught it eagerly as it was tossed contemptuously across to him, and the three boys set to work at their feast, and brewed a bottle of sherbet as a drink, and poured that delectable beverage into a cracked wineglass, which was handed from one to the other, and felt very hilarious indeed. Jack, as usual, crept close to his brother. Since that awful blank time when he had been torn, sobbing heartbrokenly, from "mummy's" arms, the little fellow had turned to his brother with a double share of love and devotion. Something he must have to love and cling to. It was his nature, and he could not resist it. So, finding that no fretting and no tears could bring "mummy" back, he at last listened to Cyril's consolations, and tried to believe that if he only ceased to cry, and tried to grow big, and strong, and clever, he would be able to join her; and then—happy then!—there would be no more partings for either.

"Wonder what old Creeps"—short for Crawley among the boys—"will say, when she finds we've not been home to tea," said the major presently, his voice somewhat indistinct from the amount of crust stuffed into his mouth. "Guess she'll talk some when we go back. I wish Doodle was here. He was a chap for larks," he continued admiringly. "D'you remember the day he dressed up and came and knocked at the front door and pretended to be his own brother just arrived from New York, and how old Creeps believed it, 'cos he'd got a moustache and a high hat, and such a fine stick. My! and then she sent up for Master Cornelius Doodle, and he wasn't to be found, and all the time Yankee sat there as grave as anything, and said he feared his brother was not all he should be, and that it grieved him deeply to hear such accounts of him, and how he'd talk to him very seriously when he saw him, and, oh, stuffed her up no end. And she sitting there with her best cap on, and her Sunday fixings, and never dreaming that it was Yankee himself. And then when she wrote to his father and said how charmed she had been to make the acquaintance of his elder son, and what a gentlemanly, pleasant young fellow he was, and she only wished Cornelius resembled him. Then didn't she cut up rough when the old Doodle writes back, and says is she dreaming? He ain't got no son but one, and that's his eldest, and he's with her at the present time. Guess it wasn't long after that she told him she'd about had enough of his only eldest son, and so Yankee had just to cut his stick and walk. Oh, wasn't he a jolly chap just?"

"Don't think so; him wasn't at all nice," said little Jack, his memory still smarting with the recollection of many severely practical jokes played upon him by the irrepressible Doodle. "Very glad him's gone."

"Ugh, you baby!" sneered the major. "You haven't no call to be at school at all. Guess you'd like to be tied to your mammy's apron-strings as you used to cry for."

"Let him alone," said Cyril authoritatively, with a look at the little flushed face. "I've told you before I won't have him teased. If he is a baby, so much the more shame for you to torment him."

"And mummy's got no apron-strings," said little Jack. "You don't know nuffin about her."

"Don't want to," said the major curtly. "My mother's enough to be a caution to any fellow. 'Spect they're all pretty much alike. Doodle said so."

"Doodle didn't know my mother," said Jack with dignity, and thinking he had at last succeeded in dropping the familiar "mummy." "There's no other like her, not in all the world."

"Oh, bother!" said the major impatiently. "Don't let's talk about mothers. I say, Cyrrie, old fellow, I do wish you'd do me a kindness. You easily might if you only would."

"What is it?" asked Cyril curiously; the humble tone of the suppliant was not novel, but the idea of begging a "kindness" was.

"Well, when that soldier chap comes to fetch you for the holidays this time, do ask him to let you bring me too. It is so beastly, stuck here all the year round."

"Don't think Cap'n Grant likes you," said Jack, who did not relish the proposal. "Says you're not a dood companion for Cyrrie or me."

"Then you've been sneaking on me!" cried the major indignantly. "Not good enough for Cyrrie! Bah! Cyrrie ain't no better than I am."

"It doesn't matter," said Cyril quietly. "I won't ask Captain Grant any such thing. We see quite enough of each other at school."

"Oh, all right," said the major sulkily, as he tipped the last of the sherbet into the cracked and stemless glass. "It's horrid mean of you, and you call yourself my friend."

"I don't," said Cyril, with that ingenuous frankness peculiar to the mind of early youth. "You call yourself mine when you want to get anything out of me."

"Ah," sighed the major, contemplating a jam-tart with affectionate enthusiasm. "If only Doodle was here!"

He felt himself wronged and snubbed, and at such times was particularly faithful to the memory of his absent friend.

"You were always quarrelling with him when he was," said Cyril, rising and sauntering off to that open space between the straight stems and drooping boughs, which showed the sea lying in smooth unrippled beauty far below the cliffs of the little headland. Jack followed. The major lingered behind, to gloat over the feast and carefully gather up the fragments.

"Wish him hadn't come," said little Jack, linking his hand in his brother's. "Him's very disgeaceable. I like best to be with you alone, Cyrrie."

They were standing almost on the edge of the shelving cliffs, and their eyes watched thoughtfully the white sails which here and there dotted the mirror-like surface of the sea.

"If one was mummy's ship," sighed little Jack, blissfully and geographically ignorant of the fact that no Indian vessel could possibly pass that coast. "Why," he continued, "we might stand here, and she might stand on the deck, and we should see each other quite well—couldn't we, Cyrrie?"

"I don't know," said his brother, laying sudden hands on the little holland coat, as Jack leant forwards. "Perhaps; only I don't think the ships come this way. It's Southampton or Liverpool. Now don't go so near the edge. Remember that time I found you, and Tommy, and Crumpleton, and the Doodle, all trying who could lean over the farthest. I wonder you didn't go clean down the cliffs into the sea."

"Was you frightened?" asked Jack, lifting a little solemn face from that rapt contemplation of the distant sails. "I hanged over a very far away—didn't I?"

"I should think you did. Just fancy what mother would have said, and she told me to take such care of you!"

"Is it a very many years since mummy went away?" asked little Jack. "Seems such a long, long time."

"Only one year," said Cyril. "Don't you remember it was last summer? and now it's summer again."

"And when it's another summer will she come back?" asked the little fellow eagerly.

"Her letters don't say anything about coming back," said Cyril gravely, "only that we're to be very good, and learn all we can, and do everything to please old Creeps. I wish," with a sudden burst of indignation, "she knew what an old beast she was."

"She gives me such hard lessons," sighed little Jack. "I couldn't learn them if you didn't help me, Cyrrie, and my head aches and aches. I'm sure mummy would be very sorry if she knew how it aches."

His brother looked at him anxiously.

"Does it ache now?" he said.

"Oh no," said Jack, "not in these nice cool woods; but it would if I'd been kep' in again, and Miss Cawley said I was to stop in till I 'membered my tables."

"Can you say them to me now?" asked Cyril.

"No; I'se too tired," said the little fellow, seating himself on the ground. "P'ease don't want me to say nanything; I want to think of mummy."

Cyril looked at him silently, wondering if his mother would see any change in the little face, were she here now—if it was only his fancy that it had grown so pale and wistful of late; taxing his memory to discover if he had in any way neglected the precious charge laid upon his shoulders, if he had failed to be his brother's champion, to protect him from rough handling, unkindness, ridicule, such as he himself had experienced.

The lessons, too; how often he had given up his own play-time to help his little brother, to coax him into a comprehension of letters and syllables, such as Miss Crawley's voice usually frightened out of his head!

Cyril himself had little trouble in learning. He was naturally quick and intelligent, and possessed of a wonderful memory. His thoughts were cut short by Jack himself looking suddenly up, and exclaiming eagerly:

"Cyrrie, I've done my map. I'll show it you when we goes home."

"Map?" said his brother vaguely. "Did she give you a map to do? What nonsense! You can't even understand it."

"Yes, I can," said little Jack wisely; "I've drawn it through tracing-paper, like the major says Doodle always did his. Then I've written all the names—there's Yarmouth at one end, and Edinburgh, and Woodford, and—India!"

The burst of triumph which concluded the crowning achievement of that list of names was wonderful. Cyril was dumfounded.

"Then I drew mummy in India," continued little Jack, "and put a big sun over her head, 'cos I 'membered it's very hot there. Do you think," he added anxiously, "Miss Crawley will be p'leased wid my map?"

"Here, you two fellows!" said a voice in the rear. "Guess this picnic's rather slow. Let's go home."

"You go home by yourself," said Jack with dignity. "I'se going to sit here and think."

CHAPTER II. WHAT CAME OF THE "BUNNIES."

"SAY, Jack," whispered the major mysteriously as he came up to the little fellow some two or three days after the picnic, "I'll tell you an awful lark. Have you got any money, though?"

"Yes," said Jack wonderingly; "but Cyrrie said I wasn't to give you no more."

"I don't want it," said the major contemptuously; "don't you be so jolly skeered. I was only going to tell you something. However," he added with dignity, "it's of no consequence. I know someone who'll be glad enough to have the chance."

"What is it?" asked Jack, looking up with solemn, wondering eyes.

"There's a boy in the village," continued the major, "who's got two lovely little rabbits, one white and one speckled, such long ears, my! and he wants to sell 'em. Dirt cheap, too. One and sixpence the pair. Now if we went halves, you know, I'd manage it, and get a hutch thrown in too. I know you've got heaps of money in your money-box."

Jack hesitated.

"But Miss Cawley," he said. "I've got Fuff, but she won't let me have wabbits, I'm sure, 'cos mummy's not here to ask her."

"Pooh! Old Creeps needn't know," cried the major; "we'll keep the hutch in that broken-down old summer-house at the end of the garden. No one ever goes there. Come, you get the money, and we'll go down this afternoon, after school, and bring 'em back with us. Will you? You know how you've always wanted some."

"I'd like to," said little Jack thoughtfully, "only Cyrrie—"

"Oh, bother Cyrrie!" interrupted the other. "You needn't say anything to him. You mustn't be such a baby. Say you'll come with me after school's over. Such beauties, Jack! Lop-eared, real prime ones. My, if you only saw them!"

"I'll come," said little Jack decidedly; "but why did Miss Cawley say none of us was to go in the village?"

"Oh, she's got some fad in her old head. Something about illness," said the major hurriedly; "that's nothing. So you'll come?"

Jack nodded. He felt a little uncomfortable. He did not like to have a secret from Cyril, or to share any of the major's escapades, but the temptation of seeing and possessing the "lop-eared ones" was altogether too strong to be resisted.

He went to the little dormitory that he shared with Cyril, and took out his money-box, then extracted the necessary shilling—the major had suggested he might as well contribute that amount, it being difficult to cut it into ninepence—by a process into which the heir and hope had once initiated him. Fluff crept out of his basket and danced about his little master with wild delight and frenzied barks.

He had not grown any bigger, and looked more like a black toy-lamb with bright beads of eyes than anything else. Jack dropped the money-box and got down on the floor to hug his favourite and talk to him, being fully convinced that Fluff understood every word he said.

With that old-fashioned thoughtfulness of his, he had seen that it troubled Cyril greatly when he confessed how tired he was of the long tasks and the close confinement to the schoolroom, made even longer by that system of "keeping in" which Miss Crawley considered an essential part of the discipline of the establishment. In this one year the poor little fellow's head had been crammed till he wondered sometimes if it could possibly hold any more.

Miss Crawley had taken it into her own head that he was backward and too fond of idleness. Certainly Jack was far from quick at acquiring knowledge, being given to digging below the surface and seeking out the why and wherefore of all he was told, instead of contenting himself with a superficial repetition of it.

Even Cyril grew a little impatient of the slow, curious, plodding manner in which he set to work at his tasks, and felt that, after all, Miss Crawley was not far wrong when she declared him stupid. It seemed so easy to him to learn that he could not understand why Jack found it difficult, and the very patience and quietude of the little fellow made him the more difficult to comprehend.

He rarely complained or cried, and when punished he only set to work with the same gentle, plodding perseverance to get through this labyrinth of learning which opposed itself like a maze to the efforts of his childish brain.

Perhaps it was as well "mummy" could not see him at such times—as well she could not see him now as he sat on the bare floor of his little room with the dog clasped in his arms and the money-box lying forgotten by his side.

"I wonder if mummy would say I was naughty?" he said with a sudden pang of compunction. "I don't like to ask Cyrie. Besides, he's gone to play cricket now."

A long, thoughtful pause followed these words. The little dog curled itself up in his arms and prepared for a nap. Jack's eyes sought the window, with its glimpse of blue sky and waving trees, and his thoughts travelled far away into a maze of odd, unchildlike fancies which he could not have told to anyone—which he hardly understood himself.

At last he took up the shilling, replaced the box, and carefully closing the door on Fluff, went down on his errand.

The major met him at the foot of the stairs. He took Jack's hand and they walked slowly and silently along the hot, shadeless road leading to the village. It was a good mile and a half from the establishment, and but for the thought of those wonderful lop-eared rabbits, Jack would have given way under a sense of weariness and fatigue. There was not a breath of air, the sky was like a furnace, and the dust was suffocating; still he trudged patiently on, buoyed up by the hope that every step brought him nearer his destination, and that he would soon be the proud possessor of some more live-stock.

They reached the village at last; a narrow, straggling little place with one good street and a few dirty, bad ones. It was to one of these latter that the major took his way, stopping at last before a low, thatched cottage, at the door of which an old woman sat, very ugly, very dirty, very poorly dressed, with a toothless mouth that continually mumbled and muttered, as if worked by some hidden machinery which had been set in motion and never turned off.

Before this delectable individual the major paused.

"Is Tom at home?" he enquired.

The question, and the effort to answer it, set the machinery at work so dreadfully that little Jack shrank away in terror from the mouthing old crone.

The major having apparently extracted the desired knowledge, bade Jack follow him, and the two entered a dark, low room with very little furniture and still less air, and, when their eyes grew accustomed to the gloom, saw a half-broken truckle-bed by the fireplace, on which lay a lad of some twelve or thirteen years, and standing by the fire, a shabby, tattered-looking girl with rough, unkempt hair, and a face of bovine stupidity.

"Why, Tom, are you ill?" asked the major. "I've come for the rabbits."

"Nell will give 'em ye," said the lad in a thick hoarse voice. "Yes, I've got a touch of the fever. I feel mortal bad, and gran's been talking about having the doctor chap to see me, but I 'spose she's forgotten."

"Where's the rabbits?" asked the major, turning hastily to the girl.

She made a sign to him to follow her, but Jack crept up to the miserable bed, and looked with wistful eyes at the sufferer.

"Are you very ill?" he asked in his odd, old-fashioned way. "Does anything hurt you?"

The lad looked at him with his burning eyes, and Jack wondered why those strange, scarlet patches were on his face, and why his lips looked so black and parched.

"I'm very thirsty," he answered, wondering who was this strange little being with the wistful eyes and compassionate face.

"I'll get you some water," said Jack, looking round.

"It's all so hot," the lad answered. "They can't keep it cool, they say. And it's so hot here," he added drearily. "Oh, for some air!"

"Here's the water," said Jack, bringing a broken pitcher to the bedside. "Shall I give it you?"

"You be a funny little chap," said the sick youth, looking at him wonderingly. "Why don't you go and see the rabbits like t'other one? He don't trouble hisself 'bout me, he don't."

He sipped some of the lukewarm beverage with evident distaste, then fell back on the apology for a pillow—an old bundle of rags—and gave a groan.

"I'm very sorry for you," said little Jack pityingly. "Why hasn't you a nice comfortable bed like me?"

"Why?" echoed the boy forlornly. "Well, 'cos it's one thing to be rich and t'other to be poor—that's why."

"I will give you all the money in my money-box," said little Jack. "There's a lot, 'cos it's very heavy. Will you get well then?"

"I don't know," said the boy wearily, "and don't care much, neither. There ain't nothing to live for when one's poor and miserable."

"Haven't you no mummy?" asked the little questioner; "no one to take care of you?"

"No," was the answer. "Mother died when Nell was a baby, and father he went to Ameriky long ago. There's only gran, and she's so old."

"Is she a hundred million years?" asked Jack, with a vivid remembrance of the machinery, and the ancient, ancient face at the cottage-door.

"I don't know," said the lad; "'specs she is. She's always been old ever since I can remember."

"Wonder if she'll ever be an angel," mused Jack thoughtfully.

This being apparently a question too deep for Tom's powers of intellect, he only stared stupidly at the child and held his tongue.

"I 'spose you pway to God to make you better?" continued the little fellow presently. "He would make you better if you asked Him. Mummy says He always does what we ask."

"Does He?" said the sick lad wonderingly. "Don't know; never tried it. Seems to me he's got a deal else to do than to think of poor folks. They're born miserable, and they'll be miserable, that's all."

"What's miserable?" asked little Jack curiously. "Does you feel bad here?" laying his little hands on his breast.

"Mortal bad," said the boy despairingly. "You don't care for nothing, and you don't want to live, and yet you just do live, because you're poor and hungry, and nobody wants you."

"I always thought God was kind," said little Jack, his eyes growing more wistful and compassionate as his little brain tried to take in this sense of woe, and want, and apparent injustice which has puzzled many an older and wiser head before. "I don't think it's kind to let people be miserable."

"No more do I," said Tom. "So I gave up going to Sunday-school. Can't see that what they tell us there is a bit like what we find it. Perhaps there's two heavens—I don't know. I can't see how things is goin' to be so different when we're dead."

"It must be awful funny to be dead," said little Jack, raising such a weird old face to that flushed and fever-marred one on the truckle-bed, that Tom could only stare at him as if he had been some fantastic little goblin and not a child at all. "I shut my eyes sometimes and try to think I'm in a box like the dead peoples go in, and I wait—and wait—and wait, and then I think I hear the angels singing, and it is all bright—oh, so bright, and— Oh," breaking suddenly off with a scream of delight, "the bunnies!"

"Why didn't you come?" asked the major's voice, as he appeared with the treasures in their hutch. "Have you been here all this time?"

"Yes," said Jack, fondling the little animals with eager hands. "Forgot about the bunnies. Me was talking to the poor boy. He says he's miserable."

"Well, here's the eighteenpence," said the major, laying the money down on the mantelpiece, and keeping a respectful distance from the sick lad, whose appearance rather alarmed him; "and now, come along, Jack; we mustn't be late for tea."

"Good-bye," said Jack, turning to the bed. "Please don't be miserable more'n you can help; and thank you for the bunnies."

He trotted off after the major, watched by two yearning eyes which for long after seemed to see nothing but a little figure outlined against the dark and desolate room with the brightness that its own childish sympathy had brought; and, when a ragged sleeve went up to hide those same eyes, perhaps the sick lad was as far from understanding what could have caused such weakness as was the child whose little heart felt oppressed and heavy even amidst its novelty of delight. The idea of someone being "miserable" was a very painful idea. It made the dusty road longer and more toilsome; it detracted from the charms of the "bunnies;" it followed the little feet like an echo, and set itself to fancies even more sorrowful and more puzzled than those with which the child's brain usually teemed.

"I'm so sorry for that poor boy," he said, as the major began to slacken his speed, and his panting, heated little companion could keep up with him at last.

"You'd no business to stay there talking to him," said the major crossly. "He'd got the fever. Don't you tell Cyril, or he'll half murder me."

"Does the fever kill people?" asked little Jack thoughtfully. "'Cos I think he'd be happier if he was killed. Angels don't want money, and don't feel miserable, do they?"

"Don't know, I'm sure," said the major gruffly. "Never saw one to ask."

CHAPTER III. "ME ONLY WANTS 'MUMMY.'"

"WHAT made you late for tea to-night?" asked Cyril of his little brother when they were alone in their own room. "I hope the major and you weren't in any mischief?"

"We went to buy bunnies," said Jack rather shamefacedly. "Don't be cross, Cyril. Such beautiful bunnies, with long ears, and they stand up on their hind legs; we've got them in the old summer-house. I'll show them you to-morrow."

"Where did you get them from?" asked Cyril quickly.

"Major got them from a boy!" explained Jack, struggling out of his little shirt, and folding it up with a neatness and precision peculiar to himself. "Poor boy! him was very sick," he added thoughtfully.

"I hope you weren't in the village?" cried Cyril in alarm. "You know Miss Crawley said there was scarlet-fever there, and none of us were to go near it. The major knew that; did he take you?"

"Yes," said little Jack, remembering too late the major's caution, but quite incapable of telling Cyril a lie, even had that caution been bound by heavier penalties than the major's wrath.

"He'd no right to," cried Cyril angrily; "and you'd no right to go. Why didn't you tell me?"

"You wasn't here," said little Jack, his delicate face flushing, and his lips quivering at his brother's angry voice.

"You're very naughty," said Cyril, still in wrath. "You know I've told you not to go anywhere without me. Didn't I promise mother to take care of you? And such a chap as you are to catch things, too! It isn't so long since you had the measles, and just before that the chicken-pox, and now— Was the boy very ill?"

Groat tears had welled up into little Jack's eyes. He stood there with rosy, bare feet on the bare floor, with his little shirt in his hand, and his head hanging down, cut to the heart by his brother's rebukes, and already convinced that the bunnies weren't worth the sorrow they had cost him.

"Yes," he said at last; "his face was all red, and he said he wanted so to die. Oh, please, please don't be angry, Cyril!"

The remembrance of that sad scene in the cottage, coupled with Cyril's just wrath at his imprudence, was too much for the little fellow's sensitive heart. He burst into passionate sobs that for long nothing would stay or soothe.

"I'm always naughty now," he moaned dismally. "I can't help it; I does want mummy so bad."

And Cyril, who of all things dreaded to see "mummy's sweet-heart" in tears, set to work to console him with all his might, promising unheard-of things if only Jack would not cry. At last his efforts succeeded, and the little fellow's sobs were silenced, and he was coaxed into bed, and lay down exhausted by the storm of emotion.

Cyril too felt wearied, and was thankful to lay his head down on the pillow and close his eyes.

Always a heavy sleeper, it seemed to Cyril that he had been dreaming of a noise in the room, or of someone calling his name, long before his startled senses leapt into actual knowledge of what was passing around him. Then he sat suddenly up, alert and wakeful, and found his little brother standing by his side.

"What is it?" he cried. "Were you calling?"

"Calling a long, long time," said little Jack, in a strange, husky voice. "Cyril, somefin hurts me awful bad."

"Where—how?" cried Cyril in alarm, his thoughts even in that moment seeming to bridge over land and sea, and show him his mother's face looking reproachfully at him for want of care of this, her treasure.

"It's here," cried Jack, clasping his hands to his throat, "and it burns and burns, and I've drunk all the water, and I'm so thirsty again."

Cyril sprang out of bed and drew up the blind, then snatched the little fellow in his arms and put him in his own bed, looking all the time with anxious eyes at the altered face and parched, dry lips, and trembling as he touched the little hot hands.

"I'll go and call Miss Crawley," he said hurriedly. "You lie still, I won't be a minute."

There was no way of procuring a light, as the boys were not allowed to have matches in their rooms, so Cyril groped his way along the narrow corridor and dark staircase until he reached Miss Crawley's door. Here he knocked loudly, until he succeeded in arousing that austere virgin.

"Jack ill?" she cried crossly, when she had mastered the boy's errand. "Stuff and nonsense! You're always fancying he's ill. Here, wait a minute, you shall take him some castor-oil."

Castor-oil was a sovereign remedy in that establishment, and one especially feared and hated by little Jack. Cyril knew that it would be impossible to administer it, but he took the glass meekly from Miss Crawley's hand.

"I—I wish you would come and see him, ma'am," he said pleadingly. "I think he's very queer."

"I'll see him in the morning," said Miss Crawley sharply. "He'll do till then. I suppose he's been eating sweets again and made himself sick. Now be off. I can't stop here all night."

Never at any time a very beautiful object, Miss Crawley looked even less so in the mysteries of her night toilette, and if Cyril's heart had not been so anxious and perturbed, he could have made any amount of capital out of her appearance; but he felt in no humour for fun, and was only anxious to get back to his brother.

The sight of the nauseous mixture completely upset little Jack.

"Oh, please not that, Cyril," he begged. "I'm much better now;" and Cyril, with a child's ignorance of illness, was only too ready to believe him, and the castor-oil remained in the glass. He made another voyage of discovery for water, and came back with a large jug, which was emptied long before the bell rang for getting up.

By that time, too, little Jack was talking so strangely and wildly that Cyril grew alarmed, and, this time, he betook himself to the governess, Miss Cheape, who was persuaded to come and look at the little fellow, and seeing that it was a case of no ordinary illness, went herself to Miss Crawley, and begged that the doctor might be sent for.

Hour after hour passed, and Jack grew worse with each. It was Sunday morning, and the boys filed off to church, but Cyril refused to leave his brother for all Miss Crawley's mandates, and after a fierce battle he gained his way.

The doctor came at last, and his first glance confirmed Cyril's worst fears. Jack had the fever—the same fever that was raging in the village, devastating homes and families like a scourge. The announcement threw Miss Crawley into terrible agitation, and the establishment into a whirl of excitement.

Arrangements were made to have the other boys sent off to friends or parents that same day. The sick-room was stripped of curtains, and almost of furniture. A large screen was fixed on the landing, on which was hung a sheet steeped in disinfecting fluids, and strict orders were given that no one in the house was to approach this quarter. The doctor promised to send in a nurse from the village, and then bade Cyril keep away from his brother's room altogether. The boy's face grew very white. He shook his head determinedly.

"I can't do that," he said. "I promised mother to take care of him. I couldn't think of leaving him when he's ill."

"But you can't do any good," said the doctor, a kindly-faced, middle-aged man, who knew the little brothers well, and had often admired their devotion to each other. "Nonsense, my dear, I must insist on your not being in here. Miss Crawley has telegraphed to Captain Grant, and he will come and fetch you to-morrow, and you can stay at the Court till Jack is better; then I'll send him there at once."

Cyril listened and allowed himself to be taken downstairs, where he wandered about for an hour in misery. Then he went out into the garden to feed the fatal "bunnies," wondering as he did so if it would be wrong to punch the major's head on a Sunday, and so ease the wrath in his heart when he thought of all that his selfishness had entailed upon little Jack. From the garden he wandered below the window of the room where his little brother lay. He found himself measuring the distance from the ground, and calculating the strength of the creepers and the trellis-work.

The temptation was too strong for him. He swung himself up, and in another moment was looking in through the window. It was open, and he could see the bed and the little figure on it, and the bandages on the child's head, and the great sheet stretched over the door. There was no one there, and Jack was tossing restlessly to and fro, a sight piteous and strange to Cyril's loving eyes.

"Mummy, mummy, mummy!" That was always the cry, and its reproach seemed to smite home to the boy's heart with a pain and dread that stifled every other thought. He sprang into the room and bent over his little brother, with the tears springing hot and swift to his eyes.

"Jack—don't you know me, Jack?" he cried.

But his voice could not pierce through the dulled senses, any more than his face could be seen through the fever-mists that blinded those solemn, unchildish eyes.

To and fro, to and fro, the little head tossed and turned, and nothing from the parched lips but that one monotonous cry.

Cyril fell on his knees in an agony of dread and terror.

"Oh, mother, mother!" he cried, "why aren't you here? Oh, if he should die and never see you again!"

The thought was terrible, and he struggled with it as with some giant monster threatening to overwhelm him then and there. Perhaps it was too hard a struggle, or perhaps that long, anxious, sleepless night was taking vengeance on him. Be that how it may, when the nurse came in from the village, and Miss Crawley conducted her to the patient's room, Cyril was found stretched on the floor beside his brother's bed, quite stiff, and cold, and unconscious, and the little dog, Fluff, sat perched beside him, looking as if he were holding a court-martial upon the proceedings of his two little masters, and thought them very extraordinary indeed.

"Oh, dear me, dear me!" cried Miss Crawley. "This is really most annoying conduct. Master Marsden, I am surprised at you. This is direct disobedience, and deserves severe chastisement. Do you hear?"

"I don't think it's much good speaking to him, ma'am," said the nurse quietly. "He's fainted, and if he's been with his brother all this time it's not much use to part them now. He's taken the infection already if he's to have it."

So Cyril gained his way, and the little brothers were not separated.

There was not much to be done, it seemed to Cyril. He was told to keep very quiet, but that was no effort, for his head ached, and he felt languid, and tired, and strangely sleepy. He sat by the window, and read, and saw the cool bandages being changed and medicine given, and always—always—that restless little head was tossing to and fro, and never once did that murmur of "mummy, mummy," cease till the day wore on to its close.

There were intervals of consciousness, but so brief that they were scarcely noticeable. In the evening the doctor came again, and Cyril being in bed, and pretending to sleep, listened anxiously to the whispered colloquy between him and the nurse.

He could not make much out of it, however, and then suddenly the door was pushed open, and he saw the kind, anxious face of Ivor Grant.

In a moment the boy was out of bed and beside him.

"Oh, Captain Grant," he cried in passionate eagerness, "I'm so glad you've come. Don't say it's my fault. I know I ought to have looked after him that day, but I never dreamt of his going to the village, and— Oh, what shall I say to mother?"

He fairly broke down here, sobbing as childishly as little Jack himself might have done.

Ivor took him in his arms, and tried to soothe him, even while a strange tightness seemed about his heart, a feeling of terror such as in all his life he had never known, as his eyes rested on that little dusky head beyond, and noted with the sharpness of a first and shocked surprise the dreadful change in little Jack's face.

"Is there danger?" he asked huskily, dropping Cyril's hands, and turning to the doctor.

"There is always more or less uncertainty about these cases," was the reluctant answer. "So much depends on the constitution and strength of the patient. Is the child naturally delicate? Excuse me, but you are a relation, I suppose?"

"No," said Ivor, "only a friend. Yes, the boy was never very strong, I am afraid."

The doctor was silent for a moment or two.

"It must take its course," he said at last. "I can give no opinion yet."

Ivor's lips paled. He seemed suddenly to see that lovely, wistful face of Beryl Marsden looking at him across the gulf of land and sea, trusting to him for the care of her darling, building up visions of hope and gladness on the frail foundation of that little life; and with a terrible sense of impotence and despair he recognised how helpless a thing was human love, even at its best.

He turned to Cyril.

"You ought not to be here, my boy," he said. "You run the risk of taking the fever also. They should have kept you apart."

"He won't stay away, sir," said the nurse. "He came in through the window when he was forbidden the room."

"I must stay," said Cyril, his lips quivering with that sense of trouble and dread he yet but vaguely understood. "I promised mother never to leave Jack—always to look after him. Don't say you'll send me away, sir."

At that moment the languid eyes of little Jack opened on the two faces and noted them with some ray of consciousness.

"Cyrrie," he murmured, "is mummy coming? Tell Cap'en Grant to fetch mummy. She'd send this pain away—me knows she would."

"Mummy will come soon, my darling little fellow," said Ivor, bending over him tenderly. "You try and sleep, and get well, and you will be able to run about when she comes."

"Don't want to run about," said the little fellow wearily. "Me's so tired; me only wants mummy."

"Bless his heart!" said the nurse, wiping her eyes. "he didn't ought ever to have left her. Such a baby as he is!"

"Don't cry," said little Jack, looking at her wonderingly. "Me doesn't like people to cry, and my mummy couldn't help leaving me. But she's coming back—isn't she, Cyrrie? Only it's such a long, long time," he added with a sigh.

Then the wandering returned, and it seemed to Ivor Grant that he had never heard anything more pathetic than that rambling baby talk. Sometimes he was in the meadows, and "mummy" was making cowslip-balls; sometimes pouring out those confidences to Fluff which as yet had been heard by no other ears; sometimes bidding the poor boy not be "miserable," or murmuring snatches of those "payers" at whose repetition Cyril had often rebelled. But it was agony to Ivor Grant to listen to him, and it terrified Cyril as he tried to follow the fancies of that wandering brain, which, setting out always from the one starting-point of "mummy," took so many and such varied turnings on the weary journey of its love.

And so the night wore on, and Cyril at last fell asleep for very weariness, and Ivor Grant sat by little Jack's side, while the baby-lips unfolded in their unconscious babbling the whole panorama of that innocent life—its love, its quaint fancies, its childish trials and secrets—all its sweet and plentiful compassion for those vague sorrows that had thrown the shadows of others' woes across a pure and wondering soul.

Morning broke, and clear sunlight looked in at the unshuttered window, and a bird perched itself upon the trellis-work and burst forth into wild, jubilant song. There was silence in the room. Both children slept, and Ivor had sent the nurse away to procure some rest. He unclasped the lattice and threw open the window, and stood drinking in the rich, cool air, though his eyes were blind to the beauty of the outer world.

A stifled, husky noise attracted his attention at last. He turned, listened, his breath caught in a sudden spasm of terror. Then, with one rapid step, he was bending over Cyril's bed.

"My God!" he cried in a stifled voice, "he has got the fever too!"

(A STORY IN FOUR WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER V.

MURIEL LEIGH had not spent so happy an evening as that of the ball for many a long day. She had quite reconciled herself to remain in the background most of the evening, and to have as partners those young gentlemen who were not sufficiently good at dancing, or brilliant in conversation, to enable them to claim the hand of the leading belles of the evening. In fact, beyond her dance with Hugh, she had sat out the early part of the evening; Connie had brought one or two men who had put their names down on her programme for a dance, but at such a distant period that there seemed small chance of its ever arriving.

When she had seen the name of Venables on the invitation-list, she had hoped for a moment that it might turn out to be her old friend. Some two years previously she had known him somewhat intimately.

Circumstances, however, had rendered it necessary for him to go abroad for a considerable period; he had written Muriel one or two letters, but after a while their correspondence altogether ceased.

When he shook hands with her, however, that evening, she could tell instinctively that he was utterly ignorant of all that had happened to her since they last met, and she determined that he should remain in ignorance of it for that one evening at any rate. Why, indeed, should she not enjoy a revival of her old life for a few hours? The awakening to her ordinary existence and the recollection of the disgrace hanging over her must come again only too soon; but for the present she would forget all about it.

As she crossed the ball-room, leaning on Venables' arm, she felt like a new creature. No one of all the company could know who she was, whilst all must see that she was with the handsomest man in the room, and that she was not unworthy to be at his side. She danced to perfection. Venables was very fond of waltzing, and declared at the end of the dance that it was by far the best that he had enjoyed during the evening. He asked for another, and took advantage of her permission to put himself down for two more.

"Let us go into the marquee," he said as the music finished; "we shall find it cooler there, and there are not many people about."

Muriel made no objection, and they soon found themselves seated together on a lounge. Venables busied himself in bringing some refreshments to her.

"I did not know you knew the Pankhursts," he remarked.

"They were friends of my father," Muriel replied; "I came here once before when I was quite a little girl."

"Are you staying here long?"

"Yes, for some time," said Muriel, despising herself at the moment she said it for being ashamed to confess the truth.

"I'm very glad of that," returned Venables; "I am a fixture at Eastcote for some months for certain, and it will be very pleasant to know that I have an old friend so near."

"I hope we shall see you over here occasionally," rejoined Muriel.

"Oh yes, you may be quite sure of that. How have things been going with you since I last saw you? I hope your father is well?"

"Not very," replied Muriel, with difficulty restraining her tears as she thought of where her father was. "And you?" she continued. "How have you been getting on?"

"Oh, I have had a strange sort of time. I've been half over Europe since I saw you last, but I hope now that my wanderings are over, and that I am going to settle down in England for the rest of my existence. I am tired of this unsettled sort of life, and it is quite time that I followed the example of everyone else."

"In what way?" enquired Muriel.

"In marrying," answered Venables somewhat hesitatingly.

"Indeed; are you thinking then of getting married?"

Venables looked at her for a moment and then replied:

"I don't know; you see that does not altogether depend upon oneself."

"No," said Muriel; "I suppose the lady would have something to say in the matter."

"And the question is, what?" rejoined Venables.

"Well, we must leave that to time," she replied.

"By the way," he resumed, "are you a great friend of Miss Pankhurst?"

"Yes," said Muriel, "we are a great deal together."

"She seems rather a nice girl; but she has a very strange way about her."

"Oh, you must not take any notice of that," said Muriel; "she is the best of girls, really."

"H'm!" responded Venables, "she has a strange way of showing it; she behaved very peculiarly to me just now, although her father introduced me to her somewhat warmly."

"Oh, but you must not notice that," again urged Muriel; "she really is a very charming girl."

Venables did not pursue the subject, and finding he had a name down for the next dance, he was reluctantly compelled to return to the ball-room.

He had not been gone many minutes when Hugh made his appearance in the marquee, where Muriel, at her own request, had been left, and made his way to her side.

"I think, Miss Leigh, this is our dance, is it not?"

"I don't know, I am sure," replied Muriel carelessly.

Hugh looked hurt, and Muriel at once recollected herself, rose, and said:

"I dare say it is our dance; but I have mislaid my programme."

"Why, there it is!" said Hugh, and he pointed to it as it hung to her fan.

"Oh yes, so it is. Shall we go back?"

Hugh offered his arm, and they returned slowly through the conservatory.

"Do you know Mr. Venables?" asked Hugh, with just a touch of jealousy which he was unable to conceal.

"Oh yes; we are very old friends," she replied.

"I did not know that," said Hugh, adding to himself: "If I had I should have taken precious good care that he did not come here to-night."

He did not altogether enjoy his dance with Muriel. Some duty called him away from her directly the dance was over, and when that was accomplished he could not find Muriel before he had to seek his partner for the next dance.

He was immensely surprised to find how differently he seemed to look upon Muriel on this particular evening. One reason doubtless was that he had never seen her look so brilliant as on this occasion. She was certainly one of the most beautiful girls in the room. It flattered him to be able to talk freely to her in the presence of so many of his associates, who were ignorant that she was only a companion to his sister.

When he saw Venables take her hand, and observed the smile with which she greeted him, he experienced a totally new sensation; he had not been aware until then how much he cared for her. He had deluded himself with the idea that he had been simply flirting with her, and that at any moment he could let her drop, and things would go on just as they had done before she came to Como Hall. To his surprise he found that this was very far from being the case—to see another man talking to her brought pain to him, and if he could have had his way the ball would have closed at that instant, and he would have spent the rest of the evening in her society. This, however, was impossible, and he blamed his stupidity for having only engaged himself for two dances with her. Not that she had not plenty to spare, but that he had not. His position as son of the host had obliged him to fill his programme to the bitter end.

"Never mind," he thought, "if I play my cards well, I ought to be able to get Connie to be kind to Venables, and then he at all events won't see much of Muriel, and I will introduce him all round so that he may not dance with her much more to-night."

Connie, however, was rebellious that evening, and when her brother gave her a hint that she had better pay some attention to Venables she told him to mind his own business.

When, after supper, he came to Venables, and offered to introduce him to any girl that he liked, he was disappointed to be told that he did not mean to dance much more that evening, he was not very well, and was so utterly out of practice through living abroad so long; all of which, being interpreted, meant that he intended to spend a considerable portion of the remainder of the evening in the company of Muriel. Hugh understood this, and was the more incensed because he felt utterly helpless.

Sir Joseph, however, had his eye on Venables, and by way of making him as comfortable as possible, kept him by his side for a considerable period, expatiating in his pompous style on the beauties of Como Hall, and on the important position that he himself held in the neighbourhood. Venables listened as became him as a guest, but felt tremendously bored. However, it struck him that if he wanted to renew his acquaintance with Muriel it would be wise to be on good terms with the master of the house. So he made himself as agreeable as circumstances permitted, and to his gratification received a warm invitation to renew his visit as often as he wished.

"We have a good billiard-table," said Sir Joseph, "and Hugh is not a bad hand at the game, nor for the matter of that is Connie either—in fact, I don't know what it is the girls don't do nowadays. I should really feel obliged to you if you would come up occasionally and give her a good beating; she gets the best of her old father now, and is inclined to become a little too proud of it."

Venables replied that he should be most happy to accept the invitation, although he was conscious that Sir Joseph meant him to come and see Miss Pankhurst, whilst he himself knew that Muriel would be his attraction.

"I wonder how on earth she came to visit here," thought Venables, when he at last escaped from Sir Joseph's conversation. "It cannot be because she likes it, I should imagine, unless she finds something more in Miss Pankhurst than I do."

This thought was caused by a second and more decided snub from Connie during the evening. He had come to the conclusion that she, if possible, was still more objectionable than her father.

Before the evening ended he had received from Lady Pankhurst a hint that if he would come up any day when he felt inclined they would be very glad to see him, and whilst he was still wondering what this meant, to his further surprise Hugh joined him, and somewhat effusively asked him if he would come up and have some tennis next day.

"You are very good," said Venables. "I shall be most happy, though I don't play very well."

"Oh, for the matter of that neither do we," replied Hugh, "but it helps to pass away the day. Then you will be here about three o'clock?"

"Yes," responded Venables, "if that time will suit you."

"All right then, we will leave it for that hour. You see we have got two girls here, so that we can have a four if you like, or else we can play singles."

This invitation was the result of some cogitation on Hugh's part. He had come to the decision that he must see a good deal more of Muriel. As he was of opinion that it was not improbable that Venables would take a liking to his sister when he came to know her better, he had resolved that the best thing he could do would be to ask him up; then a little generalship ought to arrange the pairing off of Venables with Connie, leaving Muriel for himself. His companionship with Muriel would not look so marked if several people were about, and he specially wanted his attentions to pass unnoticed. Besides, Venables might learn incidentally the peculiar circumstances in which Muriel stood.

Venables kept his promise and paid a visit to the Hall next day. Hugh's tactics were so far successful that Miss Pankhurst was allotted to the visitor for a partner, whilst Muriel played with Hugh. Not that that very much mattered, for conversation of any kind during tennis is almost out of the question. When the game was over Venables made an attempt to join Muriel, but to his surprise she appeared anxious to avoid him, and moved away in the direction of Connie. He followed her, but soon found himself, to his disgust, alone with Miss Pankhurst. This did not tend to put him in a very good temper, for he was obliged to confess that Muriel did not seem to be so anxious for his company as on the previous night. Moreover, Connie was by no means pleased to find herself by his side.

Muriel had spent a restless night; she had scarcely slept for thinking of the events of the past evening. She had come to the determination that the dream in which she had indulged must now end; she had had one happy evening in the company of her old friend; it was quite time that he should know the truth. But she could not bear to tell him. She knew it was her duty to do so; she felt that if he knew of her father's crime and her own position it would be scarcely likely that he would continue to pay her the attention which he had done, yet she did not feel equal to the sacrifice of telling him everything.

"He will be sure to find it out sooner or later from some one else," she thought; "it is not my duty to tell him; I may take it for granted that he knows already; perhaps he does know, and it is his kindness that makes him still treat me as if nothing had happened."

With this she comforted herself and her conscience, although in her inmost consciousness she was aware that it was a false consolation. However, she had sufficient determination to resolve that she would no longer give him any encouragement; she had almost determined not to join the tennis-party in the afternoon, but Connie had so pressed her to come that she at last yielded. She did not find Hugh's companionship much more pleasant than Connie did that of Venables; in fact, the whole quartette seemed playing at cross-purposes. Before long Connie and Venables had almost quarrelled.

"I think I will go in now," said Connie rather suddenly, after Venables had been standing saying nothing for more than a minute.

"Won't you play another game?" he enquired.

"No, I don't think so; I don't find it very great fun."

"I'm afraid that is because you have me for a partner," said Venables.

"Perhaps that may have something to do with it," she retorted rather rudely.

"I'm sorry you did not tell me that before; had you done so we might have arranged for different sides."

"I don't know that that would have been much better," said Connie petulantly; "it isn't much fun playing with one's own brother."

"Well, what arrangement would you like?" enquired Venables. "It seems unfortunately somewhat difficult to please you."

"Yes, it is," she retorted; "it is so difficult a matter that it is not worth your trying to accomplish it."

"Very well," returned he; "in future I will consider it an impossible object, and will make no attempt to attain it."

Connie turned towards the house and then stopped suddenly.

"Why did you come here to-day?" she asked.

"Because I was invited," was the reply.

"By whom?"

"By your father and mother, and Hugh also asked me to come."

"No one else?" enquired Connie again.

"Miss Leigh expressed a hope that we might meet occasionally," replied Venables, wondering what it all meant.

"No one else?" came once more.

"No, who else should ask me?"

"I'm sure I don't know, I am the only one left," replied Connie.

Venables looked at her for a moment.

"Really, Miss Pankhurst," he said, "I am totally at a loss to understand why you should speak to me as you have done. I know no reason whatever why you should take so violent a dislike to me. If I have offended you in any way, at least tell me how and let me assure you it has been unintentionally."

His words seemed to reassure her to some extent; she looked up hesitatingly.

"Do not imagine that I am trying to obtrude myself on you," continued Venables; "I assure you that I did not intend to speak to you to-day if I could avoid it. That must sound rude, but it is true."

"Is it really?"

"I must confess it is."

"I believe you," said Connie, her manner changing to one of cordiality. "I am going to tell you the truth, too. From what I had been told I was afraid you looked on me as a girl who was in the matrimonial market, for you to take if I pleased you. So I determined to show you that I was not to be handed over to you or anyone else. I tried to make you dislike me, and I succeeded. The fact is, I am engaged already, though my father and mother won't recognise the engagement, so I don't mean to be agreeable to any man who comes, as I thought you did, to see how I would suit."

Venables listened in astonishment.

"I am very glad you have told me this," he said, "though I am at a loss to know how such ideas got into your head."

"I needn't explain how, I had good reasons. I should never have acknowledged their existence if I had not felt sure you would understand me. I was unwilling to let you imagine I really disliked you; I only disliked what I thought your motive."

"Let us have a talk about this," said Venables, leading her to a distant part of the garden.

She made no objection, and they had a long conversation together. Venables learnt the whole story of her engagement to Lewis, and was able to promise her some aid. He knew Norman, and had no hesitation in offering his assistance in bringing the two lovers together as often as he could, by obtaining invitations for his friend to any house at which Connie might be visiting.

"Your father won't be able to hold out long," he said; "Norman is making marvellous progress, and is holding a very high position. From what I was told the other day, there is a chance of his being an A.R.A. before long."

Connie was delighted, and in return for the confidence which she bestowed on Venables, she encouraged him to confide in her. She had noticed, with all a girl's quickness, his evident liking for Muriel, whilst Muriel's for him was still more clear.

Venables, however, had not yet reached the stage when he could unburden his mind to a third person, even though she might be so sympathetic as Connie. At the same time he did not attempt to conceal that he felt a strong interest in Muriel.

"Do you know," he remarked, "I fancied just now that she avoided me. As I was quite certain that you did, I began to fear there was something repellent about me. Do you think I was mistaken in her case as well as yours?"

"I hope so."

"Why?"

"Because it would be a still greater disappointment to you. Suppose we go and find them now? I expect she is getting tired of my brother."

"As you are of me?"

"Oh no, I like being with you; you don't know the difference in my feelings towards you now. We must be great friends, and the greater the better, so far as deceiving papa is concerned. What a wretched state of things, isn't it?"

"Not so wretched for me as for you," laughed Venables.

CHAPTER VI.

MURIEL, however, was not easily found. She had grown utterly tired of Hugh, and had at last escaped indoors on the plea of a headache.

But it was more from heartache than headache she was suffering.

She had observed Venables and Connie walk away in confidential talk, and a pang of jealousy had shot through her heart.

"Has she been deceiving me?" she thought. "She has fallen in love with him. How could she help it?"

But the thought of Norman somewhat assuaged her anger. She would not believe Connie capable of throwing him over for a man she had only seen twice. Besides, had not Venables expressed his dislike of her?

She felt that she was getting into a false position than ever. There was no doubt now that Hugh admired her, and even more. Unintentionally she had inspired in him a strong affection, which was evidently on the point of being declared. What should she do?

Of course she must refuse him. But afterwards?

If it became known, it meant that she must leave the Hall at once. Where should she go then?

Besides, that would mean absence from Venables. She knew that that was the best thing that could happen, for she felt every hour that his presence was becoming more indispensable to her. But it was far better that she should depart before separation became heartbreaking to her.

She resolved that she would tell him all unless her departure was immediate. Then she thought that she would persuade Connie to do so.

The upshot of her deliberations was to do nothing. She persuaded herself that she had no right to think that she was the object of the slightest interest to him; he had paid her no more attention than he was now paying to Connie.

Until he was more pointed in his conduct she would do nothing. Before many days had passed he must learn all about her.

However, this was not the case. Venables came frequently to the Hall during the next week—much too frequently for a casual guest.

Sir Joseph, who was most anxious to have him for a son-in-law, was clever enough to pretend to be ignorant of his visits. Nevertheless, he kept a keen eye on him, and instructed his wife to do so too.

Hugh's hopes beat high. He had been very disappointed at first to see how Connie and Venables had not taken to each other. However, after the tennis, things had apparently taken a fresh turn, and now they were constantly together—"as thick as thieves," as he put it. He mistook the confidences which they exchanged regarding Connie's love-affairs for the confidences of lovers.

Sir Joseph was not so easily deceived. At the end of a fortnight's observation he had come to the conclusion that Muriel, and not his daughter, was the attraction that led Venables so often to the Hall. Lady Pankhurst's less acute mind had come to the same conclusion. Sir Joseph resolved that an understanding must be arrived at.

He met Venables on the lawn one day, and, under pretence of showing him his greenhouses, led him away from the others. He soon managed to bring the conversation round to Muriel—a subject which interested his companion, though he would have preferred another when talking with such a man as his host.

"Yes, poor girl," said Sir Joseph. "I'm glad to see that she is beginning to look quite bright again."

"Has she been unwell?"

"Mentally, my dear Venables, and natural enough. She has gone through a terrible amount of anxiety, and of course it tells on her. You know the details, I suppose?"

"I know nothing," replied Venables, an anxious sensation at his heart. "You forget I have not long returned from abroad."

"Of course, I'd forgotten it. Well, you see, her father made a terrible mess of his business affairs, not to put it more strongly; went to smash financially and every other way, though some say he isn't to blame, and I agree with them to a certain extent. However, here is the poor girl without a penny to bless herself with, and I'm sure I don't know what she would have done if Lady Pankhurst hadn't engaged her as companion to Connie. Not that we wanted one, but we were glad to do something for the girl."

Venables showed his surprise and agitation more than he wished. They did not escape Sir Joseph's attention, who, thinking he had said quite enough, turned the conversation.

He had said enough to engage Venables' thoughts for the next few hours. At last he had an explanation of the mysteries of the last few days.

Muriel's conduct had been inexplicable to him. At times she absolutely avoided him without the slightest apparent reason, and he had puzzled his brain to invent one. At other times she had been almost hysterically gay with a sort of defiance which frightened him. He had once or twice asked Connie for an explanation, but she had resolutely avoided giving him a direct answer.

Now he knew the truth. It was the fact that Muriel had alternately encouraged and repelled him. Sometimes her reason had the upper hand, and she refused to allow herself to indulge in an impossible dream of happiness; sometimes his presence and kindness intoxicated her, and she forgot all about her resolutions and threw herself into the enjoyment of the moment with a sort of madness.

Before the night came Venables made up his mind. Sir Joseph had made a great mistake in saying what he had said. His object was too palpable to Venables, now that Connie had told him of her father's hopes as regarded him. Had Venables been a selfish, money-seeking man like the knight, the knowledge he had just acquired might have led him to give up Muriel. But he was a true, honourable man, one who would be the last to let monetary considerations have any weight in the question of his marriage. Fortunately, too, his own means were such that he need not regard them.

He was certain he loved her; he almost hoped that her recent conduct showed she felt a more than ordinary interest in him. He would not wait another day before letting her know that his chief desire was to win her hand in spite of everything.

A word to Connie the next day gave him the desired opportunity. Hugh was out, the garden was deserted; it was easy to find a summer-house in a secluded spot, and Connie undertook to see that neither Sir Joseph or Lady Pankhurst should have a chance of interrupting.

"You can guess what I'm going to do," said Venables to Connie.

"Yes, and I wish you every success. She is a splendid girl, isn't she?"

"I think so, of course," he replied with a smile. "I shall do my best, I promise you."

"I'm afraid it will be necessary," was Connie's half-sad rejoinder as she turned away. She knew Muriel's secret.

Venables' first words to Muriel agitated her almost painfully. She felt what was coming; it was too much for her to bear.

When they were safe out of reach of interruption Venables told her in simple, manly words how he loved her, how he had but one desire—to win her for his wife; but one dread—that she did not care for him.

Muriel was trembling violently. At his last words she gave an hysterical sob.

"Is what I am saying so painful to you?" he asked. "Forgive me if I have taken you too much by surprise—if what has been the only subject of my thoughts for the last fortnight has been a stranger to yours. For Heaven's sake, my darling," he burst out, "do not tremble so; you frighten me."

With a powerful effort Muriel gained her self-command. She released herself from his arms, and sat down wearily on a seat.

"You must forgive me," she said, "I have not been well lately. I am very sorry," she continued slowly, averting her gaze from his, "but I must refuse the offer you have made."

Venables stood silent for a few moments.

"May I ask the reason?" he said. "I have no right to ask, but I hope you will answer."

Muriel gave no reply, but her face grew whiter and more painfully miserable.

"Is it because you do not love me?" asked Venables, "or because you feel that there is no chance of your ever doing so?"

"You have no right to ask," cried Muriel.

"I will not do so," said Venables. "I will only ask you to listen to me for a moment. If your refusal is in any way connected with recent unfortunate circumstances, I can assure you on my word of honour that I have offered you my hand with a knowledge of them, and that their existence does not make the slightest difference to me, as they should not to you."

Muriel looked up with a gleam of hope in her face. But it died away as he concluded.

"You are very good," she murmured, "but you do not know. What have you heard?"

"Do not insist on my repeating painful details. Enough that I am quite aware of your position here and that I honour you the more for your courage in leaving a happy home to fulfil the duties which circumstances have rendered necessary."

"Ah, you do not know!" she cried. "There is something more."

"What is it?" he demanded.

"Spare me that. You must learn it soon from someone or other, spare me the pain of telling you. There is a disgrace hanging over me—a terrible disgrace."

Venables started. He stepped into the open air for a minute or two. When he came back Muriel was hiding her face in her hands, sobbing.

"Muriel," he said, "I refuse to accept your refusal as final. I don't understand what you have said, but I will do so. When I know the truth you will see me again. Till then good-bye."

He took her hand unresisted and kissed it. When Muriel looked up he was gone.

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 145.)

Why?

Why did he go?

Ah, why, why, why?

To take the light from the summer sky;

To take the rest from the long lone night;

To take the hope, from the morning's light;

And we were so happy, he and I.

Ah, why?

Why did he go?

Ah, why, why, why?

Because life's riddle is all awry;

Because fate, fortune, and circumstance,

And the thing that men call blindly, chance,

All ranked against us silently.

Ah, why?

Why did he go?

Ah, why, why, why?

Because joy is fickle and faith is shy;

And something there is in the world amiss,

That grudges to life an hour of bliss.

We were too happy he and I—

That's why!

The Editor's Note Book.

WHEN General Hicks's army was cut to pieces in the Soudan, those of us who take a serious view of Egyptian affairs comforted ourselves with the reflection that the Egyptian troops were terribly outnumbered, and suffered besides from lack of supplies and ammunition.

THIS consolation, slight as it was, is now denied us, and the hope that the Government of the Khedive might eventually be able to hold its own against the Arab levies of the Mahdi must be altogether given up. Baker Pasha's troops have been entirely routed by an inferior force, and it is clear that the safety of what it is now the fashion to call Egypt Proper rests with us, and with us alone.

So little, however, do the gentlemen who are good enough to govern us, and the other gentlemen who are supposed to fill the function of a critical Opposition, seem to know the conditions of the problem which is presented to us for solution, that the debate on Egyptian affairs, which was started on the first night of the session, collapsed ignominiously, for the simple reason that nobody of "light and leading," either in or out of office, had the slightest idea what to say.

So the Government have begun by wasting a night, and by upsetting all arrangements which had been made for the conduct of the business of the early part of the session—a circumstance which should not be forgotten when they presently begin to complain of obstruction and consequent loss of time.

ON what shifting sands English policy in Egypt is built is evidenced by the remarkable fact that, on the day after this abortive debate, Mr. Gladstone told the House of Commons that the Government did not intend to take any measures in consequence of Baker Pasha's defeat, and an hour or so afterwards had to announce that a telegram just received from Admiral Hewett had decided them to "take measures for supplying him with increased forces in order to secure the safety of Suakin."

How it can be right for us at one and the same time to secure the safety of Suakin and to abandon Khartoum is, perhaps, more obvious to party politicians than it is to mere ordinary mortals.

EXCEPT as affording a text for lectures about the incompetency of Parliament to deal with the affairs of the nation and for lamentations over obstruction, veiled and otherwise, there can be no reason whatever why any Government should think it necessary to start with such a programme as that which Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues announced last week. Egypt, the Bill for the Extension of the Franchise, and the necessary routine business, will certainly take up an enormous amount of time; and, if anything more is seriously attempted, we shall probably again see the deplorable spectacle of Estimates involving millions of money being galloped through in a few minutes, simply because no time can be afforded for their proper consideration.

NOTICE has been given of the usual array of private members' Bills, and our old friends, the Deceased Wife's Sister, the repeal of the compulsory clauses of the Vaccination Acts, the law of primogeniture, and many others, are again to the fore. For a good sweeping measure, commend me to Mr. Stevenson's Bill for the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors in England on Sunday. It is announced that when Mr. Stevenson's Bill gets into Committee—if, indeed, it ever reaches that stage—Sir Joseph Pease will propose amendments exempting London, and allowing publicans in the country to keep open for two hours on Sunday.

WHY London should be exempt, and not such places as Manchester, Birmingham, or Liverpool, is one of those conundrums which the faddists are continually propounding for our edification in their legislative projects. Perhaps it is considered that the London mob is less likely to submit to such arbitrary treatment than their brethren in the other great cities. For my part, I think that if Mr. Stevenson's mischievous Bill, or Sir Joseph Pease's scarcely less ill-considered amendment, were by any chance to become law, there would be serious riots in every town of any importance throughout the kingdom.

THE Anti-vivisectionists have fought a pitched battle with Dr. Burdon Sanderson and his supporters in Convocation at Oxford, and, notwithstanding that there was an imposing muster of the forces of bigotry and prejudice, were decisively beaten. Consequently, the newly-appointed Waynflete Professor of Physiology will have his laboratory. Dr. Sanderson's opponents do not seem to be aware that Parliament has legislated with great stringency on the subject of vivisection, and that its practice is now limited by the severest restrictions.

THE recent failure on the Stock Exchange is interesting chiefly as throwing a further light on the loose manner in which much of the banking business of the country is transacted. It appears that the directors of at least one bank, the shareholders of which had lately been congratulated by the chairman on the absolute safety of their securities, had been content to leave a large sum in bonds and similar documents in the hands of the defaulting stockbroker, with the result that a very serious loss has been incurred.

A GOOD deal has been said about the action of the Highgate justices who last week fined a girl of thirteen a sovereign for stealing milk, and the Daily Telegraph in especial, which describes the culprit as a "child of thirteen summers," had a very severe leader on the subject.

BUT, after all, the question arises, What is to be done with girls of thirteen—and of indifferently character, by-the-bye—who steal milk? And it must not be forgotten that among the children of the poor, who have to learn their way about very early in life, thirteen summers do not represent so very tender a state of infancy as some people might suppose. The proper place for this young person is a reformatory school, and the nearest way to a reformatory school lies through a prison, a fact which the magistrates no doubt bore in mind. The Home Secretary, however, adopted the Daily Telegraph's view of the matter, and promptly released the culprit.

THE case of the London Financial Association against Kelk and others—the Alexandra Palace and Park case—is not, so far, encouraging to people who are contemplating going to law. The trial of the matter before Vice-Chancellor Bacon has employed for twenty-nine days an army of learned gentlemen, whose fees must be something awful to contemplate, and now the Vice-Chancellor has announced that he will endeavour to dispose of the matter, "some time either before or after the Long Vacation." His lordship's excuse for this somewhat vague appointment was that "his other necessary arrangements for public business were such as to prevent his speedily disposing of such a case as this." In other words the Judicial Bench is so undermanned as to lead, not unfrequently, to a positive denial of justice.

SIR JAMES INGHAM has convicted the Proprietor and Committee of the Park Club, as it was generally expected he would do, and each of these culprits has been punished with a fine of five hundred pounds. The non-official gamblers were let off with a hundred pounds apiece. Whether the fines will ever be enforced is quite another matter, as a case was, of course, granted for the consideration of the Superior Courts, and the fun, from a legal point of view, has only just begun. If Sir James's decision is upheld, it will inevitably lead to something very like a revolution in Club life.

THE strike in the North and North-East Lancashire cotton trade has come to a sudden and unexpected end, after an abortive struggle on the part of the men for eight weeks. Thus the men lost eight weeks' wages, practically to no purpose, and unfortunately it is more than probable that the lesson will be lost almost as soon as learnt.

A CASE of considerable importance to theatrical managers, as well as to editors of magazines and periodicals, was tried last week in the Queen's Bench Division. The author of a play having sent, without invitation, his manuscript to Mr. Augustus Harris, brought an action for damages against that gentleman in consequence of the non-return of the drama. The law on the subject is sufficiently clear, and the jury had no difficulty in returning a verdict for the defendant, but the case serves to show to some extent one of the never-ending troubles of managers and editors. It very rarely occurs to the ingenuous mind of the amateur author, that the simplest way to ensure the safety of the precious offspring of his brain is to take a copy of it before he sends it on its travels.

WHATEVER may be the exact amount of its author's indebtedness to Von Moser's "Krieg im Frieden," there can be no doubt that Mr. Hamilton's farcical comedy, "Our Regiment," now being played at the Globe, is a thoroughly amusing entertainment of its class. Mr. Hamilton's dialogue is easy, appropriate, and smart; and, if he has availed himself here and there of some venerable witticisms, it is fair to say that they appear to be quite new to the majority of the audience.

IN addition to its own intrinsic merits, "Our Regiment" has the advantage of being remarkably well played, especially by Mr. Gerald Moore, whose Guy Warrener is a singularly well-studied character; by Mr. Gardiner, as the Curate in whom the old Adam of a rascally Oxford man is perpetually asserting himself at inconvenient moments; by Miss Abington, who is agreeably bright and fresh in an ingénue part; and by Mr. Lethecourt and Miss Fanny Brough, who give just the right amount of earnestness to the pair of rather perverse lovers, who furnish what of serious interest there is in the comedy. Altogether "Our Regiment" may be safely recommended to any of my readers who want to pass a pleasant evening at the play. C. D.

"Who Murdered Downie?"

ABOUT the end of the eighteenth century, whenever any student of the Marischal College, Aberdeen, incurred the displeasure of the humbler citizens, he was assailed with the question: "Who murdered Downie?" Reply and rejoinder generally brought on a collision between "town and gown," although the young gentlemen were accused of what was chronologically impossible. People have a right to be angry at being stigmatised as murderers; but the "taking off" of Downie occurred when the gowmsmen so assailed were unborn, or in their swaddling-clothes.

But there was a time when to be branded as an accomplice in the death of Richard Downie, made the blood run to the cheek of many a youth, and sent him home to his books, thoughtful and subdued. Downie was the sacrist or janitor at Marischal College. One of his duties consisted in securing the gates by a certain hour, previous to which all the students had to assemble in the common hall, where a Latin prayer was delivered by the principal. Whether, in discharging this function, Downie was more rigid than his predecessor in office, or whether he became stricter in the performance of it at one time more than another, cannot now be ascertained; but there can be no doubt he closed the gate with austere punctuality, and that those who were not in the common hall within a minute of the prescribed time, were shut out, and afterwards reprimanded and fined by the principal and professors. The students became irritated at this strictness, and took every petty means of annoying the sacrist; while he, in his turn, applied the screw at other points of academic routine, and a fierce war soon began to rage between the collegians and the humble functionary. Downie took care that in all his proceedings he kept within the strict letter of the law; but his opponents were not so careful, and the decisions of the rulers were uniformly against them, and in favour of Downie. Reprimands and fines having failed in producing due subordination, rustication, suspension, and even the extreme sentence of expulsion, had to be put in force; and, in the end, law and order prevailed. But a secret and deadly grudge continued to be entertained against Downie, and various schemes of revenge were thought of.

Downie was, in common with teachers and scholars, enjoying the leisure of the short New Year's vacation, when, as he was seated one evening with his family in his official residence at the gate, a messenger informed him that a gentleman at a neighbouring hotel wished to speak to him. Downie obeyed the summons, and was ushered from one room to another, till at length he found himself in a large apartment hung with black, and lighted by a solitary candle. After waiting for some time in this strange place, about fifty figures, all dressed in black, and with black masks on their faces, presented themselves. They arranged themselves in the form of a court, and Downie, pale with terror, was given to understand that he was about to be put on his trial.

A judge took his seat on the bench; a clerk and public prosecutor sat below; a jury was empanelled in front; and witnesses and spectators stood around. Downie at first set down the whole affair as a joke; but the proceedings were conducted with such persistent gravity, that, in spite of himself, he began to believe in the genuine mission of the awful tribunal. The clerk read an indictment, charging him with conspiring against the liberties of the students; witnesses were examined in due form; the public prosecutor addressed the jury; and the judge summed up.

"Gentlemen," said Downie, "the joke has been carried far enough—it is getting late, and my wife and family will be getting anxious about me. If I have been too strict with you in time past, I am sorry for it, and I assure you I will take more care in future."

"Gentlemen of the jury," said the judge, without paying the slightest attention to this appeal, "consider your verdict; and if you wish to retire, you can do so."

The jury retired. During their absence the most profound silence was observed; and, except renewing the solitary candle that burned beside the judge, there was not the slightest movement.

The jury returned, and recorded a verdict of "Guilty."

The judge then solemnly assumed a huge black cap, and addressed the prisoner:

"Richard Downie, the jury have unanimously found you guilty of conspiring against the just liberties and immunities of the students of Marischal College. You have wantonly provoked and insulted these inoffensive lieges for some months, and your punishment will assuredly be condign. You must prepare for death. In fifteen minutes the sentence of the court will be carried into effect."

The judge placed his watch on the bench. A block, an axe, and a bag of sawdust were brought into the centre of the room. A figure more terrible than any that had yet appeared, came forward, and prepared to act the part of doomsman.

It was now past midnight; there was no sound audible save the ominous ticking of the judge's watch.

Downie became more and more alarmed.

"For mercy sake, gentlemen," said the terrified man, "let me go home. I promise that you never again shall have cause of complaint."

"Richard Downie," remarked the judge, "you are vainly wasting the few moments that are left you on earth. You are in the hands of those who must have your life. Attempt to utter one cry, and you are seized, and your doom completed before you can utter another. Everyone here present has sworn a solemn oath never to reveal the proceedings of this night; they are known to none but ourselves, and when the object for which we have met is accomplished, we shall disperse unknown to any one. Prepare, then, for death; other five minutes will be allowed, but no more."

The unfortunate man, in an agony of deadly terror, raved and shrieked for mercy, but the avengers paid no heed to his cries. His fevered, trembling lips then moved as if in silent prayer; for he felt that the brief space between him and eternity was but as a few more tickings of that ominous watch.

"Now!" exclaimed the judge.

Four persons stepped forward and seized Downie, on whose features a cold, clammy sweat had burst. They bared his neck, and made him kneel before the block.

"Strike!" exclaimed the judge.

The executioner struck the axe on the floor; an assistant on the opposite side lifted at the same moment a wet towel, and struck it across the neck of the recumbent criminal, and a loud laugh announced that the joke had at last come to an end.

But Downie responded not to the uproarious merriment. They laughed again—but still he moved not. They lifted him up, and Downie was dead! Fright had killed him as effectually as if the axe of a real headsman had severed his head from his body.

It was a tragedy, after all. The medical students tried to open a vein, but all was over; and the conspirators had now to bethink themselves only of safety. They then, in reality, swore an oath among themselves; and the affrighted young men, carrying their disguises with them, left the body of Downie lying in the hotel. One of their number told the landlord that their entertainment was not quite over, and that they did not wish the individual who was left in the room to be disturbed for some hours. This was to give them all time to make their escape.

Next morning the body was found. Judicial enquiry was instituted, but no satisfactory result could be arrived at. The corpse of poor Downie exhibited no marks of violence, internal or external. The ill-will between him and the students was known; it was also ascertained that the students had hired apartments for a theatrical representation, that Downie had been sent for by them; but beyond this nothing was known. No noise had been heard, and there was nothing to prove that murder had been committed. Of two hundred students at the college, who could find out the guilty or suspected fifty? Moreover, the students were scattered over the city, and the magistrates themselves had many belonging to their own families amongst the number, so it was not desirable to go into the affair too minutely. Downie's widow and family were provided for, and his death long remained a mystery; until about fifteen years after its occurrence, a gentleman on his death-bed disclosed the whole particulars, and avowed himself to have belonged to the obnoxious class of students who murdered Downie.

Cookery.

PLAIN DINNERS.

II.

Bread Soup.

Roast Mutton. Yorkshire Pudding.
Boiled Apple Dumplings.

BREAD SOUP.

BOIL four onions, two turnips, and a small stick of celery, all minced, in a quart of water with a tablespoonful of salt. When the vegetables are tender add another quart of water, break in half a pound of light bread-crusts, and boil gently for twenty minutes. Stir the bread until broken up, add an ounce of butter, pepper and salt to taste, and a teaspoonful of finely-shred parsley.

ROAST MUTTON.

The rules which were given for roasting beef in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 134, apply to roasting either the whole or a portion of a leg of mutton. When ready to dress the meat, wipe it with a damp cloth, sprinkle with flour, pepper, and salt, put it to commence cooking at a quick heat, which will at once dry up the pores and prevent the juice running out. Serve the meat with clear gravy.

By way of a change, the middle cut of a leg of mutton can be stuffed in the same way as a fillet of veal. A fine flavour is given to the stuffing by passing a knife over a clove of garlic and stirring the mixture with the knife. When dressed in this way, a thick, rich brown gravy should be poured over the meat before serving.

YORKSHIRE PUDDING.

Although a very good batter-pudding, suitable for eating with meat, can be baked, it is impossible it can resemble those finished under a joint of meat roasted before the fire, or in Leoni's gas-oven, in which the meat is suspended.

To make the batter, mix ten ounces of the finest flour in a gill of cold water, add, by degrees, a pint of new milk. When it is quite smooth and free from lumps, add a pinch of salt and the yolks of two eggs, and when ready to cook the pudding, beat the whites of the eggs to a strong froth, and stir them in briskly. Let two tablespoonfuls of good dripping get very hot in a tin baking-dish, into which pour the pudding, and put into the oven for a quarter of an hour, until the batter is set. Put the dish with the pudding in the dripping-pan, under the meat, let it remain for an hour, when it should be brown. When you take up the pudding, drain all the fat from it, slide it on a hot dish, cut it into neat square pieces, and serve.

BOILED APPLE DUMPLINGS.

Make a paste of flour and beef-suet in the proportion of four ounces of suet to eight ounces of flour and half a gill of cold water, and roll the paste out to the thickness of the third of an inch, and divide it into square pieces large enough to cover up your apples. Peel the apples, with a scoop take out the cores, put a small piece of paste in each at the bottom, and then fill up the cavity with moist sugar mixed with a little grated lemon-peel or with a clove. Put an apple in the centre of one of the squares of paste, which pinch together at the top and neatly press into shape with the fingers, and when they are all ready drop them one by one into a large saucepan of boiling water, keeping them boiling rather fast for three-quarters of an hour, or longer if the apples are large.

III.

Stewed Macaroni.
Boiled Mutton. Caper Sauce.
Sultana Pudding.

STEWED MACARONI.

Throw a quarter of a pound of the best Italian macaroni into three pints of boiling water with a small teaspoonful of salt, and let it boil fast for twenty minutes. Drain the macaroni as dry as possible in a colander, put it into a clean stewpan with a gill of good gravy and an ounce of fresh butter. Stir over a slow fire for five minutes and serve.

If mushrooms are plentiful, a few stewed in the gravy before putting it to the macaroni make an excellent addition.

BOILED MUTTON.

Put the mutton into a pot of boiling water sufficient to cover it, with the turnips and carrots which are to be served with it. To a gallon of water allow two tablespoonfuls of salt and a large teaspoonful of pepper. Let the pot boil fast for ten minutes; then skim, and draw it to the cooler part of the range, and keep it just at boiling-point for the requisite time. A quarter of an hour to the pound of meat is sufficient, and if it weighs more than eight pounds, time may be calculated something less. If there is no objection, a few onions should be boiled with the meat, and they may be mashed with the turnips or served whole.

To mash the turnips, rub them through a colander into a stewpan, add a small piece of butter and a spoonful of cream, if convenient; work the purée over the fire with a wooden spoon until it is dry. Cut the carrots into neat pieces and serve in a vegetable-dish round the mashed turnips.

It is customary of late to pour caper-sauce over the mutton, but this should not be allowed, both because it is not good style and because many people object to it. A cupful of the liquor in which the meat was boiled, sufficiently salted, may be poured on the dish.

CAPER SAUCE.

Boil a tablespoonful of capers with half a pint of water in a stewpan without the lid for ten minutes. Mash the capers with a wooden spoon so as to bruise each one. Make the water boil up, and stir in one ounce of fine flour mixed smooth in a gill of cold water. When it has thickened, stir in an ounce of butter, let it dissolve; add a pinch of salt, and, if the sauce is not sufficiently acid, a little vinegar.

When the bottle containing capers is put away, take care to fill it up with fresh vinegar, as this prevents mould and loss of flavour.

SULTANA PUDDING.

Butter a pint mould or basin. Lay on it thickly fine sultana raisins which have been carefully wiped and picked, then fill up the basin lightly with the crumb of a French roll cut in rounds, shred an ounce of suet finely and strew over each round. Fill up the mould with a custard made of two eggs and half a pint of milk flavoured with ground cinnamon or lemon-extract. A little finely-shred lemon candied-peel is an improvement to the pudding. It should be placed at the bottom of the basin. This pudding is best steamed, and should be ready in an hour and a quarter. If, however, it must be boiled, it should be done very slowly, and with sufficient water to reach half-way up the pudding-basin.

For sauce, dissolve six lumps of sugar in a tablespoonful of boiling water, add a wineglass of marsala or sherry, put it into a jam-pot, and set it in a saucepan of boiling water to get hot. Just before serving pour it round the pudding.

IV.

Mulligatawny Soup.
Potato Hash. Boiled Cheese.

MULLIGATAWNY SOUP.

Boil a small fresh haddock in a quart of water, with a little salt. When the fish is done take it up, and boil in the liquor four onions, which have been fried brown, and two apples, quartered but not peeled. When these are tender rub them to a pulp, and add to the stock two ounces of flour and two teaspoonfuls of curry-powder, mixed smooth in half a pint of cold milk; stir over the fire until the soup has thickened, then put into it the flesh of the haddock, carefully picked into flakes and free from bones. Let it get hot, but not boil, add salt if necessary, and pour into the tureen. Serve with a little boiled rice.

The stock for this soup might be made of the mutton bones, or of any liquor from the boiled mutton, and, if liked, little pieces of preserved lobster be substituted for the haddock.

POTATO HASH.

Put some cold chopped potatoes into the frying-pan with a little fat, stir them about for five minutes, then add to them an equal quantity of cold meat, cut into neat little squares, season nicely with pepper and salt, fry gently, stirring all the time, until thoroughly hot through.

BOILED CHEESE.

Put four tablespoonfuls of beer into a small saucepan, shred into it a quarter of a pound of good new cheese, and stir briskly over the fire until all is dissolved and it is on the point of boiling, then take it off instantly, for if the cheese is allowed to boil it will become tough. Have ready slices of toasted bread, spread the cheese on them, and serve as quickly as possible.

Sir Joshua Reynolds's Ruffles.

VISITORS to the Exhibition of Sir Joshua Reynolds's works at the Grosvenor Gallery cannot have overlooked the two glass cases, one in each of the large rooms, which contain little personal "belongings" of the first President of the Royal Academy. Opinions vary as to which relic is most interesting. The two dainty silver-handled palette-knives in one case will take the fancy of young lady art-students. The silver loving-cup of such liberal capacities must arrest the attention of every hospitable visitor. The sketch-books have delighted the parents of precocious children, fondly believing that the early art-works of their own nurseries and school-rooms are not inferior to Sir Joshua's, and that they are bringing up future rivals of his fame. The open-paged account-book is a text for economists to preach upon, in which we read that a coachman's wages were twelve pounds a year in the last century, and the entire cost of keeping a carriage and pair of horses, including servants, only one hundred pounds a year.

THE dainty sleeve-ruffles, beside the account-book, will provoke a breach of one of the ten commandments if any lovers of old-point look at them. "Greek, sir," says Dr. Johnson, "is like lace—everyone gets as much of it as he can." And in Sir Joshua's day lace cravats and ruffles were the distinctive mark of a gentleman's attire. The loom had not then been invented to turn out, by thousands of yards daily in one factory, imitations of the old laces which could only be patiently wrought by the needle, or woven upon a pillow. Every gentleman collected lace in the days of George III., and it was one of the evidences that the grand tour of Europe had been made, that fine lace, Italian, French, or Flemish, had been collected and brought home. The cost of the fine laces when brought to England and sold was enormous, for the duty was high. If brought in less quantities than twelve yards the duty imposed was two pounds a yard. This restriction on private dealing in foreign lace was with the double design of increasing the revenue, and of inducing English people to buy the laces of their own country—Devonshire, Buckinghamshire, Nottinghamshire, etc.

LOOKING round the walls of the Grosvenor Gallery, we see all the great men immortalised by Sir Joshua's brush wearing dainty lace. He has only given himself ruffles once—in the portrait of himself in the robes of President of the Royal Academy. It would have been almost impossible for an artist to have worked with deep lace ruffles falling over his hand and smearing the canvas.

AN ell, the measure by which lace was bought, was a yard and a quarter. Each sleeve-ruffle contained an ell and a quarter, and the depth was three or four inches. The satirical poems of that day contained frequent allusions to the fine gentlemen whose ruffles dipped into the sauces at table, and experienced other misfortunes of a like nature. The lace for ruffles was gathered and tacked upon a narrow piece of tape which was sewn to the shirt-sleeve and easily removed or changed.

IN an earlier time, when the second George was king, and he was full of grief at the last illness of Queen Caroline, who died in 1737, he yet failed not to remind his pages, when he had to meet foreign ambassadors on the following day, "to see that new ruffles were sewn on his old shirt-sleeves, whereby he might wear a decent air in the eyes of the representatives of foreign majesty." Fashions lived long in those days, and did not come in and go out with the rapidity of nineteenth century caprices, and the ruffles worn in George II.'s time differed very little, if at all, from those of fifty years later.

THE cravats were of muslin, shawl shaped, edged round with lace. For them Indian muslin was in great repute, being finer, softer, and clearer than any made in England. So large were these cravats that they were put on by placing the centre against the throat in front, carrying the ends to the back, crossing them, bringing them to the front, and tying them loosely with ends flowing. Besides the cravat, breast-frills, or jabots, as they were called, were part of a gentleman's dress.

LADIES were not less greedy of fine lace than gentlemen in those days, but it is easier to understand their indulgence in such outlay than Horace Walpole's, or his friend Mr. Damer's, the wardrobe of the latter selling after his death for fifteen thousand pounds, the lace being its valuable feature. Ladies' dresses, made with elbow-sleeves, had frills of lace depending from them, and these gave a softening tone to the arm, even a bony one looking plump and rounded under the cloudy lace which fell over it. These elbow-frills were known as engageantes, and the name, originating in France, came over with the laces of the seventeenth century from Argentan and Alençon, and soon became naturalised in England. The great pride was in the number of frills upon the sleeve, from one to sixteen rows being worn. From the lace bills of Mary, the consort of William III., we find that a pair of engageantes in her time took a yard and three-quarters of lace, and the price was five pounds ten shillings per yard. The engageantes which the ladies of Sir Joshua's time wore must have required more lace than those of the previous century. One has only to look at the elbow-sleeves upon the canvasses at the Royal Academy or Grosvenor, to see that at least an ell is in each row.

ALENÇON lace had an Italian origin. In Louis XIV.'s time immense sums of money were sent out of France to Italy to pay for the exquisite foreign laces without which no courtier was considered to be properly dressed. Royal edicts forbidding the purchase of foreign laces were of no avail. Court ladies boldly defied the laws and heaped on as much costly lace as they could afford to buy. Colbert, the astute minister of Louis, met the difficulty in a wiser way than by prohibitions. He imported lace-workers, opened schools, and soon supplied both his own country and others with the same fine laces, which from this time were known as Alençon, Argentan, and, roughly speaking, French-point.

It was not without difficulty that the workers were induced to abandon the easy cutwork, which was the work of the peasant women, and learn to make Venetian-point. In their reluctance we sympathise, for the trial to the eyes of such fine work must have severely taxed the health, as the discipline did the tempers. The first productions were heavy flowers in relief—what we now call Venetian and Florentine. These were joined by little bars—technically, "brides." It was not till nearly the middle of the eighteenth century that Alençon lace, like that of Sir Joshua's ruffles, was made—light flowers or sprays, with a very fine meshed ground, a net made stitch by stitch with the needle, known as the réseau ground.

THE lace was worked upon parchment, as ladies of our own day worked braid and point lace stitches upon leather. But instead of the braid, of which the solid parts were formed, the pattern was entirely made with the needle, button-stitch over a thread. The pattern was first traced upon the parchment, which was stitched to a piece of very coarse linen, folded double. The outline of the pattern was then formed by two flat threads, which were guided along the edge by the thumb of the left hand, and fixed by minute stitches, passed with another thread and needle through the holes of the parchment. When the outline was finished, the work was given over to the réseuse to make the ground, the fine network alluded to above. Then the parchment was handed to a fresh worker, who filled up the flowers by rows of button-stitching, so fine that the beauty can only be seen through a magnifying-glass.

THE French Revolution broke up the lace manufacture in France. Not only were the employers of the peasants driven away from the neighbourhood where the workers lived, but there were no purchasers. The Court was gone, and the Republicans who had taken possession of the Tuileries had no taste for lace, and no sympathy with patient, honest, much-enduring women-workers. Under Napoleon there was a lace revival. The Empress Josephine took up the interests of the workers, and lace again became the fashion at the French Court. The Emperor made lace-wearing obligatory, and the Empress had special workers, who were kept in constant employment. To reproduce the lace made for the marriage of Marie Louise, would in the present day cost at least a million of francs. The bed-furniture consisted of tester, curtains, coverlet, and pillow-cases. The Alençon lace, made for the King of Rome's layette, was exhibited at Paris in 1855.

WITH the fall of the First Empire Alençon lost its trade. No new workers were encouraged, and the old ones died out. The invention of bobbin net had revolutionised lace-making in every country. The Duchess of Angoulême in 1830 tried to revive Alençon, and six years later Baron Mercier tried to make the girls work the old patterns on bobbin net, but all in vain. Not till 1851 was there any needle-point made at Alençon worth recording. Then a flounce was sent over to the Great Exhibition, at which thirty-six women had worked for eighteen months. It was valued at twenty-two thousand francs, and was afterwards bought for the trousseau of the Empress Eugénie.

IN 1856 most magnificent orders were given for the imperial layette. The young prince was vouté au blanc; white, therefore, was the prevailing colour in the layette. The curtains of the Prince Imperial's cradle were of needle-point, with Alençon coverlet lined with satin. The christening robe, mantle, and head-dress were all of Alençon; and the three corbeilles, bearing the imperial arms and cipher, were also covered with the same point. Twelve dozen embroidered frocks, each in itself a work of art, were all profusely trimmed with Alençon, as were also the aprons of the imperial nurse. A dress of Alençon point in the Paris Exhibition of 1855 was purchased by the Emperor for seventy thousand francs (£2,800), and presented by him to the Empress. The Empress has sold all these costly laces, and some day we shall hear of the reappearance of special specimens. The dress offered to the Empress by the city of Paris is now in possession of Mrs. Mackay, the wife of the big Bonanza Mine owner, familiarly "The Silver King." It cost a hundred thousand francs, and took fourteen years of the work of some of the ablest lace-women in Paris. The Empress never wore it, and Mrs. Mackay's portrait by M. Bonnat, in the last Salon, shows the lace worn over a long white silk robe, and an immense bouquet of roses carelessly thrown on one side of the train, another nestling in the lace body. The last royal dress of Alençon lace was for poor Queen Mercedes, the first wife of King Alfonso of Spain, whose married life was so brief. Into the lace, which was worn over cream-coloured satin, was wrought the arms of twelve kingdoms of old Spain, rather a curious idea for a lace pattern. The dress had been in hand for ten years before the order was given, and it was only necessary to execute and insert the special features required, the arms and initials.

ALL this travels far away from Sir Joshua Reynolds and his lace ruffles, but it is in reality only the same old story adapted to the tastes and habits of the nineteenth century. Design is more perfect in the present day, but the lace has less character in it, being worked by some eighteen hands, each at special parts, than it had in the olden days when one hand wrought it all, or shared the labour with not more than two others.

Cork and Virgin Cork Work.

MANY useful and ornamental articles can be made with cork, and the work is one that recommends itself to the attention of people who are anxious to send contributions to bazaars, or give presents, and whose capital mainly consists of a willingness to work, and spare time.

THE work can be divided into three kinds: The making of models of churches, ruins, and caves, ornamental articles of shredded cork, and children's swimming-belts from old wine-corks. The cork required is obtained from pieces of waste cork of various sizes; new but bad corks, such as are sold very cheaply by makers, when their unfitness for their original purpose is proved; and by saving up all the old corks that have been used in the house. Discoloured corks are only serviceable for swimming-belts, so beer, lemonade, and soda-water corks are better for the purpose than wine corks. A glue-pot and strong glue, which can be heated over the fire, cardboard, thin laths of wood, old brackets, frames, and boxes, a bradawl, sheet of glass, glass-ruler, several sharp penknives, and some fine wire, complete the necessary requisites.

To make a really correct model of a church or castle it is necessary to design upon separate sheets of paper the various outer walls of the building, and to make these drawings to scale, and exactly the length and height the model is to be. In each correctly indicate the position and size of any opening or projection, such as window, door, turret, buttress, then cut away the spare paper surrounding the design, and paste all the various walls together, upright, and in their proper positions, so as to make a paper model of the desired object. This paper model will show at a glance if the right proportions of the building have been found, and, as it is easily made and altered, will save a great deal of after vexation which is likely to arise when the cork model is finished if it has only been built up haphazard, or from a flat design. Perfect the paper model, cutting out the windows, etc., in it, and then pull it to pieces and lay each part upon thin pieces of deal (the lids of old boxes will do) or upon millboard; mark out the required proportions upon these, and cut out upon the sheet of glass the window-openings, battlements, etc., with a sharp knife, steadied as it cuts by the glass ruler. Before putting the chief walls together line their inside portions with pieces of cork, using the most discoloured for that purpose. Take the penknife and an old cork, and cut the cork into long narrow strips, which glue on so as to cover all the interior walls, so that they may look neat when seen through the windows. Cover the outside walls with fine, even-textured cork, and cut this into small blocks one-eighth of an inch thick and half an inch square. Glue those firmly down with hot glue, and then join the various parts of the building together with fine nails or glue. Put on buttresses made of thin cork where the walls join, or small projections or mouldings; make these of thin strips of cork glued upon each other, to imitate the different rows of moulding. Where mouldings require hollowing out in their centres, heat some wire or a bradawl, and burn the cork to shape by these means, and then scrape off the blackened parts. Window-frames require mouldings and sills. Pieces of glass are sometimes fixed into the window-openings, and narrow pieces of cardboard, covered with cork-dust, put in to imitate the stone mouldings of church windows. If a roof is put on, make it of cardboard, chop up the cork very fine and dust it well over the cardboard, after spreading a layer of hot glue on the surface. To imitate a slate roof, dust powdered slate-pencil and powdered brick over the cardboard instead of cork. Finish the work by glueing pieces of dried moss, lichen, and shaded chenille on to the walls, and covering the ground upon which the model stands with moss and fine gravel. Caves and castles are made in the same way. Old ruins without roofs make the best cork models, and are much easier to make than churches and castles.

To ornament small articles with cork. Frames, baskets, plant-boxes, wall-tidies, flower-pot covers, etc., can be made. For the frames, cut some pieces of deal into the shape of Oxford frames, and take the whitest of the old corks, and shred them with the knife or scissors into very small pieces, not of a uniform size. Prepare a large quantity of these, and also some quite fine cork-dust. Cover a piece of the frame with hot glue, and pour the pieces of cork over it from the hand, and when as many have stuck as possible, fill up the interstices with a shower of cork-dust. Work round the whole frame in this way, then, with a brush, dab hot glue on the cork where it is not sufficiently raised, and pour on those places a second layer of cork pieces. Flat cabinet and promenade photo-frames, made of cardboard, can be ornamented, and if any old velvet photo-frames are to be had, they can be made quite fresh-looking by being thus covered with cork. Cardboard flower-pot covers, wall-tidies, etc., are covered in the same way, but the pieces of cork used upon them are cut into large dice and oblong shapes, and the dust and tiny bits only used to fill up spare corners. An old housemaid's box can be made into a bedroom coalscuttle by being covered with large-sized pieces of cork; black-lead and soap boxes into flower-stands (with tin linings), and flour-barrels into work-tubs. Brackets are made by covering deal with various-sized pieces of cork glued firmly together; hanging baskets of a small size from the half of a cocoa-nut similarly covered, with holes drilled for drainage and to insert a wire handle. This wire handle cover by stringing on to cotton small pieces of cork, and winding this round the wire. Strawberry-punnets, covered first with brown-paper, upon which to glue the cork, fitted with wire handles, and lined with bright-coloured silk, make pretty work-baskets, as do cigar-boxes, covered outside with cork, and lined with silk. The same cigar-boxes, with a slit cut in the lid, make good hall letter-boxes. Another way of using the cork is to make, with strong wire, square and Oxford frames, and then to cut the cork into little blocks half an inch long and one-eighth of an inch thick. String these blocks on to stout thread, so that their points turn every way, and wind the thread round the frames in such a manner that the cork only decorates the front parts, and spaces of plain thread come at the back, by which means a flat back to the frame is given, and a raised and jagged front. Cork can be coloured by being sized, stained with Judson's dyes, or regular stains, and varnished. Sealing-wax varnish gives a look of coral to the cork.

FOR making children's swimming-belts, cut out the shape of the belt on ticking, run fine wire through the old corks, making a hole with the bradawl, and bend the wire, with the corks on it, so that it completely covers the ticking, fitting the corks one into the other, and bending the wire up and down the belt, not round it. Sew the wire to the ticking with stout thread, and make shoulder-straps, also covered with corks. Fasten the belt with a buckle, and string a lot of large pieces of cork as floats round the belt at the waist.

VIRGIN CORK WORK.

BESIDES the many ornaments that can be made from the finer kinds of cork, that bark of the cork-oak that is known as virgin-cork has of late years become a prominent article of decoration for ferneries, blank walls, rustic jardinières, etc., and for ornamenting window-boxes, hanging plant baskets, side and corner wall-pots, and many other objects of out and in door decoration. From the rugged and uneven surface of the bark, and the many fantastic shapes of its natural growth, it is peculiarly adapted to take away the stiff and conventional appearance that is so often associated with new-made conservatories or suburban rustic-work, and it also possesses the merit of lending itself to the worker's ideas, who is thus enabled to create from it many fanciful effects without distorting it into unsightly shapes or taking away from its individuality. Its one fault, that of its liability to harbour insects, is removed by varnishing it upon both sides before using, or by occasionally renewing it. The cork is brought to England in bales, one of the largest importers being the London and Lisbon Cork Wood Company, 28, Upper Thames Street, who have as agents most of the chief seedsmen and florists. The bales of one hundredweight each cost from twenty shillings to thirty shillings, the difference in their price being regulated by the shape of the bark, plain pieces being cheap, and growth that has assumed a tubular form the dearest. When the cork is obtained it should be sorted out, all the best grown pieces put in one bundle, and the smaller and least curious in another.

THE article to be decorated has now to be considered; if it is an already made wooden window-box, there is little trouble over it. Obtain a sheet of common glass, a very sharp shoe-maker's knife (price sixpence), some French wire nails (threepence the pound), and a bradawl. Place the bark upon the glass and cut it into a variety of lengths and sizes, not evenly, but in a rugged, jagged manner. Put the window-box in place, and then nail all the cork on, making a hole in it with the bradawl to allow of the nail going through it. Be careful not to make a straight line anywhere, and to let the edges of the cork hang down far below the edge of the window-box, and also bring them well above its top. Fill in all small spaces with little pieces of cork, and cover over the heads of the nails with putty and a little brown varnish. When the box is quite covered, it is improved by pieces of cork being nailed on to it of funnel and half-round shapes. These filled with earth, and a creeper or small plant put into them, carry the floral decorations below the straight line at the top, and improve the look of the work. Rustic hanging-baskets require a foundation of wood on to which to nail the cork; tin can be used, but to fasten the cork to metal, holes for the nails must be drilled through the metal, or a composition made of one part hot tar to six of pitch, the metal coated with this, and the cork affixed whilst this is hot.

OLD walls when ornamented with cork are particularly effective, especially when cavities, recesses, or jutting-out ledges are contrived into which to introduce ferns and other plants, and so convert an unsightly object into one of beauty; the difficulty in wall-work is affixing the nails through the putty and crevices left in the brickwork. Rustic plant-stands and fountains are very suitable for covering; the stands make with strong wood, and select for their legs boughs or saplings of trees, so that the curves and general shape of the article should appear to be natural; then take tubular pieces of the virgin cork large enough to encircle each leg, and cover over every part; places that are too small to nail cork to, require it to be glued on with gutta-percha. Take a stick of gutta-percha, melt it over a lamp, and while hot stick the cork on with it.

FOR Christmas decoration and for school-treats letters made with virgin cork are useful. Take some of the small pieces of cork and cut the letters out from them, using paper letters as a guide to their shapes, and then colour the larger letters red, by varnishing them well with sealing-wax varnish, or dip them into strong gum and sprinkle them with glass shavings, tapioca, or rice, or stain with Stevenson's stain and varnish with oak varnish. Virgin cork will take most of the wood stains. The cork must be sized after the stain is applied with common glue size, and then varnished with plain varnish.

The Frigate Bird.

AFTER a storm at sea, in distant climes, you may have a chance of observing in a patch of royally-blue sky, a small bird with immense wings, hovering at an altitude of perhaps some ten thousand feet. It is a gull? No, its wings are black. It is an eagle? No, the bird itself is small. It is the little eagle of the seas, the first of the winged race, the audacious navigator who never furls sail, the prince of the tempest, the despiser of danger—the warrior or frigate bird. We have at last reached the limit of the series of which the wingless bird is the starting-point. Here is a bird that is nothing but wing. No body at all, or hardly any, scarcely as big as that of a barn-door fowl, but with prodigious wings, measuring sometimes fourteen feet from tip to tip. Such a bird as this, sustained by nature on such supports, has nothing to do but to float at ease. Does the tempest rage, he mounts to a height in which he finds serenity. The poetic metaphor, false when applied to any other bird, is no figure of speech for him; he literally slumbers upon the storm. If he thinks fit to travel in earnest, distance becomes a thing of naught.

This strange being has, moreover, the royal quality of fearing nothing in the world. Little, but strong and intrepid, he braves all the tyrants of the air. He can despise even the great condor, for before that monster bird could get well on the wing, he would be leagues away. One thing, nevertheless, surprises you; which is, that on closer inspection, the first member of the winged kingdom does not enjoy one particle of the peace which would seem to be promised by a life of such freedom. His eye is cruelly hard, unmerciful, and restless. His twisted attitudes are the contortions of a wretched watchman, who is compelled on pain of death to keep a constant look out over the infinite expanse of ocean. His sight visibly strains at telescopic range, and if it fail him, nature has condemned him, and he dies.

He has scarcely any feet, and such as he has are very short and webbed, unfitted to walk or perch. With a formidable beak, he has not the talons of a veritable sea-eagle. False eagle, although superior to the real in audacity and thievishness, he is inferior in strength, and is unprovided with those invincible claws. He can strike and slay, but can he seize? Hence arises the uncertainty and the hazards of his life, which is that of a corsair or a pirate rather than of a peaceable sailor; and the permanent question written on his face is: "Shall I dine to-day? Shall I be able to feed my young ones to-night?" His superb and enormous expanse of wing becomes, on land, an encumbrance and a danger. In order to take flight, he requires either a high wind or an elevated spot, a peak, or a rocky cliff. Surprised on a sand-bank or a low reef, where he often makes a halt, the frigate-bird is helpless and defenceless; it is to no purpose that he threatens and strikes right and left, he can be easily killed by blows of a stick. Out at sea, these immense wings, admirable at a certain altitude, are ill-adapted to skim the waves. Once wet through, they would become heavy and would sink.

And yet, what can he do? His daily meals are in the waves; he must, therefore, be always approaching them; he is obliged constantly to return to, and beat about the sea which threatens to engulf him. He would perish of hunger if he had not the cunning to find a provider whose rations he devours. His ignoble resource is to attack a heavy and timid bird, the noddy, an excellent fisherman. The frigate-bird, which is not superior in size, pursues him, strikes him on the neck with his bill, and makes him disgorge his prey. All this takes place in mid-air; before the fish falls from the noddy, the frigate-bird has caught it.

The same impudent robber has been known to snatch a fish from a man's hand, and even to hover over a caldron with the hope of snatching morsels of the boiling meat, regardless of the sailors who were engaged in the cookery. Dampier saw sick, old, or crippled frigate-birds establishing themselves on reefs, which seemed to be their hospitals, and levying contributions on the fisheries of their vassals, the juvenile noddies. But while in vigorous health, they rarely alight, but live like the clouds, floating on their outspread wings from one hemisphere to another, taking their chance, and piercing with their implacable gaze the boundless expanse of sea and sky.

Household Gardening.

DIVIDING HARDY FLOWERS.

THE majority of the old favourite perennial plants that are so attractive during the summer and autumn are increased by division of the roots, and the best time for dividing and replanting is in early spring, soon after the young shoots appear from the roots, or fresh growth is seen to be starting.

Almost all kinds of border-flowers may be taken up and replanted now, the exceptions being Carnations and Pinks, especially the former, old-established plants of which should not be severed into divisions at this period of the year.

Plants that may be treated successfully by root-division now are Primroses and Polyanthus of all kinds, Pansies, Violas, Phloxes, Pyrethrums, Delphiniums, Foxgloves, Michaelmas Daisies, and, indeed, almost or quite all kinds, including Chrysanthemums, that die down in the autumn, and push up fresh growths when awakened from their winter sleep.

Usually the outside portions of border plants that are established in clumps are the best for replanting, the centres of the roots being exhausted by having been overcrowded in summer, and enfeebled by impoverished soil. Always, therefore, select those healthy parts, the vigorous crowns and robust shoots, as these offsets invariably make the best plants. The exhausted portions of the roots, if not needed for increase, can be profitably thrown away.

In dividing plants, always secure as many fibrous roots as possible with each division, and take particular care that these are not kept out of the soil a moment longer than is absolutely necessary. It is imperative that the roots be kept moist, or they will shrivel, and the leaves and shoots also, or they will wither, and the plants then receive a serious check, from which they do not readily recover, whereas, if kept perfectly fresh and moist by shading and sprinkling them with water when out of the soil, they scarcely receive any check by being disturbed, but grow freely from the first, and are then certain to flourish.

When renovating a border, dividing and re-arranging the plants, it is always advisable to change their positions when this can be conveniently done. A moment's thought will show the necessity for this. If a plant long remains in one place, it extracts all the particular food from the soil that is requisite for its sustenance. It is in the same position as an animal secured in a certain portion of a field: it will consume every particle of food within its reach, and if not soon given a fresh pasture, will starve. Thus by changing the position of a plant, it is afforded a new pasture, and is consequently invigorated.

But it is often desirable to take up a plant, reduce it in size, discarding the weaker portion and retaining the stronger, and replant in the same position. In this case always dig out a few spadefuls of soil and exchange them with a similar amount from another part of the border. Great benefit is certain to result from this simple process, which has the same effect on the plant as removing it to another site.

In dividing plants, insert the divisions a little deeper than they were before being disturbed; they should, in fact, be planted just below the general level of the ground, leaving each in a saucer-like cavity. Old and long-established roots are commonly raised above the soil by the washing of the earth from them, in which state they soon wither if a term of dry weather occurs. By being planted deeper, the roots are kept cooler and moister, while the cavities in which the plants are placed are convenient for holding water that may be given, and for conveying it direct to the roots. When rooted divisions of plants are inserted, they should always be well watered at the time, and as often as is needed afterwards to prevent the leaves from drooping. The fresher they are kept, the sooner will they be established, as flagging of the leaves always retards the action of the roots.

PLANTING ROCKERIES.

This is an excellent time, choosing mild and dull days for the work, for planting mounds that may be formed in which stones are embedded. These mounds, well furnished, are very ornamental, and plants often succeed on them better than on the level ground.

The sides of these mounds exposed to the full sun may be appropriately planted with the mossy Saxifrages, trailing Sedums, Aubrietias, Arabises, and Iberises, with any of the taller plants above-named between them as room may be available. In cooler or rather shaded places on the mound, Violas, Lilies of the Valley, Primroses, and Polyanthus, and most hardy border-plants will thrive, while for forming a fringe for hanging over the margin, the small-leaved Ivies and Periwinkles, with the accommodating Creeping Jenny are admirably adapted. In the summer, any ordinary bedding-plants, such as Geraniums, Lobelias, and Verbenas, may be inserted for imparting brightness after the spring flowers are over.

For a shaded rockery, which the sun seldom reaches, no plants are comparable to Ferns, and there is no better time for planting them than when the fresh young fronds are just uncoiling, but the roots must be kept constantly moist when out of the ground.

Amongst the most free-growing kinds are the Male Fern, the Lady Fern, and Hart's Tongue Fern; very attractive, also, of lower growth, are the Holly, Oak, and Beech Ferns. These would form the nucleus of a collection that might be added to from time to time. Failing Ferns, or in addition to them, variegated Ivies would render the mound ornamental, with the pretty white Woodroffe, and the gay German Irises. Most or all of the plants named, with many more that are suitable for the purposes in question, are now plentiful in the flower-markets, and can be obtained at a trifling cost. If good plants are procured, carefully planted, and well watered, they will be attractive at once, and improve as the season advances. Rockeries are very suitable for small town gardens, and more of them might be formed with advantage in suburban districts.

BUSH FRUITS.

The most important of the larger fruits have been alluded to, and the best varieties recommended, but not less valuable are the smaller preserving fruits, while they are even more suitable for culture than the others in very small gardens, at the same time being worthy of extended culture in large ones. Grown for commercial purposes they are the most quickly profitable of all, and the produce is always in demand for jam-making purposes. Before the planting season closes it will be well to point out a few of the varieties that are likely to give satisfaction to those who grow them well.

GOOSEBERRIES, CURRANTS, AND RASPBERRIES.

Excellent growers, abundant bearers, and serviceable are all these small fruits, and they can be profitably grown either trained to low walls and fences, or in borders in the open garden.

The most generally useful Gooseberry in cultivation is the Red Warrington, the fruit being valuable in a green state for tarts, and equally so when either green or ripe for preserving; the most generally acceptable of yellow Gooseberries is the Early Sulphur, which is one of the first to ripen; the best white, or greenish yellow, being the Whitesmith. These are largely grown for market purposes, and are often very profitable to the cultivators. Young trees can be purchased for threepence each, and they begin bearing the year after they are planted.

Black Currants are particularly useful for planting in rather moist and shaded places, as the trees grow there freely, and bear abundantly. This is a very wholesome and profitable fruit, and the crops are seldom devoured by birds.

Red and White Currants are also very abundant bearers, but require drained soil, or land that is not wet, also more sun than the black sorts for bringing the crops to perfection.

The best Black Currants are the Black Naples, and Lee's Prolific; the most useful red variety the Raby Castle; the favourite white the White Dutch. No one can err by planting these sorts who has suitable positions for a few trees, and where they thrive satisfactorily, they will give as much pleasure to the cultivator as he can derive from flowers, apart from the value of the fruit.

Raspberries, like Black Currants, rejoice in moisture, and do not object to partial shade. When well grown they are highly remunerative to the cultivator, the fruit always being in demand in town and country. There is no better variety than Carter's Prolific, which grows sturdily and produces large red fruit bountifully. If a Yellow Raspberry is desired, plant the Yellow Antwerp, the fruit of which is pretty, but less useful than the preceding valuable sort.

PRUNING NEWLY-PLANTED TREES.

Pruning should be done immediately after planting, trimming the side-shoots off the main branches to within an inch of the base of each shoot, and shortening the terminal growths, the ends of the leading branches, to about six inches. Raspberry-canecan, newly-planted only, not those established, should be shortened to a foot, then stout growths will spring from the base and produce fine fruiting canes.

Odds and Ends.

WHEN the late Dr. Samuel Butler, Bishop of Lichfield, was a young man, holding a country curacy, the celebrated Dr. Parr, who lived at no great distance, used sometimes to ride over, and take an early dinner with him at Christmas. One occasion the equestrian was overtaken by heavy rain, and reached his destination in a dripping condition. The curate took him immediately into his bedroom, where there was a good fire, and supplied him with a change of clothing. Presently the doctor re-entered, arrayed in his friend's dressing-gown and slippers, with a nightcap pulled over his ears. Ten minutes or so went by in silence, when Dr. Parr raised his head, gave one or two preliminary sniffs, and then looking round, lisped out in tones of deep interest: "Gooth for dinner, Tham?" "I really don't know, doctor. I hope there may be. My housekeeper knows you are fond of geese." Then the appetising odour of a savoury roast pervaded the apartment more and more. "I'm thure it's a gooth, Tham," said the doctor, smacking his lips. "Dinner's ready, please," said the maid, opening the door. Up jumped the guest, and hurried into the bedroom to don the clothes he had left there to dry. Horror of horrors, what a sight met his eye! His cherished head-gear, his well-powdered and pomatumed wig, lay in the fender frizzling in its own fat, and, while browning nicely before the fire, exhaled the odour which had so tickled his olfactory nerves, and raised up hopes only to be thus cruelly overthrown.

THE Earl of Lonsdale was so extensive a proprietor and patron of boroughs, that he returned nine members every Parliament, who were facetiously called Lord Lonsdale's ninepins. One of the members thus designated, having made a very extravagant speech in the House of Commons, was answered by Mr. Burke in a vein of the happiest sarcasm, which elicited from the house loud and continued cheers. Mr. Fox entering the house just as Mr. Burke was sitting down, enquired of Sheridan what the house was cheering. "Oh, nothing of consequence," replied Sheridan; "only Burke has knocked down one of Lord Lonsdale's ninepins."

"You have the advantage of me," said the old merchant blandly. "You will have to get someone to identify you." "Identify me? Why, I am your son, just back from the university for the summer vacation." "May be, may be," answered the old gentleman, "but my son did not look like a fool, wear a cockney hat, monkey-tail coat, shin-tight pants, tooth-pick shoes, nor did he suck cane-handles. When my wife returns from her visit to my sister in the country, you may present your claims to her, and if she decides that you are our offspring, I shall be happy to bid you an affectionate good-bye on your return to the university."

AN attorney, who had many times sent away an impecunious client with equivocal answers regarding his case, was one day disturbed under a press of business by the aforesaid client walking into his office. "You here again?" said the lawyer impatiently. "Yes," answered the client, "you told me to come back another time." "Well, then," retorted the attorney, "I didn't mean this time; I meant some other time."

A CLASS of schoolgirls, highly educated on the newest principles, were pouring forth to the Bishop of Manchester a list of Latin words, with the English equivalents, and they came to the word which we elders should call viciissim. "We-kiss-im," said the girls. "We-kiss-im—by turns." "Oh, do you?" answered the bishop. "Then I don't wonder at your adopting the new pronunciation."

AN editor listened very patiently once to a lengthy and verbose manuscript read to him by its author, who, feeling much flattered at the editor's attention, asked him: "What do you think of it? Is it likely to take with the public?" The editor reflected a few moments, and then answered: "Well, for people who like that sort of thing, I should think it is just the sort of thing they would like."

AN Englishman and a Welshman disputing in whose country was the best living, said the Welshman: "There is such noble housekeeping in Wales that I have known above a dozen cooks employed at one wedding dinner." "Aye," answered the Englishman, "that was because every man toasted his own cheese."

WOMAN, with dog jumping at her, to professor, owner of the animal: "For Heaven's sake, man, call your dog off, or he will upset me." Professor, standing on one foot and scratching his head: "One minute, madam, one minute; (to himself) as soon as I can remember the brute's name."

SOME time ago an old woman who had received a cheque went with great glee to a bank to draw the money. "This cheque is crossed; we can't pay it over the counter, my good woman." "All right, sir; I'll come round, then," was the reply.

THREE gentlemen, whose names were More, Strange, and Wright, being in a tavern, says the last: "There is but one duffer in the company, and that's Strange." "Yes," answered Strange, "here is one More." "Aye," said More, "that's Wright."

A MAD princess of the house of Bourbon, on being asked why the reigns of queens were in general more prosperous than the reigns of kings, replied: "Because, under kings, women govern—under queens, men."

HUSBAND: "Well, my dear, did you see some beautiful things on your mountain excursion?" Wife: "No; the guide told me to look where I walked; so all I saw was my boots."

J. J. ROUSSEAU was one day showing his "Ode to Posterity" to Voltaire. "Do you know," said the sage, "I'm afraid your 'Ode' will never be forwarded to its address."

ABOUT the guiltiest-looking people in this world—A man accused of a crime of which he is innocent, and a newly-married couple trying to pass for veterans.

TWO farmers had a dispute about the boundary lines of their farms. The dispute is now settled, and so are the lawyers—on their farms.

WHEN a man puts his old green gingham umbrella up on the shelf, he is wisely laying up something for a rainy day.

ONE evening between nine and ten o'clock, Lord B.'s butler discovered a burglar hiding in a china-closet. The butler took the depredator to his master, who happened to be in his study at the time, and asked whether he should send for a policeman. "Certainly," replied his lordship, "or rather, I'll ring for one," and so saying, he rang the bell. A servant appeared, whom his lordship requested "to go into the kitchen and bring up a policeman or two." The domestic returned and said there was no policeman on the premises. "What!" exclaimed his lordship, "do you mean to tell me that with a plain cook and three housemaids in my employ, there is no policeman in my kitchen? It is a miracle, and our prisoner shall reap the benefit of it. Butler, let the man go instantly."

A POPULAR dramatist was at a party the other evening, and, coming out, was with a crowd of other gentlemen at the door. One of them mistook him for a waiter. It is a kind of blunder that is not unfrequently made, and originates in a pardonable and warranted misconception. "Oh, please," said the guest, "call me a four-wheeler." "Certainly I will," said the dramatist; "you are a four-wheeler." He then waited till the storm of indignation on the part of the mistaken guest and of amusement on the part of all the others had subsided, before he added: "You know I cannot call you a hansom."

DR. ABERNETHY, the celebrated physician, was never more displeased than by hearing a patient detail a long account of troubles. A woman, knowing Abernethy's love of the laconic, having burned her hand, called at his house. Showing him her hand, she said: "A burn." "A poultice," quietly answered the learned doctor. The next day she returned and said: "Better." "Continue the poultice," replied Dr. A. In a week she made her last call, and her speech was lengthened to three words: "Well; your fee?" "Nothing," said the physician; "you are the most sensible woman I ever saw."

THE Duke of York once remarked to Colonel W. at the mess of the 11th Regiment, that the colonel was uncommonly bald, and, although a much younger man than His Royal Highness, he stood more in need of a wig. The colonel, who had been of very long standing in the service, and whose promotion had been by no means rapid, informed His Royal Highness that his baldness could easily be accounted for. "In what manner?" asked the duke. "By my junior officers stepping over my head," was the reply. The gallant colonel received promotion in a few days.

THE most powerful king on earth is working; the laziest king, shir-king; the most popular king, smo-king; and the most disreputable, jo-king; and the leanest one, thin-king; and the thirstiest one, drin-king; and the slyest, win-king; and the most garrulous one, tal-king. And then there is the hac-king, whose trade's a perfect mine; the dark-skinned monarch, black-king, who cuts the greatest shine; not to speak of ran-king, whose title's out of the question; or famous ruler, ba-king, of good finance digestion.

DR. WHATELY once asked a roomful of divines why white sheep eat so very much more than black sheep. One person advanced the opinion that black being a warmer colour than white, and one which never fails forcibly to attract the sun, black sheep could do with less nutriment than their white contemporaries. At these profound speculations Dr. Whately shook his head gravely and then proceeded to explain: "White should eat more because there are more of them."

SIR WALTER SCOTT, on being asked to sit for his portrait for Terry, the actor, said that both he and his dog "Maida" were tired of that sort of thing; Maida particularly so, for she had been so often sketched, that whenever she saw an artist unfurl his paper and arrange his brushes, she got up and walked off with a dignity and expression of loathing almost human.

"WHY will you associate with such men as Flimsy?" asked Brown. "For my part, I always endeavour to associate with men who are my superiors." "It can't be hard work for you to find them," replied Jones, "but I am different from you. I am always willing that my friends should associate with their superiors."

LORD NORTH, who was very corpulent before a severe sickness, said to his physician after it: "Sir, I am obliged to you for introducing me to some old acquaintances." "Who are they, my lord?" enquired the doctor. "My ribs," replied his lordship, "which I have not felt for many years until now."

"THE sun is all very well," said an Irishman, "but the moon is worth two of it; for the moon affords us light in the night-time when we want it, whereas the sun's with us in the day-time, when we have no occasion for it."

SHE was a sweetly inexperienced housekeeper, as one may gather from her remark when someone suggested that she should purchase spring mattresses. "Yes," she replied, "if they are in season we'd better have some."

As a stout old lady got out of a crowded omnibus the other day, she exclaimed: "Well, that's a relief, anyhow." To which the driver, eyeing her ample proportions, replied: "So the 'osses thinks, mum."

A TRAVELLER, enquiring at a feudal castle whether he could see the antiquities of the place, received the simple answer from a servant: "I am sorry, sir, my lady and her daughters have gone to town."

"My daughter," said a pompous old gentleman, "you must never listen to flatterers." "But, papa," said the young lady, "how can I tell that they are flatterers unless I listen?"

AN account of East End destitution states that the match-making is almost wholly in women's hands. It is precisely the same in the West End.

MANY speak the truth when they say that they despise riches and preferment, but they mean the riches and preferment possessed by other men.

A SMART young man picked up a flower in the ball-room after all the girls had gone, and sang pathetically, "Tis the lost rose of some her."

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTIONS.

FLIES IN AMBER will be glad to know where he can find the following verse:

For every evil under the sun
There is a remedy, or there's none;
If there is one, try and find it;
If there isn't, well, never mind it.

JOAN D. will be glad to have the names of songs in which the following words occur:

I've a cot in the valley,
Come share it with me.

And:

Lightly beats, lightly beats
The heart that never Felt the pangs, felt the pangs
That wait on love.

Also to know where she can find a short poem entitled "The Ivy and the Bell."

ANSWERS.

A GREAT ADMIRER OF "HOUSEHOLD WORDS" AND ONE SADLY PERPLEXED.—It is not easy to form a correct opinion regarding your trouble without a personal interview. However, the following general directions may help you. Attend carefully to your general health; if you are not well consult a doctor. Avoid indigestible food, and do not drink much tea or alcohol. Do not overwork either mentally or physically. Avoid mental anxiety as much as you can. Do not overtax your memory. Do not seek to have too many fresh impressions, for, of course, this will give you weak memory unnecessary work, whereas it really requires rest. In the meantime do not do any mental work that you find worries or annoys you. Sleep as much as you can. Take a cold bath every other morning if you find it agrees with you. Take a teaspoonful of the following mixture three times a day in a wineglassful of water after meals. Any chemist will supply it. Easton's syrup and simple syrup, of each one ounce, mixed together. Always shake the bottle before taking the medicine.

ASPHYXIA SMITH.—Apply to any first-class governesses agency, a list of which you will find in the London Post Office Directory, under the head of "Governesses' Institutions."

BWILDERED.—1. Like many other apparently incredible feats, that of the egg in the bottle is easily accomplished when you know the secret. You must take an egg and soak it in vinegar, and in process of time its shell will become quite soft, so that it may be extended lengthwise without breaking. Then insert it into the neck of a bottle, and, on pouring cold water upon it, it will assume its former figure and hardness. 2. When you cut indiarubber, keep the blade of your knife wet, and you can cut it without difficulty.

CAFÉ AU LAIT.—1. Certainly you are entitled to have the article you ask for, and to require that it shall be that which it is represented to be. At the same time, our own experience is that coffee supplied at restaurants is generally better when made from the essence than from fresh coffee. There is a great difference in the quality of essence of coffee, and some brands have a very little true coffee flavour. The Café Viorgo (Allen and Hanbury, or Ridgway and Co.) is delicious. It is guaranteed to contain no admixture whatever, and, from some experience in the use of various kinds of essence of coffee, we are able to say we know of none comparable in quality and strength to the Café Viorgo.

CARRARA.—1. Your interesting paper on the production of a marble statue is too long for the correspondence page. 2. A celebrated sculptor has calculated that the aggregate of weight thrown on the production of a life-sized statue in marble, of the most delicate workmanship, is not less than 155,520 tons, or 17,318,240 lbs. avoidupois.

CLAPTON.—We do not understand your term of "double florin." The coin called the "Godless florin," 1848, because the D.G. was omitted from the inscription, was smaller and thicker than that now in circulation, and, in deference to public opinion, the issue was not repeated. Perhaps your coin is the five-shilling piece, called the Gothic crown, 1847, the die of which broke, and, on account of the expense, was not remade.

H. A. DABBS.—The volume of the "Golden Floral Series," containing "The Curfew Must Not Toll To-night," can be had, post-free, 5s., from the Manager, New Book Court, Crystal Palace, Sydenham.

H. E. LE B.—The story of the Pastoral Staff which budded is given in a poem by the Hon. Julian Fane and Lord Lytton, and is as follows: A wicked knight desired to be absolved from his sins, and he asked a bishop to shrive him. He was told that God was very merciful, and was asked to confess his sins. He told one of them, and his bishop said that God was very good and would forgive it. He told another, and the bishop said again that God, in His great mercy, would forgive him even that. When, however, he confessed for the third time some very great offence, the bishop said: "Sooner than God can forgive so great a crime, my staff will burst forth into leaf." The knight went away in great grief, but was soon after killed, and brought back to the place where the bishop lived to be buried. As the funeral service was being performed, the bishop's staff broke out into leaves, showing that God had pardoned all the knight's sins.

IGNORAMUS.—1. Certainly not. 2. Eisteddfod (pronounced i-steth-vöd), a sitting, an assembly, as of magistrates, etc.; a meeting, an assembly, or session of bards and minstrels held in Wales in ancient times. These meetings were revived by the Tudor sovereigns, and annual meetings for the recitation of prize poems and performances on the harp are now held under this name. 3. The Elgin Marbles are a collection of ancient statues discovered on the island of Egina, supposed to have originally decorated the temple in that island sacred to Pallas Athênê. They are before the age of Phidias, so, although true to nature generally, their faces are characterised by that forced smile which gives an unpleasant expression to the earlier Greek sculptures. They are the most remarkable ornaments of the Glyptothek of Munich.

INQUIRER C.—Your best plan will be to offer your stamps to Mr. Lincoln, 462, Oxford Street, W.

JEUNESSE DORÉE.—The following are the words of "Some Day":

I know not when the day shall be
I know not where our eyes may meet,
What welcome you may give to me,
Or will your words be sad or sweet;
It may not be till years have passed,
Till eyes are dim and tresses grey;
The world is wide, but love at last
Our hands, our hearts, must meet some day.
Some day, some day, some day I shall meet you,
Love, I know not when or how (bis),
Only this, only this, only this,
That once you loved me;
Only this—I love you now,
I love you now, I love you now.

I know not are you far or near,
Or are you dead, or do you live;
I know who the blame should bear,
Or who should plead, or who forgive;
But when we meet, some day, some day,
Eyes clearer grown, the truth may see,
And every cloud shall roll away,
That darkens love: 'twixt you and me.
Some day, some day, etc.

ROBIN.—1. You can give the notice in writing in the form of a letter, and must take care to have an acknowledgment of its receipt from the landlord. 2. We can hardly advise about the garden matters, as we do not know the nature of the agreement. One thing is certain, you are not entitled to take away any of the soil.

WILL-O'-THE-WISP.—The epigram is generally known as Swift's, but as it is really a translation of the French of Scévole de Sainte-Marthe, the friend of Henry IV. of France, Swift can only enjoy the credit of having accomplished a most perfect rendering with the raciest and freshest of English:

Sir, I admit your general rule,
That every poet is a fool;
But you yourself may serve to show it,
That every fool is not a poet.

WILY VIVIAN.—1. You will see that your enquiry was inserted last week. 2. We should hardly like to think that so well educated a correspondent as yourself is in any difficulty about the pronunciation of words in such common use as those you mention, and about which there is no dispute. 3. We cannot find the author of the quotation.

Miss Halkett's Pride.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

"SHALL I light the candles, ma'am?"
"No, thank you, Jane; I will ring when I require them."

The old servant glanced at her mistress a little wistfully. Possibly she doubted the apparently cold indifference with which the words were spoken. She was turning to leave the room, but paused to look back, her hand on the handle of the door.

"It's a chilly night, ma'am; shall I have a bit of fire lighted in the grate?"

"No, thank you, Jane," Miss Halkett said again, a little more firmly this time.

Jane understood that her mistress wished to be alone. With a sigh, and a dismal shake of the head, she withdrew, closing the door softly behind her.

It was a dreary room at all times, but doubly so now in the fast fading light of a late autumn evening. Nearly half an hour had passed since the sun had set sullenly behind the rugged line of hills which marked the horizon; the temporary brightness in the west had changed to a sickly yellow, whilst leaden-hued clouds crept up one over another in the distance. The wind sighed and moaned around the old house, sometimes sinking to a mere saddened whisper, then rising to a despondent wail.

Miss Halkett shivered a little, and drew the white cashmere shawl somewhat more closely round her upright figure. Very upright and unbending always, but to-night more so than ever. There was something almost rigid in the dim outline of her form as she sat there in the window gazing out with unseeing eyes into the gathering darkness, her head held high as she had always held it, the lips a thought more compressed, perhaps, and the lines about the mouth a trifle more drawn, but to a casual observer, proud, and hard, and unsympathetic. Her folded hands rested on her lap; beneath the long, white, interlaced fingers lay an open letter.

The lawsuit which had lasted so long, and on which so much depended, was over at last, and she had lost. The law had decided against her, as it seemed to Miss Halkett the whole world had been against her always. And now she was penniless.

Beneath that cold, impassive exterior what bitter indignation raged—what angry resentment at the cruel injustice of it all. For it was not just, if legal, and between those two words, which should be synonymous, what a gulf exists sometimes!

No one doubted that Colonel Halkett had intended his only daughter to inherit all he died possessed of, yet, through some ill-worthing of the will—some quibble of law—all was to pass to the next male heir, a nephew with whom he was known to have been on bad terms. He would receive all—money, land, everything—excepting only Raven Hall itself, which Fortune, as if in mockery, suffered Miss Halkett to retain.

A large Elizabethan mansion was Raven Hall, with numerous echoing corridors in which one could lose oneself, a dining-hall capable of seating two hundred guests, and reception-rooms in profusion. Of what use could such a dwelling be to one in Miss Halkett's present position?

The same letter which told her of her defeat, suggested that Mr. Halkett would probably be prepared to purchase it on most liberal terms. Her lawyer took it for granted that she would sell it, and naturally Mr. Halkett, her cousin and successful rival, would desire to possess the Hall, standing as it did in the very centre of his property; he would be willing to offer more for it than anyone else would care to—in fact, Miss Halkett had doubtless only to name her own price.

But this Miss Halkett had not the slightest intention of doing. She was not going to part with Raven Hall either to Geoffrey Halkett, or to anybody else.

This was the fixed determination at which she had arrived. It would be a terrible struggle, she knew that—pride against poverty; but she had a strong will, and she vowed to herself that, so long as breath remained in her body, she would never leave the Hall. If she sold it, her cousin would in some way manage to gain possession of it, so she would part with it to no one. He should not even have it after her death, for she would on the very next day make a will, directing that when she died it should be converted into a home for incurables.

She almost laughed even in her agony of mind as this thought occurred to her, and as the watery light of the now risen moon came momentarily from behind the clouds, and, creeping through the diamond window-panes, rested on her face, there was a look of triumph in the eyes usually so expressionless, and for an instant the thin lips curled into a smile.

But the corners of the mouth soon drooped again, and a sharp, short, painful sigh escaped her. Rising suddenly, as if determined to give herself no more time for reflection, she made her way across the darkened room and rang the bell.

Jane, who was anxiously awaiting the summons, entered with candles almost before the sound had ceased.

If she had expected to see any trace of emotion on her mistress's face she was mistaken.

"Desire Mrs. Brown to come to me; I wish to see her at once."

That was all Miss Halkett said, but Jane's heart misgave her as she went to the housekeeper's room to deliver the message. Never had Mrs. Brown been summoned at this hour before—something surely was wrong, as she had feared.

She awaited the housekeeper's return with the greatest impatience and perturbation.

Soon her heavy footsteps were heard hurriedly descending the stairs. She came in with flushed cheeks and panting breath, and dropped helplessly into the nearest chair.

"What is it?" cried Jane, her own face white with fear. "I knew all wasn't right, I felt it. For goodness sake, Mrs. Brown, let me know the worst!"

"And the worst it is," sobbed the housekeeper hysterically. "The whole household is to have notice this very night, and to-morrow we leave the Hall with a month's wages, every one of us, from the highest to the lowest."

Jane stepped back a step or two, gasping for breath; then, recovering herself quickly, she set her lips together with a look of determination very like her mistress's.

"That I'll never do," she said decidedly. "I've been here this thirty years, and I'll not leave her now till I am turned out by force," and with a firm step she retraced her way upstairs.

"Please, ma'am, I've come to tell you I am not going."

"Not going, Jane! I do not understand you."

Miss Halkett was seated at a table writing. She did not look up as she spoke, but, though she showed no surprise, her voice trembled slightly, if Jane's ears did not deceive her, so she took courage and advanced a few yards, then, unable to control herself any longer, raised her apron to her eyes and burst into tears.

"Oh, ma'am, what have I done that you should send me from you?"

Very slowly and deliberately Miss Halkett wiped her pen, placed it carefully on the rack, then, pushing her chair a little from the table, at last raised her eyes.

"I do not know, Jane, that it has ever been my habit to give explanations and reasons for what I do. Is it not enough that I say it must be so?"

"Not enough for me, ma'am. Oh, dear Miss Caroline, let me stay! You'll never get another woman to know your ways so well. Haven't I been your maid since you were a young lady still in the schoolroom? You'll never like a stranger about you—never. Oh dear, ma'am, I can't go—I can't, indeed!"

The words came spasmodically between her sobs, her body swayed to and fro in her grief, and now she cast herself on her knees before her mistress.

Miss Halkett turned her head aside, coughed, cleared her throat once or twice, endeavoured to rise, forcing at the same time a stern expression of disapproval to her face. But it was no use, her softer woman's nature for once prevailed over her pride. With a half-suppressed cry her overwrought feelings gave way, and she fell forward sobbing on the old woman's neck, weeping as uncontrollably and passionately as she had done many a time long ago when she was a wayward, wilful girl of fourteen, and Jane a comely young woman of thirty.

Three months had passed since the servants had been discharged from Raven Hall. Since then the only inmates of the old house had been Miss Halkett and Jane.

Only three months, yet already the Hall looked terribly neglected. Weeds had sprung up in the drive, the grass on the lawn was grown rank and wild, the flower-beds—with their frost-bitten, blackened plants still in them—were covered with withered leaves.

A storm had ruthlessly torn the Virginia-creeper in several places from the walls, and uprooted one of the chestnut-trees which bordered the terrace. It lay there on the moss-grown gravel, its gaunt bare branches stretched out like naked arms across the drive, so that in order to approach or leave the house one would be forced to step across it.

But no visitors ever came to the Hall now. Miss Halkett sternly denied herself to all, friends and acquaintances alike. She, who in her pride had counted herself so far above them, would not suffer them to gloat over her fall, to gratify their curiosity by witnessing her poverty and then turn their backs upon her. No, she would be the first to renounce them, and so saw no one, nor took one step beyond the terrace.

But even in this isolated position whispers from the outside world reached her, and it came to her knowledge that Geoffrey Halkett was returning to England to claim his own.

Jane heard the news, and thought it right to mention the fact to her mistress. It was said that a residence was to be erected at once not a stone's-throw from the Hall.

Miss Halkett heard all in cold silence; but when her maid left her her manner changed; she became nervous and excited, and paced up and down the room restlessly.

He was coming home! Geoffrey Halkett was coming home!

That was what kept repeating itself in her mind. Twenty years had passed since he went away, yet even now the colour rushed to her very brow, and involuntarily her hands clenched as, with a sudden rush of recollection, she recalled how they had parted.

Once they had been plighted lovers, believing, trusting in each other. Geoffrey was poor; his father had been a ne'er-do-well and married beneath him. Colonel Halkett, with high aspirations for his daughter, sternly refused his consent to their union, and forbade his nephew the house. But the young people still found means of meeting, and many letters passed between them.

Things went well enough for a time, but by-and-by a cloud appeared on the horizon in the shape of another suitor for Miss Halkett's hand—a nobleman, rich, and favoured by her father, handsome, attractive, and with fascinating manners.

Perhaps it is not altogether surprising that she was a little dazzled by his attentions. She meant to be true to Geoffrey, but as time went on and the prospects for their future still looked gloomy as ever, she began to despond. If she were never to be Geoffrey's wife, she might just as well accept the brilliant position which was offered her.

One day her cousin received a little note from her, saying that it was useless fighting against fate, and that she had promised to marry Lord Daintree.

However, her faithlessness soon met with its reward. Lord Daintree's affections appeared to cool from the day of their betrothal. Perhaps he perceived that Miss Halkett had no love to give him; and when it came to his ears that she had broken off an engagement with her cousin in order to accept him, he in his turn declined the honour of her hand.

Of course Miss Halkett's pride was seriously wounded, but deep down in her heart was a feeling of relief that she was free once more to love Geoffrey, whom she had found it impossible to forget, and who in a month was to sail for India.

He need not go now; he would soon hear that Lord Daintree was gone, that they were no longer engaged, and he would write to her—yes, surely he would write.

Day by day she anxiously awaited a letter, but it never came, and one day, when by chance she met her cousin, he passed her with a distant bow.

"He does not know," she thought. And that same evening she wrote to him, a humble, penitent letter, begging him to forgive her, and acknowledging that she had never ceased to love him.

When the time passed and the days went by till but one remained, and still no answer came, she grew desperate. She could not let him go without one word. On the morrow he was to leave. Perhaps they might never meet again. See him she must, even if she had to humble herself before him, and beg him to take her with him. Accompanied by Jane, she left the Hall in the dusk and took the way through the park to his house. When they were near it, Jane went on and told him that her mistress was without, wishing to see him.

With what breathless anxiety Miss Halkett waited for him! She started forward with a glad cry of joy when she saw him coming, and involuntarily she held out both hands. But they soon dropped helplessly to her side, and she stood there trembling and with bowed head, for there was no welcome, no sign of pleasure on his face, only stern, haughty disapproval and contempt.

The words she would have spoken died upon her lips; she cowered from him, covering her face with her hands. He showed her no mercy; he loved her with all the strength of his nature; he longed even then to take her in his arms and clasp her to his breast; but he could not forgive her for all that she had made him suffer; he longed to make her suffer in her turn. So he hardened his heart against her, whilst the very smarting of his love made his words the more cruel.

"You left me of your own accord," he said bitterly. "I am poor—your inferior in every way. You were quite right to throw me over for so noble and wealthy a suitor as Lord Daintree. Whilst he was here no thought of me ever crossed your mind. Now that he has jilted you—jilted you," he repeated with cruel emphasis,

"you come to me! Oh, Caroline Halkett, you little know me if you think that I will receive you now."

It was from that day that Miss Halkett grew cold and hard. The love which she had had for her cousin turned to hate, because she had humiliated herself to him and he had scorned her.

They did not meet again, for he sailed on the following day, and had remained abroad ever since.

And now he was coming home after twenty years' absence!

Some weeks later, he presented himself at the Hall and desired to see Miss Halkett.

"He has come to treat for my only possession," she thought bitterly. "He might leave me here in peace."

And she sent down a message by Jane, saying that she would not see him, then or ever.

But when she heard the door close behind him, she went to the window and gazed after him eagerly. The same upright figure she remembered so well; a trifle stouter, perhaps, and the dark brown hair was thickly sprinkled with grey. He was five years older than she, but she noticed, with a jealous pang, that he was a handsome man still, whilst she—

She had never regretted her lost beauty before, but now she could hardly repress a groan. At the same moment he turned and glanced up at the very window near which she stood. She let the curtain fall back suddenly to its place, and stepped back, pale and ashamed.

Had he seen her? The thought dyed her white cheeks with crimson, as if she had been a girl, and set her heart beating violently.

For many days after that she did not leave the house, but at length she ventured out for her accustomed walk on the terrace.

It was a cold raw day, and flakes of snow were falling, but, lost in her own thoughts, Miss Halkett paid no heed to the weather. Wrapped in a large crimson shawl, a corner of which she had thrown over her head in lieu of a bonnet, she paced sadly to and fro.

Presently a feeble cry at her feet attracted her attention. Looking down, she perceived a tiny bird, half-starved and cramped with hunger and cold. She stooped, and endeavoured to take it in her hand, but in its fright it managed to elude her, and, flapping its stiffened wings, flew a few yards farther. She followed it, but each time, as she tried to seize it, it escaped her.

At length, faint and exhausted, it suffered itself to be captured.

She had been so eager in the chase that she had forgotten her determination never to leave the terrace, and now, to her dismay, she found that she was some distance from the house, and that she was standing on her enemy's land. Close at hand, from behind a clump of lime-trees, came the sound of voices, of hammering and sawing. Workmen were there, busy on the new building. Perhaps, even now, Geoffrey was there also, superintending the work. The thought made her turn in alarm and begin to retrace her way hurriedly.

The sound of footsteps behind caused her to quicken her pace. Gradually they gained on her. The next moment Geoffrey Halkett stood beside her.

She turned and faced him defiantly, drawing herself up proudly to her full height, waiting for him to speak.

"Caroline—Miss Halkett, I beg that you will listen to me," he said eagerly.

In his earnestness he ventured to lay his hand on her arm. She shook it off angrily, and moved a little farther from him.

"Why need we be enemies?" he implored. "Surely twenty long years should have ended all anger and resentment. I know that you have much to forgive, but we were both wrong, and now—"

"Say no more," she interrupted passionately; "you talk of forgiveness—you! You, who have made me a beggar, who have robbed me of my inheritance!"

With her right hand she waved him from her, her left still held the little half-frozen bird close against her breast.

"Listen to me, Geoffrey Halkett. I am already learning what it is to suffer from cold and hunger, what it is to lack the common necessities of life. The world does not know what I suffer, but I tell you, that you may know how impossible it is I can ever feel anything but hatred for the man who has brought me to this. Look around, right and left, almost as far as you can see is the land that was mine, that I had every right to believe would be mine as long as I lived. And now it is yours, you have stolen it from me. And I—I live there in the midst of it all, selling my jewels to obtain food, and seeing my home falling to ruin about me. Can you guess what all this is to me?"

"Is it so bad as that? Oh, my poor Caroline, if I had but known. But you must hear me, there is much that I can explain. Believe me, I am not so much to blame as you think. Do not judge me until you have heard all."

But she turned from him angrily, and holding up her hand to forbid him to follow her, she continued her way towards the Hall.

Miss Halkett was seated at breakfast—a very mengre breakfast of bread-and-milk, but the table was laid with as great care and neatness as of old. A large bowl of roses filled the room with their sweet perfume, and the bright morning sunshine came streaming in through the open window.

For winter had passed, the spring had come and gone, and summer was here with its blessed light and warmth. How blessed, Miss Halkett had never fully realised until now.

When Jane came in to remove the cloth, her ordinary staid demeanour was changed to one of unusual excitement.

"Oh, ma'am, forgive me for speaking, but there's something you ought to know. They say that Mr. Halkett never meant to take the property. He was away in Africa, or some outlandish country, where he got no papers nor letters, nor knew nothing of what was going on here at all. It was his brother who acted for him. And only when it was too late did he learn what had happened."

She spoke so rapidly that her mistress could not have stopped her even if she had wished to do so. Turning very pale, she enquired in a scarcely audible voice:

"Who told you this?"

Jane did not answer immediately; Miss Halkett had to repeat the question before she found courage to reply to it.

"Forgive me, ma'am," she said at length, "I couldn't help it; I knew you would be angry at my speaking with him. He has met me ever so many times, and tried to get me to give you letters. He said you only returned unread those he sent through the post. But I told him it would be all the same if I took them, for you'd be sure not to look at them."

"Of whom are you speaking?" demanded Miss Halkett severely.

"Of Mr. Geoffrey, ma'am. He looked so sad and ill, and I couldn't get away, for he held me by the arm. It was when I came back from the farm just now, where I had been for a couple of eggs. He'd been watching for me and made me listen to him, and—and, ma'am, I don't know if I have done right or wrong, but I have brought this."

So saying she took a letter from her pocket, and placing it on the table before her mistress, went quickly from the room, determined to be deaf for once if she were recalled.

Miss Halkett sat for some time motionless, thinking over this new aspect of affairs. Presently she glanced at the note, hesitated, glanced at it again, and finally, taking it up, broke the seal and read. Mr. Halkett had written asking her to be his wife.

"It is pity—pity that made him do it!" she muttered to herself, her eyes flashing angrily. "This is the only way by which he can restore to me my property. Does he think for one moment that I shall accept such a sacrifice? I am beginning to look an old woman already, but he is a fine man still, and good-looking. He might marry anyone. No one shall say that he has taken me out of pity."

So she wrote a short but decisive refusal at once, and sent Jane off to the post with it. Better die of starvation than be Geoffrey Halkett's wife out of pity.

And very near starvation it was getting now, for those two poor lonely women. Luckily they suffered no longer from the cold with which they had had to battle more than once through the long and severe winter, but Miss Halkett's last jewel was sold, and the only available articles which could be disposed of were some flounces of old lace which had been on her mother's wedding-gown, and with which she had been loth to part.

One by one, and for shamefully small sums, these had to go too, and with great economy a few more months passed over.

Soon the furniture would have to be sold or they must starve. Jane believed the shame of it would kill Miss Halkett. She turned over in her mind some means by which the evil day could at least be postponed.

At length a thought struck her. Taking up a candle she made her way to the long-disused drawing-rooms. The curtains were of heavy satin brocade; she could easily make them up into a bundle and send them to London the next morning. The same dealer who bought the jewels and lace would be sure to offer something for them, and no one need know but they were going to be cleaned.

Fetching some steps, she mounted them, and unhooking the curtains, threw them over her arm and left the room. But loaded as she was she carried the candle—a common dip, one with a flaming wick—crookedly. A sudden draught blew a spark from it towards the windows against some light muslin curtains which had hung there with the others. Jane went out, closing the door after her, little knowing the mischief she had done.

That night the whole neighbourhood was aroused by hearing the great bell ringing at Raven Hall, and seeing volumes of smoke rising from the midst of the park.

Miss Halkett and her maid slept in adjoining rooms in a comparatively new wing of the building, and the farthest side from where the fire first broke out; consequently it had already made rapid progress before they were aware of it.

At last Jane was awakened by a strong smell of burning. Throwing a shawl over her head, she went downstairs, and to her horror and dismay perceived that the house was on fire.

To arouse her mistress was the work of a moment. In a few frightened words she told her what had happened.

Miss Halkett got up and began to dress.

"Oh, ma'am, don't wait! For Heaven's sake, come!"

Jane tried to throw a dressing-gown over her, but Miss Halkett put it aside deliberately. She showed no sign of fear.

"It wanted but this," she was thinking. "I had only the house, and even that will be taken from me!"

In a calm voice she told Jane to go down to the yard and ring the big bell. She supposed it was her duty to summon assistance, but in her heart she felt that fate was against her and no help could avail.

If she were to die here in the old house, would it not be better? Her troubles would be over then, whereas if she lived she would be houseless and a beggar! The thought almost maddened her. Horrible visions of ending her miserable days with paupers in a workhouse came to her; she could not bear it. Better death a hundred times than that. She would perish in the fire!

Once this fearful resolution was taken, she became strangely calm—the calmness of despair, perhaps, but still calmness. Going to her dressing-case, she took from a secret drawer in it a packet of letters, her only remaining treasure. All, with one exception, written over twenty years ago. No need to read them, she knew them all by heart. Then, kneeling down beside the bed, she tried to pray.

To pray! when she was about to commit so great a sin.

But it was no use, she knew the falseness of her reasonings. It was pride—pride alone which tempted her to choose death rather than face the world. There were many—many who would willingly help her if she could bring herself to accept their help—she had known it all along.

No, no; she could not die—she dared not die!

Staggering to her feet, she groped her way to the door.

Too late! As she opened it, clouds of hot, suffocating smoke drove her back. The staircase and corridor were on fire. She had delayed too long!

Rushing to the window, she threw it open and looked out. Crowds of people were on the terrace below. They waved their arms and shouted to her, but their voices were drowned by the roaring and crackling of the fire.

Flames were issuing from a window beneath her; they curled upwards towards her greedily, as if eager to reach her. Already their scorching breath enveloped her. With a wild, helpless cry of despair she tottered back, and fell fainting to the floor.

Slowly Miss Halkett opened her eyes. She was too dazed to realise anything as yet, but she had a sort of dim consciousness that she was lying amongst soft cushions, that there was a strong aromatic scent in her nostrils, and that Jane, with tears streaming down her wrinkled cheeks, was kneeling beside her.

Someone behind her said "Thank God!" If the supposition had not been absurd, she would have thought it was Geoffrey Halkett's voice.

A glass of some strange-tasting drink was held to her lips. It must have been a strong opiate, for after that she remembered no more.

When she awoke it was morning. Jane stood beside her bed with a cup of tea. Mechanically she took it in her hand, then looked around.

She was in a handsome apartment—one she had never before seen. A sweet, subtle odour stole in through the window, which was partly open—the scent of limes. There was but one place in the whole neighbourhood where limes grew—near Mr. Halkett's new house!

She was here, then—beneath his very roof! Who had dared to bring her here? She must go at once. Not a moment longer than was absolutely necessary would she remain. She insisted on getting up, but without telling Jane of her intention.

Jane talked volubly of all that had passed. Her mistress suffered her to chatter on unrebuked; she even appeared to listen with interest, but she put no questions to her.

At last she was alone. Going cautiously downstairs, unperceived by anyone as she thought, she opened the door and passed out—a little way down the drive and through a side gate; she did not ask herself where, only away—somewhere. Then a sudden giddiness seized her, and she was forced to lean against a tree for support.

Mr. Halkett had seen her leave the house, and had forbore to follow her, but now that he saw she was ill and faint, he went towards her.

She recovered herself with an effort, and advanced a step or two to meet him.

"I ought to have thanked you before I left," she said in a trembling voice. "Jane tells me you risked your life to save mine. The risk was too great. Still, I would thank you. I—I— Oh, Geoffrey!" she cried hopelessly, "why did you not let me die? It would have been so much kinder—so much more merciful!"

"Why? Because I love you, Caroline."

"No, no," she interposed; "it is not love, but pity."

"It is not pity, but love," he corrected. "Caroline, why will you not believe me? If you only knew what these twenty-one years have been to me. How daily I have repented the words I said to you on that day long ago. I knew your pride—that you would never forgive me—"

"My pride!" exclaimed Miss Halkett mournfully, extending one trembling hand towards the smoking blackened walls which were all that remained of Raven Hall. "It lies there, Geoffrey—buried in the ruins."

He seized the hand exultingly and raised it unrebuked to his lips.

"Then there is nothing to come between us now?" he cried gladly.

But she shook her head, though she smiled sadly through her fast-gathering tears.

"You forget that I am nearly forty-five—almost an old woman."

"And I am fifty," he replied, drawing the hand he still held through his arm. "The world will think it a most suitable match, I am sure."

Miss Halkett could not repress a little smile to herself. How little a thing the world's opinion seemed to her now!

The Two Champions.

A KNIGHT in sable armour drest,
Rides on by flood and field;
The snow-flakes gather on his crest,
And on his lifted shield.
Above him darken, far and near,
Grey clouds and stormy skies,
And, withered by his icy spear,
The foliage fades and dies.

Across the brooklet's rippling course
A frozen band he throws;
The stately river's stronger force
With slackening current flows.
The wood and glen, the vale and height,
Their verdant robes have lost,
And barren hedgerows glitter white
With countless points of frost.

Around, a tremor in the air,
Above, a rosy glow;
And where the land was brown and bare,
A myriad buddlings show.
As rides a knight by hill and dale,
The sombre trees between,
Bright emerald green his burnished mail,
His trappings emerald green.

The sable rider frowns askance,
And spurs across the track;
The emerald knight, with dauntless glance,
Sends swift defiance back.
They meet, they part! with joyous calls
The wakening woodlands ring,
As stubborn Winter reels and falls
Before the spear of Spring.

CHAPTER IV.

Thou hast stilled
Now thy little lamb's brief weeping.

IN after time Ivor Grant could look back on those days and nights of terror and suspense with a sense of wonder and unreality.

He told himself that he would rather face a regiment of foes than live through such days and nights again. A cable-message had been dispatched to Beryl, and doctors from London had been telegraphed for, and all that skill and love could do was done for the two little lads as the fever ran its course.

The house was dreadfully still now. Even the major had been sent away. Miss Crawley remained from a sense of duty which had become as much a part of herself as her spectacles, but inwardly she was very irate at the loss of her holidays thus entailed by the insubordination of her scholars. Miss Cheape—poor drudge!—remained to keep her company, and also because in her secret heart she had grown to love the quaint, old-fashioned little fellow who lay battling now against a foe more dread than any fears of his had ever realised. It was Miss Cheape, too, who fed the "bunnies," and took care of Fluff, and gave him his daily run in the garden as little Jack had been wont to do. And, perhaps, no one would have been more astonished than little Jack himself could he have seen the tears she wept in secret over that comical little woolly head, or known how she longed to hear the questioning of its master's little voice, which so often she had rebuked by order of her superior in command.

The very servants crept about with hushed and anxious faces, or listened with their aprons to their eyes at the door of that room, whence issued the weary, restless murmurs of the little voice that day by day grew only weaker now.

One might have thought it tired out by reason of that endless questioning to which no answer came. For all "mummy's" love and frenzied longing could not lend wings to her hurrying feet, or bridge the rolling miles that held her from her darling's side.

With every day Ivor Grant's heart ached with deeper dread, and hope grew fainter and more faint. As the sun sank to rest after its daily journey, he could not but see how the little life that had grown to him a golden link between despair and happiness seemed also fading into the shadows of a longer day. Cyril was very ill also, but no one seemed to have the same dread and fear about Cyril as about Jack. He had always been so strong, and brave, and bright, and he had a better constitution than his brother; but Jack—how they all remembered his odd ways now, and told tales of his life among them, and were never tired of repeating his quaint speeches, and found that unconsciously to themselves he had wound himself about their hearts, and grown so dear that every hour was filled with one incessant longing, questioning, wondering about his welfare.

One sultry evening Ivor Grant left the sick-room and went out into the garden for a breath of fresh air. He lit his cigar and paced to and fro along the gravel walks, his face pale and anxious in the evening light. A noise in the hedgerow parting the garden from the adjoining lawn at last attracted his attention. It seemed as if something was moving in the bushes. He approached nearer, and saw a face looking at him from between the close and prickly boughs—a pale, sickly face, with long, unkempt hair straying from beneath a ragged cap.

"What do you want?" asked Ivor quickly.

"Your pardon, sir," said the boy, who seemed to have fixed himself in the hedge in so ingenious a method that he could neither advance nor retreat, "but I've been waiting here this mady a day without courage to speak to ye. I heard down at the village that the little gentleman was sick. Is it true, sir?"

"What do you want to know for?" demanded Ivor, looking with extreme disfavour at the unsightly object before him.

"I ain't got no call to trouble ye, I know," said the lad humbly; "only if it was the little gentleman as bought the lop-eared uns, I'd like to say as I'm so sorry if he's took it from me. He stayed a talking to me; bless him! how he did talk, so wise, and so pretty, and he such a little un—"

"What?" cried Ivor fiercely. "It was you gave him the fever. How dared you let him come near you?"

"I didn't know, sir. Gran let him in, and he would talk, and no one told me it 'ud hurt him, and he said I wasn't to be miserable, and that he'd pray for me, and I've thought of him ever since; and then I got better, and I heard how he was took with the fever, and I've come here and hung about the place, wanting so bad to ask somebody about him. Don't be angry, sir; indeed I can't help it."

Angry! Was it anger that choked the strong man's utterance, and shut out the radiant mist of sunlight from before his eyes?—anger that showed him that little figure and its rapt, earnest face, full of the wondering sorrow that any sight or touch of others' troubles brought?—anger that bent his head and paled his lips as he heard in those rough, eloquent words the influence of the child's gentle sympathy?

"I am not angry," he said at last; "only we all wondered how the child took the fever, and he is very, very ill. Is it you he speaks of when he talks of the poor boy who was miserable?"

"Does he say that, bless him?" muttered the lad hoarsely. "I can't help it, sir," he added, drawing his ragged sleeve across his eyes. "It—it makes a babby of me when I think of him standing there and looking at me with his beautiful eyes. 'What's miserable?' he says, and puts his little hands so. 'Does you feel bad here?' And now he's feeling bad, and I—I just wish I was dead, that I do. What for should such as I live, and he— But you don't think he'll die, sir, do you?"

"God knows," groaned Ivor. "He gets worse and weaker every day. But come," he added, "get out of that hedge, and I'll talk to you. Are you living in the village?"

The lad struggled out and stood there before him—a ragged, wretched object enough; an object that Ivor Grant knew would have given little Jack food for a host of sorrowful fancies had he seen him now. He stood with such a pitiable air, and his clothes hung on his gaunt form with so forlorn and tattered an aspect, that Ivor Grant's wrath melted, and only a feeling of intense compassion overwhelmed him.

"Yes, sir," said the lad, in answer to that question.

"And are you very poor?" continued Ivor Grant.

"Yes, sir. Gran's very old—nigh on a hundred, and Nell don't do much work; and this fever laid me up a mortal time, and I lost the harvesting. Still, we do, sir, somehow—" He ceased abruptly, then broke out into a miserable sob: "Don't think I'm come to beg, sir; I don't want nothing, only to hear of the little gentleman, and say how sorry I am; sorry—" with another burst of sobs—"I wish I'd died afore ever I hurt a hair of his head. What's the good of such as me cumberin' the ground? Only 'cos we're not wanted, why, there we are!"

Ivor did not confute this philosophy, or answer it. He was looking thoughtfully at the wretched object before him, and wondering what was best to be done with him.

In the midst of that thoughtful pause, there stole through the open window above them a little, low, plaintive cry. Both started.

"I must go in," said Ivor hurriedly. "He's awake. Go home now, my poor lad, and I'll see what I can do for you. Here," and he thrust some loose silver into his hand, "take this and get yourself some food, and come here at the same time to-morrow, if you like. I'll see you and let you know how the child is."

And he was gone ere the lad had recovered from his bewilderment at the sudden possession of so much wealth. He looked at the coins till great tears rose to his haggard eyes and shut out their brightness.

"I'd give 'em all," he muttered, "and a million more—aye, and I'd lay down and die gladly this here very minute, only to know the little gentleman was well, and see him standing there afore me again!"

He moved off to his retreat in the hedge. He was footsore, and faint, and hungry, and weak. But he made no effort to return to the village, only crept back to that prickly shelter, and when darkness fell, and the stars came out one by one like solemn eyes that watch the night's misdeeds, a ragged, tottering figure crept out too, and made its way to the grass-plot beneath that window which stood open to the sweet night air; and all through the long hours it crouched there motionless and still, till again the sun's rays gilded the dusky heavens, and across the dread and horror of a long suspense broke forth another day.

And as that glad dawn paints out night's sombre hues, and the air grows jubilant with songs of waking birds, little Jack wakes from a long, deep slumber, and raises two dark, wistful eyes to Ivor Grant's face.

"You is come?" he says, but so faint and far away is the sound of the beloved little voice that his friend can scarcely hear it. "Has you brought mummy?"

"Not yet, darling," murmurs Ivor, his heart giving one great throb of relief and gladness. Surely he is better now—since he is conscious at last.

"Not yet!" echoes little Jack tiredly. "Is she a far way still?"

"She is coming nearer every day, my pet," whispered Ivor, pillowing the little shorn head on his arm, and looking with a swift, cold pang of arising fear at the odd film that darkens the deep eyes.

"Me will—go—and—meet her," says little Jack faintly.

The white lids droop—close; the little hands fall idly down on the sheet.

Nor human love nor human prayer can stay him now as the little feet go forth on that unseen journey.

The stillness and darkness of a great despair fall over Ivor Grant.

There is nothing to watch for—hope for—look for now. Leaving the weeping women to their work, he goes out, and there in the garden he sees a heap of rags and a shivering human form with whose misery an angel's pity is now identified. The lad starts at the sound of footsteps, and lifts his forlorn face up to the glow of the sunlight.

"How is he, sir?" he asks eagerly; "I've been waiting all night to hear."

Then something in the glance that meets his own, answers his question, and he shrinks back abashed, troubled, trembling, and his ragged sleeve goes up to his eyes.

"Not dead, sir—don't say that?"

"Yes," answers Ivor very sadly. "Don't wait here any longer, my poor boy. There will be no other message for you to hear."

"Oh," cries the lad passionately, "I didn't mean to do it, sir. Oh, I wish I was dead too—only I'm so miserable, and no one wants me, and I can't die."

Ivor Grant can bear no more. Strong man as he is, he is shaken to the core by this sudden appalling sense of sorrow. He turns abruptly away, and goes out from the garden into the quiet lanes beyond. If others—if mere outsiders—if one to whom the child had only spoken once as he had spoken to this desolate boy, could feel his loss so terribly, what would be the anguish of that mother-heart when it became conscious of its sad bereavement!

"How can I tell her? Great Heaven! how can I tell her?" he groaned as he threw himself down in the solitude of the woods to battle with his grief unseen—grief all the more terrible because he knew it must be met, and conquered, and kept in rigid self-control when the time of trial came.

He spent the whole day in the woods, now roaming restlessly about—now absorbed in the tumult of confused thought, and recurring sorrow, that every morning of this last week had brought. The first thing that recalled him to any sense of time was a feeling of faintness and exhaustion. He roused himself, and prepared to return home. As he came out into the clear space of the high-road, he saw the sky was dark with heavy rain-clouds. Long before he reached the house they broke into a regular deluge, and he was drenched to the skin.

When he had changed his wet clothes and taken some refreshment he asked for news of Cyril. He seemed better, he was told—had been calmer and more conscious. They had not dared to tell him about Jack.

"I will go and see him," said Ivor. "Is he in the same room?" he asked hesitatingly.

Miss Cheape, who was his informant, said no. He had been removed into the adjoining chamber—the major's, in fact.

Thither Ivor Grant went.

The boy was very ill, though conscious. His first question was for his brother—why had he been removed from the other room?

Ivor told him the doctor had ordered it, as the room was so small, and the answer seemed to content him.

"You say mother is coming," he said presently as he lay quietly there looking out at the dark sky and listening to the pattering rain-drops.

"Yes," answered Ivor; "I telegraphed for her."

"I hope she won't be very angry with me," said Cyril mournfully. "I did try to do my best and take care of Jack. Still, I often think I oughtn't to have gone to the cricket-match that afternoon, and then I could have kept him with me. But he'll get better, won't he?" he added hopefully. "And then I'll take such care of him, mother need never be angry with me again."

"You mustn't talk, my dear boy," said Ivor; "it excites you and brings back the fever. Lie still, and try and get to sleep."

"I—I wish they had left me with Jack," said Cyril plaintively. "I used to like to see him, even though he didn't know me. Does he still ask for mother, sir?"

"No," said Ivor huskily as he turned away to conceal his face, "not now."

"Poor little chap!" continued Cyril. "How glad he'll be to see her! Go and say good-night to him for me, Mr. Grant, and tell him he'll soon be better, like me. Why, I dare say we'll both be running about when mother comes, racing each other to meet her; only of course I shall let Jack win," he added with a smile. "He's always so pleased when he does."

The night had fallen darkly in storm of rain and wind; the house was intensely still. Ivor Grant had thrown himself on a couch to get some sleep after those long wearisome days and nights. The nurse was dozing in her chair, for Cyril had been so calm and quiet that she thought he was asleep.

But the boy was only watching anxiously for an opportunity to satisfy his ever-increasing anxiety as to his little brother's welfare. How still they all were in that next room! Usually, there was always some sound or bustle going on, but now it seemed as if no one could be there at all. Yet surely they would not leave Jack alone.

It was the coldest and chilliest hour of the morning when at last he saw that the nurse was fairly asleep, and he crept cautiously out of bed, and staggered weakly and feebly, holding on by anything in his way, to the door.

He opened it so quietly that the nurse never heard him, and then crept on tiptoe to that room adjoining his own. He turned the handle and entered. On the threshold he paused aghast. Had he made a mistake? Was this not little Jack's room? For there was no light in it save the cold, grey, straggling light that fell through the curtained window, and what was that on the bed—what?

Shivering with cold, nervous dread, he approached that shrouded outline. A low whine greeted him, and he saw Fluff curled up beside that little still figure. He snatched off the sheet.

"Jack!" he cried. "Jack!"

There was no answer.

He rushed and drew up the blind, and then in an agony of terror flung himself beside his brother.

"Jack," he whispered entreatingly, "it's me—Cyrrie! Can't you hear? Are you asleep?"

His own fevered lips touched those of the little brother, and shrank back, terrified afresh by their coldness and silence. What was this?—what had come to him, and why had they left him here alone?

His heart gave one convulsive shudder, then seemed to grow chill and cold as the little figure he embraced.

"What shall I say to mother?" he suddenly cried. "Oh, Jack—Jack, let me go with you!"

It might have been an hour or so later that the nurse awoke, and going over to look at her little charge, found the bed empty. Rushing to the door, she met Ivor Grant just coming in.

"Sir—Master Cyril—where is he?" cried the terrified woman. "He's got up and left this room by himself."

Ivor did not wait to question or waste words. Instinctively he hurried to that other room, the woman following and wringing her hands in a helpless, grief-struck fashion.

And there, with the early sunlight falling on their still, white faces, lay the two little brothers—cold and dead.

CHAPTER V. BREAKING THE NEWS.

"How shall I tell her? Great Heaven! How shall I tell her?"

That had been the burden of Ivor Grant's heart through all the desolate, sorrowful days that intervened between the children's deaths and their mother's arrival.

It seemed all so sudden and so awful. His hasty summons, that week of agonised suspense, and then—then this dreary blank, filled only with the terrors of a greater trial in prospect, when he must face that desolate mother-cry, and stifling his own pain—made greater by her sorrow and her loneliness—tell her of the blow that had fallen on her life.

Battling with his weakness he had stood beside the coffin that held the little brothers—together in death as in life, so he had ordered them to be laid in their last resting-place. Battling with it as with some fierce foe struggling for supremacy over his life, so he had watched the earth fall over the closed lid; battling with it still, he had crept there in the silence of the night, and with stern brow and folded arms stood gazing on the little mound already heaped and covered with white flowers, whose exquisite breath stole up to the silent watcher like a message from the little voices he should never hear again.

And now there was no more to be done. The simple marble cross had been ordered, but the inscription was to wait for the poor young mother's directions, and Ivor Grant went back to the Court to wait, with what patience he could, until news should reach him of Beryl Marsden's arrival.

Would she come, after all? Might not her husband forbid it, just as his tyranny had chosen to part her from her darlings at a time when most they needed a mother's care and love?

Ah yes, she would come. Something told him that. Some inward recognition of the strength and tenderness of that woman—nature he so revered, into whose clear depths his eyes had gazed.

There are women—let us thank Heaven for it!—here and there in this sad, sin-stained world of ours, whom a man is all the better for loving, be it ever so hopelessly, even as there are others for whose influence he is ever so much the worse.

It is a solemn thing to think how much responsibility lies in those weak, frail hands. The power to ennoble or debase, to lift a life they love out of the mire of selfishness and sensuality, or drag it down to deeper depths, and stifle it with poisoned kisses. If the world were wise it would not be the outer shell of mere personal loveliness that it would crown and glorify as womanhood, but the brave true souls alive with gentle sympathy; the faithful and long-suffering; the great hearts, whose very weakness is beautiful, and whose errors might shame man's greater virtues. It is a womanhood that is high and noble, yet humble and true, that has so much of what is beautiful in it, bearing pain so bravely, stifling selfish desires because of hurting still more that deeper selfishness of man, cheering, encouraging, working on in weariness and hopelessness, and ever keeping something of divinity in its core amidst so much that is evil and vain; lifting tear-blind eyes to Heaven in prayers that ask all for what is loved, and naught for her who loves. Womanhood pathetic, mistaken, erring, foolish, it may be, but we believe Heaven gave it and Heaven loves it, despite a thousand such errors and frailties, and the man who cries it down is but a coward and a fool!

Ivor Grant knew that no woman on the face of the earth could ever be to him what Beryl Marsden was. He had known it from the hour when he first looked into her eyes in Madge Dunbar's ball-room. She had called up emotions, feelings, aspirations, that till then had been a dead letter to him. Swiftly she had come into his life, and as swiftly had she passed out of it; but all the same, no other woman had held that power, or won from him such thoughts as she had done. She was one of those women—rare enough, perhaps—whom to love once is to love always—who get into a man's dreams, and take possession of his heart by force of strong individuality, so that looking at and listening to other women he finds himself always wondering what this particular one would have said and done under similar circumstances, and convincing himself that it would have been sure to be better, or more graceful, or more charming than the others contrive to make it.

An unfortunate state of affairs, and apt to bring resentful, and miserable, and self-reproachful thoughts in its train—a state of affairs into which Ivor Grant had half consciously and half helplessly drifted, and from which he saw no escape and no hope.

Carrying this new sorrow side by side with the old pain of regret which every memory of his ill-fated attachment brought, he went back to the Court in a most unhappy frame of mind. His mother's sympathy only seemed to irritate him. She had been fond of little Jack, but not fond as he had been, noting in the childish face and deep, soft eyes the characteristics of the woman he loved so vainly, and seeing her glorified and made sacred in his sight by that pure, bright halo of motherhood which no true man ever yet could help reverencing and admiring.

The nearer the time came for that meeting, the greater grew the dread in his heart. He was no coward, but he fairly trembled at the thought of what was in store for him. At times he felt he could not face her—he would write, and then go away and leave his mother to comfort her; but then again, when he pictured her desolate, heart-broken, it seemed to him cowardly to shrink from her presence. He understood so well what the little lads had been to her, and he alone could bring her the sorrowful consolation of Jack's last words.

The telegram had bidden her come direct to the Court; he had hoped when he sent it that the children would have been removed there by the time she landed in England. So one hot August night, as he paced to and fro along the terrace, he was not surprised to hear the sound of wheels, and to see a carriage driving rapidly along the avenue. Now that the moment he had dreaded so long was here close at hand, a stony calmness seemed to settle on his heart. He threw away his cigar, and went to the entrance to meet her, glad almost that suspense was over, that he need no longer wake in those chill, grey dawns to ask himself: "Will she come to-day?"

The dusk had fallen, a light wind blew some over-ripe rose-leaves along the terrace, and their scent seemed to touch him and bring back that vision of a little mound in a quiet churchyard where white blossoms lay heaped in a fragrant pile.

As the memory came to him with something of beauty and solemnity, like a low, hushed strain of music falling across the discord and sorrowfulness of life, the carriage stopped, someone sprang out, and in the deepening twilight they two stood face to face.

"I have travelled night and day," she said, and the voice had so worn and weary a sound that it hurt him even more than the look upon her face. "How are they?"

For an instant he was silent. How hard words are to find when they can only speak desolation, suffering, death!

Perhaps the silence answered her, or the look upon his face, or that indescribable instinct which flies straight to the heart, and realises grief by signs too slight and uncertain for explanation.

For an instant Ivor's arm went out to catch the slender figure that reeled and swayed like a sapling in a storm; but, almost as he touched her, she seemed to recover, stood upright, faced him with wide and stony eyes.

"Too late!" she moaned. "I knew it. Oh, why did I ever leave them?"

He thought to see her weep, or sob, or faint; but no. She only stood there, dry-eyed, white as marble—an image of despair more terrible than ever his fancy had dared to paint. The sight of her face, the memory of this scene, stood out in sharp outline to his mental vision, and then her voice smote him with a fresh sense of pain:

"Take me in; I want to be alone!"

He led her into the great hall, and to the room prepared for her, and there left her with one stifled entreaty:

"God bless you, and help you to bear it!"

He saw her throw herself on her knees by the bed, and bury her face on her arms, while all the rich glory of her hair fell round her like a cloud.

Then the door closed; all was silence. Some hearts bleed inwardly, and the wounds are the harder to staunch.

The warm August night had died out in a passion of colour, and light, and glory. Hours had passed since Beryl Marsden had thrown herself there on the floor too broken-hearted for tears, too despairing for thought or care of what might chance to herself. In the great loveless wilderness of life she seemed to stand quite alone. Some prophetic instinct had told her that, from the very moment that ominous message had reached her. There had been a fierce battle with her husband, and only her declaration that she would sell her jewels, or work her passage home as a nurse, if still he refused to let her go to her children, had wrung from him a reluctant consent.

It all seemed an awful dream to her now. The hurried preparations, the voyage, the crowning agony of the news for which she had been preparing herself. And now all was over. Life was a blank, an emptiness.

Never again would she feel those warm arms around her neck, and the childish kisses on her lips, or hear the sweet babble that had made up the richest music of her life. Never again would she watch that wondrous light dawning in her darling's eyes, the light that deepened and intensified with each new discovery of the wonders of life as day by day it unrolled itself to the wondering gaze. The house was horribly still, the room was chill and sad. She rose in a dazed sort of way to her feet, and mechanically wound up her long hair, and then opened the door and looked out.

Ivor was pacing up and down the corridor. He had never left it these three long weary hours.

He approached, and she looked up at the kindly face with her dazed and sorrowful eyes—looked up—then suddenly something in their soft compassion and wordless sympathy seemed to pierce through the mists that clouded reason and obscured thought. She stretched out her hands:

"Tell me all," she cried; "I—I can bear it now."

And the ice melted, and the tears gushed to her eyes, as that gentle, manly voice told her the simple pathetic words that had been little Jack's last message to "mummy."

Perhaps that saved her reason and her life.

CHAPTER VI. "THE SHADOW OF ANGEL'S WINGS."

WHEN, as briefly and gently as possible, Ivor Grant had told that sad history, he took the weeping woman to his mother's room, and there left her.

The ordeal was over, and had left him shaken to the core. To see her so desolate and stricken—to read in her broken, sorrowful words the loneliness of her loving heart—to know that she knew he shared her sorrow, yet keep all token of his sympathy within bounds whose fierce restraint tore his very heart-strings—this had been his task; and now it was over, and, weak and spent as any woman, he rushed to solitude as to relief. His vow of friendship had entailed no small penalties upon him, and for the first time he seemed to recognise the fact.

When a man's heart aches with love and longing for a woman, it is a hard thing to beat those storm-waves back and fence them off with the breakwaters of honour and self-control.

Meanwhile Beryl sat by Mrs. Grant's side and listened to her gentle sympathy, and felt that she was realising the slow torture of motherlessness with every beat of her tortured heart.

In all this year of weary months, and weeks, and days, how empty and dreary her life had seemed. How often had she wakened with tears wet upon her cheeks, or started from dreams through which had thrilled one plaintive little voice with its tender call for "mummy."

And she thought now with agonised remorse that her love for her youngest child had in some measure doubled her loss, for had not Ivor told her of Cyril's refusal to be parted from his little brother, and was there not always before her eyes that pathetic picture of the two little dead forms clasped in a last embrace that bespoke the fidelity of her first-born's memory, and showed her what a noble little heart had treasured her parting words?

Her brain seemed on fire, and the fall of tears scorched her eyes, but could not ease that terrible aching. In vain was sympathy now—in vain prayers that would have led her sorrowing soul to look up for Heaven's consolation, and read in God's will some wiser, nobler purpose than her passionate human love could see as yet.

In vain—in vain—in vain!

"If you only knew how I have longed to hear them laugh," she wailed brokenly, "to see them running to meet me over the meadows as they used to do—to look at Jack's dear little face and Cyril's noble one! What scenes I have pictured, what hopes! And now it is all gone from me—all!"

Mrs. Grant could only listen and weep too. Amidst her own sufferings of mind and body, through the dark cloud lowering and closing itself around her life, this sorrow pierced with a sense of unrealised anguish. She had had but one child, and she knew how deep-rooted and passionate her love for him had been, how even now it had led her into a fatal error, and still more fatal bondage; and here was this poor desolate creature bereft of both her sons by one fell blow. Truly to speak of consolation seemed a mockery.

"They made a better woman of me," continued Beryl wildly. "A woman may be unhappy, you know, and her life be utterly wretched, yet a child's touch will purify her heart and keep away thoughts of wrong and desperation. No lover's or husband's lips can thrill her soul with so pure an ecstasy as that unasked kiss of her little one—no man's or woman's love on earth hold such sweet regenerating influence as the love he gives. And then to have it and lose it, and see life stretch on through years that are only full of endless pain. God pardon me if I say I only wish He would take me too!"

"Poor soul!" said Mrs. Grant, wiping away the tears from her own eyes that only gathered again at every sound of the piteous heart-broken voice. "What can I say of hope or comfort? Only time can heal a sorrow like yours—time and the mercy of Heaven."

"I can't realise that mercy now," moaned Beryl heart-brokenly. "No one knows what my little ones were to me. There is no comfort possible. Fancy, to leave them well and beautiful, and picture them as such, and count the hours before I held them in my arms again, to hear their voices in every wind that blew, to feel that the whiteness of their innocent souls kept mine innocent too, and brought me nearer heaven than any creed or philosophy, human or divine—to fancy and to feel all this, and come back to—nothingness. Not even a last word, a kiss on their dead faces—only a grave and their memory! Oh, I think my heart will break! How can I live out such misery—how can I?"

And so on from passion to despair, from dull apathy to fiery rebellion, went on those first hours of agony. At last came utter stony resignation. Nature revenged itself on physical weakness, and worn out and wearied with grief, she lay down and slept.

Ill and worn as Mrs. Grant herself was, she did everything for the poor stricken creature, and only left her when she had swallowed a strong sedative and sunk into a slumber too deep for even dreams of her loss to penetrate.

So passed that dreaded day, and not till noon on the next did she wake, numb and frozen now, but outwardly calm. The storm had spent itself; the havoc of its sweeping breath would only appear as the dull and dreary years bore her life along in their train, to battle with other woes, and yield or conquer in that strife of human weakness and temptation which is old as time, and, like time, seems endless to the weary hearts that throng life's battle-field.

"You will come with me?" she had said to Ivor, and he had answered her gravely, "Of course;" and the sunset hour of the next day found them standing beside that little mound where still some thoughtful hands had strewn flowers—wild ones now, and strange and new for graves, but telling of a tender memory that held that tiny spot enshrined even amidst the coarseness and unloveliness of life, for the hand that gathered those flowers and laid them there each day was the hand of Tom—Tom, who never forgot the "blessed little gentleman," and whose heart bled with incessant self-reproach as he thought of his own unfortunate part in that sudden early death.

Limping feebly and weakly to that sacred spot as the day draws to a close, he sees two figures standing there, and instinct tells him whose is the bowed and drooping head. He is shuffling out of sight and keeping behind tombstones. He does not want the lady to see him—he does not want to see her. How she would hate him if she knew!

His intentions, however, are frustrated by Ivor Grant, who to spare himself the sight of Beryl's grief strolls away from her side, and all unwittingly comes upon that wretched woe-begone figure, and with a sudden pang of self-reproach remembers how utterly he had forgotten him, and the promises he had made regarding his future welfare.

"You here, my poor lad," he cries suddenly. "Are you better?"

"Thank you, sir," says the boy shamefacedly. "I'm very well, sir. Is—that the lady?" he asks abruptly, turning very pale.

"Yes," says Ivor Grant huskily.

"The little gentleman's mother?" continues Tom. "Does she—does she take on terrible bad, sir?"

"She is in great grief," says Ivor. "Do you bring those flowers?" he adds kindly.

"Yes," answers Tom, looking dismally over to where they lie, watered now by a rain of tears from that kneeling figure outlined against the rosy evening sky. "It's all I can do, sir. I can't never forget him. Does she—know, sir?" with a nod in the direction of the little mound.

"No," answers Ivor sharply. "There is no need to make her sorrow worse by thinking how easily it might have been avoided."

"It's very kind of you not to tell on me, sir, though I never went for to do it," says Tom mournfully. "And if I might just look at her, 'cos she's his mother, it would give me a power of comfort, sir."

"I will tell her," says Ivor, thinking that to rouse the mourner's interest by some external sympathy would take away that first sharp edge of grief. "Wait here until she leaves the grave."

And they sit down side by side, and Ivor asks all particulars of the lad's sordid and miserable life, and finally offers to take him to the Court, as assistant to one of the gardeners, an offer which overwhelms Tom's heart with speechless gratitude, and points again to that strange gentle influence which a child's brief presence has left behind, an influence which, serving and succouring the misery he has once compassionated, speaks with richer eloquence than any words, of the pure and tender soul from which that influence springs.

And Tom, who has never known any sensation in his life that did not seem rooted and grounded in the capacity for being "miserable," is taken suddenly out of himself and that crushing sense of despair, which has before now moulded such misery into crime, and feels that he owns a friend on earth and an angel in heaven in one blessed moment of gratitude and relief.

And when, with sad face and weary steps, the solitary figure leaves the little grave and comes towards them, and, looking up in the fading sunset light, Tom sees a glorified and sorrowful image of the face he loves, all his heart seems to go out to the pale, beautiful mourner, and falling on his knees there at her feet, he tells her that simple story of her darling's pitiful nature, and seeing how moved and stirred, and yet gladdened by it, she is, vows in his homely, rugged fashion to love and serve her all his life, if only she will let him.

"I couldn't die for the blessed little gentleman, but I'd like to live for you, ma'am," he says; and Ivor Grant, seeing how deeply she is affected by this scene, bids him rise, and promises he shall do so.

And the memory of those grateful prayers, and the consciousness of granted relief, gives to Beryl Marsden's heart the first faint thrill of comfort it has known for many a weary day.

So here again that childish ministry asserted its tender power, and while the sharp sense of sorrow and loss still stabbed her with recurring pain, that desolate mother-heart turned with unspoken prayer to where one angel memory led her with its gentle hands.

And in the years to come she could look back on this scene, and trace that influence, even as others traced it too, and, with wet eyes and soft hushed breath, thank Heaven that her trouble had not made her hard, and pitiless, and unthankful, as, indeed, it might, and once had threatened to do. But, like a broken strain of music, sweet even in its uncertain tones, the words, and wishes, and compassion of the little lad seemed hovering about those paths his childish feet had trod, and their echoes rose and thrilled the hearts of those who loved him, and comforted their pain as time moved on, bearing them along with it to the future's storms and shadows, and hallowing even grief, and loss, and pain with an angel's love.

Adieu, My Love!

THE breeze blows lightly from the south,

The anchor hangs aspeak;
Our ship moves on with swelling sails,
Another clime we seek.

Adieu, my love! In one brief year
Our vows we shall renew;
By day, by night, I'll think of thee;
Adieu, my love, adieu!

What cheer, my hearts? The best of friends

Must often part awhile,
And if a tear we sometimes shed,
It speeds the coming smile.

So forge ahead! let Hope's bright star
Our guide be o'er the main;
The sooner gone, the sooner home
Shall we sail back again.

The gloaming closes in apace,
The sunset pales to grey;
But after night once more shall rise
The golden sun of day.
The white cliffs in the distance fade
Like shadows lost to view;
I wave thee now my last farewell,
Adieu, my love, adieu!

Through No Fault of Hers.

(A STORY IN FOUR WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER VII.

HUGH had perception enough to be aware on his return home that something had happened during his absence. He jumped to the conclusion that Venables had been proposing to Muriel without success. He reached this conclusion by finding Muriel in an unusually excited and agitated state, and it was strengthened by what Connie said, though she endeavoured to put off his enquiries as much as possible.

It was unfortunate for Hugh that he lacked judgment. With considerable belief in his own acuteness he yet was wanting in ordinary sense when acting on the dictates of his reason in certain matters.

He judged that it was quite possible that Muriel had refused Venables because she preferred himself. He was not so certain of that point as of another, namely, that now was the best time for him to offer his hand. If she for any reason regretted refusing his rival it would be wise to clench the business at once. In her frame of mind she would be only too glad of an opportunity of settling for ever the painful questions which agitated her so.

As to his being accepted he felt no doubt. He was rich, would be so at any rate, whilst she was poor. He was conscious of making a considerable sacrifice in proposing to her; if any one a month ago had told him he would make an offer to a penniless companion, he would have thought him out of his mind. But he had not known her then.

However, Muriel was not well that evening, and retired early. It was not till the next day that he had his opportunity.

Some one has said that every man is a poet once in his life—when he tells a woman he loves her. Certainly Hugh was seen at an advantage during the first few minutes of his interview. He spoke strongly, and to the point, and Muriel listened with less impatience than she had anticipated. For she had known what was coming.

She gave him the reply which might have been expected. She was not prepared for its effect on him.

"You refuse me?" he said in bewilderment.

"Yes; you must see yourself that it is impossible for me to accept your offer. What would Sir Joseph and Lady Pankhurst think?"

"Oh, they can think what they like," he replied. "If I choose to marry beneath me it's no business of theirs."

Muriel turned on him with flashing eyes.

"What did you say?"

"I beg your pardon," he said confusedly. "I only meant that it's no business of any one except myself whom I marry."

"Not even mine?" asked Muriel.

"Yours, of course. I should have thought you would have been the last to consider what anyone else might think when you had a chance of making a good match."

Poor Hugh! opposition had been the last thing he had expected, and under it he was letting his real nature become manifest. It was enough to make him angry, after sacrificing himself to the extent of braving his father's wrath, and stooping to offer his hand to a companion without a penny in the world; it was too much to expect he would endure a refusal without feeling it. He began to get angry. So did Muriel, but she kept her temper whilst Hugh lost his.

"A good match!" repeated Muriel. "Are you under the impression that I imagine I should raise myself by accepting you? I would not marry you if you were the only man in the world."

"Then what do you mean by leading me on in this way?" cried Hugh furiously. "You have flirted with me freely enough, and tried your best to trap me, and now you throw me over."

"Stop!" said Muriel; "don't say another word. Let me go!"

But Hugh was beside himself, and caught her arm.

"Don't touch me!" she cried. "I hate and detest you!"

Hugh released her arm, and stood before her for a moment.

"Very well, Miss Leigh," he said with concentrated rage; "you shall repent this. If you won't stay here as my wife, I swear you sha'n't as anything else."

"You may be certain of that," retorted Muriel as she ran past him and disappeared.

Hugh stood the picture of anger. All the baser passions of his nature were aroused, his chief desire now was to pay out Muriel for the insult she had put upon him. He would get her turned out of the house; that would not be difficult, for he was aware of Norman's communication with Connie through her, and if his father learned it, there would be no doubt of the result.

He was about to seek Sir Joseph when a thought struck him. Another sort of revenge was also in his power. He believed now that Muriel loved Venables; perhaps, after all, the proposal had not been made as he imagined; in that case, if he informed Venables of the disgrace of Muriel's father, there was small doubt that he would never propose to her. It was a wonder now to Hugh himself how on earth he had ever done so. It seemed impossible that anyone else could do so, knowing all.

He resolved to tell Venables everything at the first opportunity.

CHAPTER VIII.

MURIEL fled to her room and burst into a flood of angry tears. She had been insulted grievously, and had no redress. Oh, if only Venables had been present!

One thing she was firmly resolved on: she would not stay in the house another day. Even her affection for Connie was not enough to enable her to endure Hugh's hateful presence any longer. Then came the thought of Venables.

"Never mind," she soliloquised; "if he loves me, my going away will make no difference to him. If he wishes to avoid me, it will be better for both of us to be far apart. I have stayed here too long as it is."

One question had to be settled, however—what excuse was she to give to Sir Joseph for leaving so abruptly?

She was ignorant of Hugh's intention to report her innocent but unwise interference with his plans for Connie's marriage. She was still wondering what reason she could find when there was a knock at the door, and a servant brought in a letter. It was from her aunt. It furnished the excuse she needed in a serious fashion. Her father had been released from prison before his time, on a medical certificate that his life was in danger from confinement; he was now with her aunt, dangerously ill. Muriel must come at once.

An hour later Hugh entered his father's study, still burning with a sense of wrong and desire for revenge. Before he had time to explain his errand, Sir Joseph said:

"This is somewhat sudden, isn't it, Hugh?"

"What, father?"

"Miss Leigh's going. It seems her father is ill, and she's off in an hour."

"She's saved me the trouble of telling him," thought Hugh. "There's Venables left, though."

"Why have you come here?" asked his father.

Hugh muttered something about wanting a book, and departed, to spend the next hour as far away from home and Muriel as possible.

When Muriel arrived at her aunt's house, she was met with a warmer welcome than usual.

"How is papa?" was Muriel's first question.

"He's very ill, my dear—very ill; he seems to have something on his mind. He's been asking for you over and over again to-day. He wants to tell you something which he won't tell me."

"Can I see him now?"

"The doctor's upstairs; I'll see."

Muriel was soon admitted. She was shocked beyond measure to see the terrible alteration in his appearance.

"Thank Heaven!" he ejaculated as she entered, "you are in time."

Muriel kissed him again and again.

"Kiss me once more," he said; "perhaps you won't to-morrow."

"Oh, papa," she sobbed, "don't talk like that."

"No, no, my darling, I don't mean that I'm going to die so soon as that. I have a few days before me yet. Let us spend one more evening together as we used to in the old days."

He seemed to rally somewhat during the evening, but the next day was rather worse. The doctor made no secret of the fact that his death was only a question of days. He had persistently denied his illness till it was too palpable to be ignored, and now it was too late to hope to cure it.

In the afternoon he sent for Muriel, and told her he wanted to talk to her. She sat near him, and held his thin hand in hers.

"Muriel," he said, "I have been a weak and selfish man, but not a bad one. I have a confession to make to you. I have done you a great wrong."

Muriel looked up surprised.

"Yes, my darling, and I have to ask you to forgive me. Listen: Years ago, when I lived in another town, and my wife was still alive, we decided, as we had no children of our own, to adopt one. We had an opportunity of taking into our home an orphan child, left without aid of any sort, whose fate must have been the parish had we not stepped in. We treated it as our own, gave it our name, and when we moved to this town no one knew that it was not our own child. When my wife died all my affections centred round you, for you were the child we adopted. I worked for you, I did all I could to make you happy. And when the crash came, and I knew it was my duty to tell you everything, I shrank from it. I could not cut myself adrift from your love. I believed you still loved me, and I had a wild dream that when I was released we could go away together to some place where I was not known, and there I could end my days in peace, with some one to love me. It was wrong, very wrong, and I have been punished for it. But you must forgive me, my child. Do not let me die unforgiven."

Muriel silently kissed him. Then she rose and went to her room.

She sat for an hour or more without moving. The revelation had taken away her power of thought. When she began to think, her first feeling was one of gladness that she had kissed Mr. Leigh.

"I owe him so much," she said to herself, "that he has a right to claim everything from me. A few months' misery is a cheap price to pay for the kindness and love of twenty years."

After a long period of thought and wonder she returned to Mr. Leigh's room. The anxious glance with which he met her was too much for her; she rushed to him and threw her arms round his neck.

"My darling!" he whispered; "now I shall die happy."

The next few days were spent in tranquil happiness in spite of the near approach of death. It was such a joy to the sufferer to see his child once more that he seemed to forget his pain. He gave Muriel all the details he could of her real parentage, from which it appeared that she was the child of an Indian Civil Servant who had sent his wife back to England on the birth of her child, in the hope that her health might be re-established. Instead of that she rapidly declined, her husband returning only in time to see her die; the shock of her loss, coupled with a financial disaster which left him penniless, so preyed on his mind that he sank under the strain.

The necessary papers for proving Muriel's birth were in Mr. Leigh's possession; he added to them a statement of his own.

Muriel, in spite of her wish to devote herself wholly to Mr. Leigh during the remaining days of his life, yet had to answer a long letter of Connie's. In her reply she told her the wonderful news which had recently come to light, secretly hoping that Connie might tell Venables of it. Then she tore her letter up.

"No," she said to herself, "if he does not love me enough to marry me as I was, he does not love me enough. I will wait."

Her letter after all was a short one, informing Connie of the approaching death of Mr. Leigh and giving no news beside.

The catastrophe was now nearer than was anticipated. Two days later Mr. Leigh died.

After the funeral and all the sad details in connection with it were over, Muriel had to decide what she intended doing. It was impossible she could live on her aunt; it was equally impossible she could return to Como Hall; she must try and get a fresh place with Lady Pankhurst's recommendation, which she did not doubt would be given.

She felt more forsaken and miserable than even when Mr. Leigh was taken to prison. She had had glimpses of a possible happiness which only left her the more unhappy.

She had almost given up all hope of hearing from Venables. Why did he delay so long? He must have learnt the whole truth long before this. It was clear he could not face the disgrace attaching to her, that he meant to quietly let her drop.

She would never make another move, of that she was determined. She would never enquire after him in her letters to Connie. She would forget all about him.

This was her state of mind when one morning she received the following letter from her friend:

"DEAREST MURIEL,

"I have some news to tell you; first about myself and then about you. I give that about myself first, or else I believe you would never go on to it. You will never credit it. I am engaged to Lewis now with papa's consent. This is how that marvellous change has occurred.

"You heard before you left us that Lord Falkirk was expected to come into our neighbourhood soon; he is the man who had papa made a knight, so you can imagine how he adores him. Papa wrote him a letter asking him to come and stay at our house, and to his immense joy he accepted. Lord Falkirk is a very artistic nobleman, and is always talking about art. You can imagine how comfortable I felt when he asked papa if he had the privilege of knowing Mr. Norman, who was then staying in the neighbourhood. Papa made some blundering reply, and his lordship went on to praise him most enthusiastically, and asked permission to bring him to our house the next evening. Papa could not object; in fact, the praise of this great man has quite turned papa's ideas on the subject of Lewis, and the result is that at last he has permission to come here as often as he likes, and that is rather too often, I'm afraid.

"Now about your affairs. Your going away in such a hurry put everything into confusion. I find that Hugh was stupid enough to bother you; you must accept my apologies for him. I really never thought he would so far forget himself. I'm sorry to say that now you're gone he never seems tired of abusing you; he cherishes a most despicable rancour against you; we are constantly having words about it.

"Mr. Venables came here the day after you left, as I mentioned in my last letter. I told him that your father was dying, and he was much shocked. He asked me if I thought he might come and see you; I told him he had better leave it for the present; he agreed it would be best.

"He called again soon after, but I was out. Hugh saw him and told me that Mr. Venables said something about writing to you. I haven't seen him since, but I had a note from him to say he was going away for a week or so.

"Have you heard from him? Write and tell me everything. I am so sorry to think of you having all this terrible trouble; it seems wrong for me to be so happy with dear Lewis. I wish you could come and stay here. Hugh is going away soon; will you come then for a long visit?

"Ever yours affectionately,
"CONNIE."

The pleasure of the good news about her friend died away as she read that part of the letter relating to Venables. It was clear to her mind that when he called the second time Hugh had taken advantage of his visit to tell him all about her father's disgrace.

Her letter to Connie would not have reached her till some time after she had seen Venables. Up to the present time not even Connie knew the fact that Mr. Leigh was not her father, and that she was therefore free from any disgrace attaching to his name.

She resolved that no one should know it for the present.

She would wait a few days to see if a letter came from Venables, if not she would look out for another situation.

Two days afterwards she received another note from Connie, saying that Hugh had gone away earlier than was expected, and urging her to come at once, and have the change of scene which she was in need of. She showed the letter to her aunt.

"Well, are you going?" asked Miss Leigh.

"I don't know, auntie; what do you think?"

"I think you ought not to go so long as this is all they know," remarked Miss Leigh, pointing to the envelope, which was addressed to Miss Muriel Leigh. "Why haven't you told Miss Connie about it? What is the matter with you? You ought to be gay enough to find that you needn't be ashamed of your name, and you mope all day. Not that I'm ashamed of the name of Leigh," she added; "it would be a good thing if half the world were as good men as poor Robert."

The tears rose to her eyes as she thought of her brother, but she quickly brushed them away, as one who had done with weeping.

"My dearest auntie," said Muriel, "I'm only half glad that I have another name now. I should have liked to be your niece always, and I will be, too, if you will let me. And Mr. Leigh was so good to me that I must always think of him as a father."

"That's as you like," said Miss Leigh; "I'm sure I'm ready enough to forgive him for never telling you who you were, though I think he might have trusted me. But now why don't you go and visit your grand friends? Who's that Hugh she speaks of?"

"Her brother."

"He fell in love with you, I suppose?"

"Yes, auntie."

"That is why you don't want to go there?"

"Partly, auntie," confessed Muriel.

"What's the other reason? Is there another young man in the question?"

"I don't know," replied Muriel half pettishly. "I'll go and visit these people if you like, auntie, or I will stay with you, or do anything you like."

"I should say go there," was the practical reply. "You'll be no good till you've had a change, and I shall be going to Glasgow next week, so that you won't have any company here."

Muriel acquiesced, and sitting down wrote an acceptance of Connie's invitation. She would come next day by an afternoon train.

Her things were packed and the cab was at the door when a telegram arrived.

It was from Connie:

"Please postpone your visit. You will know why in an hour or two."

"Well," said Miss Leigh, "she's a nice young person. I wonder what that means?"

Muriel did not answer, but a glad hope sprang up in her heart, a hope which she dared not acknowledge the existence of. What could the telegram mean but that someone was coming?

CHAPTER IX.

THE afternoon had not passed before her hope was fulfilled. There was a knock at the door of the little house; a manly voice asked if Miss Leigh were at home. Muriel recognised the voice, and heard Venables shown into their little sitting-room.

The door was left open; Muriel listened as Miss Leigh entered the room.

"Do you wish to see me?" she asked.

"I beg your pardon, it was Miss Muriel Leigh I wished to see."

"You mean Miss Rivers," said Miss Leigh. "I will send her to you."

She left the room, Venables remaining in wonder as to the meaning of what she had said.

Muriel was trembling with excitement when she entered the room, but it was not so painful an experience as on the last occasion when she was alone with him.

He held out his hand, she took it with apparent calm, mastering her agitation more successfully than she hoped.

"I have come, you see," he said, still holding her hand. "If you dismiss me, it shall be by word of mouth. You must forgive me for intruding on you in this way, but there are times in a man's life when he forgets all the laws of courtesy."

"What do you mean?" asked Muriel.

"I mean that, although your silence forbade me ever to see you again, I could not rest satisfied without once more meeting you."

"My silence?" asked Muriel.

"Yes; you did not reply to my letter."

"I have received none," she replied.

"Received none?" he echoed in wonder. "Do you mean to say you have never had the letter I wrote to you nearly a fortnight ago?"

"I have never had a letter from you in my life," replied Muriel.

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed; "what does it mean? After seeing you last time, I went home, resolved to find out the secret which you would not tell me. I came back to Como Hall next day, determined to discover it by some means. Miss Pankhurst refused to tell me. She was the only one I found at home. But she told me that you had gone—that your father was ill. I waited a day or two, and then called again, hoping to have news of you. She was out, but I saw her brother. Without invitation from me, he told me all Mr. Leigh's unhappy story—told it with such evident pleasure that I could scarcely listen to him. It shocked me beyond measure, but only made me the firmer in my determination to see if you would let me spend my life in trying to console you for the terrible sorrows of the last few months. He seemed to guess from my agitation that I had more than a friendly interest in you, and asked me point-blank if I meant to propose to you."

"He proposed to me himself," said Muriel faintly.

"I guessed as much," said Venables. "I had no reason for concealing my intention, so I owned that I meant to do so, and asked him if he knew your address. He did not, but promised to ask his sister, suggesting that if I liked to send any letter to him he would forward it to you. I thanked him, and carried out his suggestion. I wrote to you, offering you once more all that was in my power to offer, and asking you to write me an answer at the earliest possible moment. I waited day after day. Nothing came. I could not bear the suspense, so went away for a fortnight. I scarcely stayed a week. I came back more wretched than I went. I went to see Miss Pankhurst—found her alone, as Hugh was gone to London. She told me your address, and that you were coming to Como Hall to-day. She suggested that I should come here and see you. I made up my mind in a moment. She sent you the telegram that I suppose you have received, and here I am."

"I never had your letter," repeated Muriel.

"Then that scoundrel never posted it!" exclaimed Venables.

Muriel was silent. Venables paced up and down the room for a minute, then he returned to her side.

"Muriel," he said, "try and suppose that you had received my letter. What is your answer? I know all now; you did me an injustice if you thought that it could make any difference to me. What does it matter what anyone else has done? You are you, and that is all I care to know."

"I must tell you something first," she replied, though she made no attempt to withdraw her hand from his. "I am Muriel still, but I am no longer Muriel Leigh."

"What is this mystery?" he asked quickly. "Don't tell me there is any further obstacle to my winning you. Surely I have had probation enough!"

"It is for you to judge," she replied. "I have found out since I saw you, that I am only the adopted child of Mr. Leigh; my real name is Muriel Rivers."

"I do not care who you are," cried Venables, "I know what you are, and love you for it. Will you be my wife?"

Muriel had but one answer to give, and it satisfied her lover.

Long and earnest was their talk together; it was some time before they sufficiently descended to things mundane to give Muriel an opportunity of explaining her history. When she did, Venables listened intently, and with evident satisfaction.

"You don't know, my darling," he said when she had finished, "how very glad I am to hear this. As you know, I should not care a bit about your relations so long as I had you; but now that it is all over, I confess that it is a tremendous relief to me to find that you are free from any connection with the unhappy man who was so disgraced. My relations would have felt it keenly, and what is of more consequence, I am afraid you would have done so."

"I did," said Muriel; "I must have felt it deeply, or how could I have refused you when you first asked me?"

After some further talk, of more interest to themselves than to the rest of the world, Venables said suddenly:

"By-the-bye, we have no time to lose. Miss Pankhurst expects you to-night."

"To-night? What did she tell you?"

"She said that you were to come in any case, and that I might bring you if you would let me. Will you?"

"Perhaps," smiled Muriel as she ran away to tell Miss Leigh of what had happened.

In another hour they were in the train, on their way to Como Hall.

"I shall have an account to settle with Master Hugh," said Venables after a moment's silence. "What a mean-spirited dog in the manger he must be!"

Muriel laid her hand on his arm.

"Don't say anything to him," she said. "You can afford to forgive him."

"So I can," replied her lover; "and, poor fellow, when I think of what he has lost, I'm more inclined to pity him than be angry with him."

"Is it such a loss?" she asked.

"Yes," he replied earnestly; "the loss of the best woman in the world."

Our Explosive Machine.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

It was a brilliant morning in August. We know how to value sunshine in Ireland, and congratulate each other on a fine day as if some rare good-fortune had come.

This day our breakfast-room, facing the east, was filled with sunshine, and every bright thing on the table reflected it and helped to dazzle both mother's eyes and mine, as we made those countless little arrangements that render the morning meal so pleasant. Mother always had a way of providing for everybody's own peculiar little fancies.

"Ask your uncle to come in," she said, glancing through the open French-window to the grass garden outside, where that gentleman was going through morning drill with his large dog, just then on his tail, blinking in the sun, with biscuit on his nose. "And where is Ruth?" she continued.

No need to ask that at the same hour in the morning, for latterly Ruth had taken a fit of watching for the postman.

Mother might have known that as well as I did, still, as she seemed to intend I should call her, I went to do so.

Ruth was coming in from the hall-door. It was nothing new to me to see a vexed look in her face as she brought in the post-bag; but this day she had quite a scared expression. The open bag lay on a chair in the hall, and she was holding up, as if out of anyone's reach, a small wooden box.

"Nora," she gasped, "here's something dreadful come to uncle. Don't touch it! It's one of those machines—dynamite or something."

It was our uncle's fortune to be an Irish landlord. He had property in two counties. Happily, one was in peaceful Ulster, and there we lived.

I say "we," for when my father's early death left mother alone in life while still little more than a girl, her brother, Colonel Lyons, to whom this Ulster property had recently come by our grandfather's death, left the army, and insisted on my mother's coming to live with him in the old place where they had all been reared.

There was a great difference in their ages, he being the oldest of a large family and she the youngest. I was then only two years old, and Ruth as many months.

People wondered—as people will wonder about what doesn't concern them—that Colonel Lyons did not marry, instead of bringing his sister and her children to live with him; and I believe mother herself said something like this to him before deciding on making her home in his house, and he told her he did not intend ever to marry.

No second woman, he said, should have it in her power to deceive him, or to break in upon his peace of mind; his sister might take his assurance as final, and he wished never again to enter on the subject.

Of course the inference from this was that some lady had acted by uncle in an unworthy manner, but nothing more was known about it, by mother at any rate, and of course not by either of us two girls, to whom even this would never probably have been told, but that mother, who was indulgence itself, wanted to smooth over to us our uncle's excessively strict and punctilious notions about the delicate refinement and propriety of conduct by which he considered young girls should be distinguished.

We were certainly neither of us inclined to be fast, and we used slang no more than we did Arabic; but we did enjoy the unrestrained freedom of tennis, and a dance, when mother took us and uncle stayed at home. Not that we were not very fond of him. We loved and revered him as a father, but when girls have "come out," and are supposed in many ways to be judging for themselves, they like to escape from the feeling that a kind of criticising watchfulness is always over them.

Our cousin, Kate Burroughs, took an amount of license in many ways we never thought of. She stayed with us sometimes, and I know uncle thought this was not to our improvement, but in spite of himself he often had to laugh at her saucy ways. She had been at school in Paris, and certainly she brightened us up a good deal.

At the back of the hall a glass door opened out on the grass garden, and over it was a deep arbour-like arch, covered with roses, and all sorts of climbing plants.

Kate Burroughs was standing there carpeting a tame blackbird's cage with fresh moss, and giving him fruit, water, and worms for his day's supply.

Looking over her shoulder as Ruth came down the hall, she asked her if she was crying forfeits, and certainly the way she held up the little box suggested the old cry of "A pretty thing, and a very pretty thing, and what shall be done to the owner of this very pretty thing?"

In a terrified tone Ruth replied:

"Oh, it's a machine for blowing up; it has the same postmark as that dreadful letter. Don't tell uncle until I get water put on it!"

I should mention that some weeks before a letter had come to uncle, threatening him with death if he dared to let the grazing on part of his Meath property, and he, defying all such threats, had let it by auction, whereupon the cattle were driven off and cruelly maimed.

These circumstances, taken along with the fact that several small neatly-packed infernal machines had just about that time been received by people who objected to the "no rent" doctrine, accounted for the dread that seized upon Ruth when, as she emptied the post-bag, she came upon a box so exactly like some of those the newspapers had been describing, that its identity with them seemed complete.

Ruth was always rather timid, and at this moment her pale, parted lips, and strained eyes full of fear, might have won a more sympathetic rejoinder from Kate, even if that cynical young lady had not, as she very well might, have gone for some water.

With both her hands still inside the bird's cage, and looking coolly over her shoulder at the box Ruth held so cautiously by one corner, "It's wedding-cake," she said.

"Oh no, it's too large for that, and nobody has been married; I want to wet it before uncle sees it," for, as Ruth told us afterwards, she felt sure that uncle, who had so defied the threatening letter, would open the box forthwith.

Here mother came out of the breakfast-room to see what we were about. She, too, turned pale at the sight of the box, and being near the door of the room, she turned quickly to the breakfast-table, and brought out the slop-basin full of hot water, saying, "Dip it in here."

I caught her hand. Not knowing what explosives might be capable of, I thought the heat of the water outside the box might set the thing off. Just then, uncle, having given the dog the last of his drill and biscuit together, came in through the arbour and asked what we were all about.

There was a little difficulty in making him understand.

Ruth, whose fear seemed to be increasing, would let no one but herself touch the box.

"Don't shake it," she cried, as if it had not got shaking enough to test it in the post-bag.

"Let me see the address at any rate?" said my uncle.

Yes, there it was: "Colonel Lyons, Killunghter House, Ballyronan." The words printed evidently with a brush and black paint, and the postmark not very perfectly taken up by the wood, but still almost certainly the dreaded Moat Hill.

Uncle, acting now with decision, took the box gently but firmly from Ruth's trembling fingers.

A chorus of voices screamed: "Don't open it!"

"Certainly not," he said. "I don't intend to open it. Look here!" and while we all followed him, he strode out and across the garden to a corner where the spouts round the stable fed a large water-butt, kept there for the convenient watering of the flower-beds.

Stepping up on the stand of the butt, he cautiously dropped the dreaded box into it, and we all breathed more freely after we heard the splash.

"And now to breakfast," he said, turning to us and trying to laugh, but I saw a sort of pale quiver pass over his face. Perhaps he thought how it might have been had that box been opened among us at breakfast.

"Say no more about it," said he, "and let it lie there until I go for it;" and putting his arm affectionately round Ruth, he called her his wise little guardian, and bade her come on quickly and pour out his coffee for him; he wanted to go up the river and get some trout, and breakfast was late this morning.

We knew my uncle's ways too well for any of us after that to continue the subject that had been so exciting us, or even to return to it unless he did himself. It had been the same when the threatening letter came. We understood then that after the first discussion of the matter no more was to be said.

On this day, as soon as the explosive machine had been thus effectually disposed of by drowning, and we had breakfasted, and uncle had gone off to fish, we became engrossed in a very charming occupation, and one well calculated to banish the unpleasant feeling that the escape from a great danger leaves behind it, when one's imagination keeps conjuring up all the possibilities that might have been, had not that one fortunate circumstance settled things the other way.

Our occupation was the arrangement of dresses for a ball about to be given at a neighbouring residence to celebrate the coming of age of the eldest son.

The Norburys were the leading county people. Great entertainments had not often come within our experience, for during the last two or three years, and that was about the time since we were old enough to go out, nothing had been heard of but unpaid rents and lessened incomes, and the difficulty of getting on at all without ever thinking of giving parties.

There was not any pecuniary anxiety among us, though uncle's Westmeath rents had been so long unpaid; but still mother liked us, even when we were "on pleasure bent," to have "a frugal mind."

Consequently, having liberal supplies of tulles and ribbons and flowers, a fashion-book of the current month, and Kate Burroughs's recent Parisian ideas and clever head and hands to help, there was little doubt but that we would be able to devise ball dresses of the tastefulness and elegance required by the occasion.

The back drawing-room was given up to us as a work-room, and soon every chair and couch was covered with the airy fabrics that were to be looped, and festooned, and trained in so many different ways, while flowers and frills, ribbons and pins, covered the table, and mother's cheval-glass, placed in a convenient light, was seldom without one of us trying some effect by its reflection.

I once heard mother say to my uncle that Ruth's feelings were "too sensitive to wear well in life," and I thought of these words as I observed how quiet and almost pensive she was that day, though as busy as any of us.

It seemed as if she had not recovered the fright of receiving the dynamite box, and of seeing how near our uncle was to serious injury—probably, indeed, to death; but the danger had been completely averted, and I wished she would forget about it, and not be so dull.

Next day she watched for the postman, and brought in the letters again, but there was no cause for further alarm among them.

Still, Ruth seemed to me not to be like herself; indeed, I had been thinking her dull before the explosive affair arose, but she had turned the subject off whenever I said so.

Then suddenly the very possible cause of her apparent loss of spirits occurred to me, and I connected it with Frank Merton's prolonged absence, for latterly I felt sure that Ruth loved him.

This was not a satisfactory idea to me, for I thought Ruth was entitled to marry someone very superior to a country dispensary doctor, and this was the position to which Frank was gravitating.

I liked him sufficiently well, no one could do otherwise. He was a great, tall fellow, with straight features, and a heap of brown curly hair, bright eyes, and a pleasant smile, and manners that were well described by his christian-name. I had known him nearly all my life, for he had been brought up by two nice old aunts who lived near us, and who had delivered him from a terrible stepmother, their brother's second wife.

All Frank's vacations while at school and college had been spent with them. This last year had completed his medical studies, and for several months before the time I write of he had lived wholly with these aunts, being on the look-out, so they said, for some opening in his profession.

My dear sister Ruth was the object of my deepest love and admiration. Artless, gentle, and refined, she never seemed to know that she was fair beyond the common lot of women—fair, with a perfection of feature, and a soft feminine loveliness, rarely met with. Her slight figure was a very model of gracefulness, and her strangely musical voice was an added charm.

The dispensary doctor of a country district in Ireland is apt to have a rough life.

Not only has he his ordinary weekly duty to attend to, but he is liable to be called on at any hour of the day or night to visit the poor in their own houses, or rather, in most cases, huts.

He has to meet infectious diseases unalleviated by cleanliness, and to attempt their cure unassisted by needful nourishment and comfort, and thus painful feeling must continually be roused by dealing with poverty too extreme for individual charity to meet.

Now this was not the lot we could have wished our cherished Ruth to share.

It was understood that Frank Merton was to be back from wherever he had gone, if not sooner, certainly in time for the ball at Norbury Hall.

His aunts, dear simple creatures, tried to look mysterious, and never said where he was, as if we didn't all know he had gone "to look for an opening"; but they could not bear that anyone should think their darling Frank had been a rejected candidate for any place, and had on a previous occasion tried to veil disappointment in silence. At all events, Frank had not returned when the day of the ball arrived.

We three girls appeared at it under the protection of my mother. Our uncle had just enough gout to keep him at home.

Our dresses were a miracle of success. Kate said they had "a true touch of Worth about them," and as our country neighbours knew that our cousin had lately come from Paris, they probably thought the dresses had come with her.

At any rate, there were no girls in the room more tastefully arrayed, and without doubt there was not one whose appearance could compare with that of our lovely Ruth.

I do not, however, wish it to be thought that either Kate Burroughs or I were at all ugly.

Ruth was paler than usual. Latterly I had seen, with pain, a half-sad, patient look about her that an occasional forced gaiety of manner did not hide, at least from me.

I felt that any enquiry into the cause of this would be ill-timed. Ruth was always quiet and gentle in her ways, but never dull till now, and as the least allusion to her being so seemed to hurt her, I waited, not without anxiety, until either circumstances or she herself should reveal the cause.

On the day of the ball I twice saw her struggling with tears, and during the afternoon she told mother her head ached, and she would rather stay at home.

But this was not to be thought of. All known remedies for headache were produced, and Kate suddenly became possessed with a frantic desire for a drive.

We had been too much in the house with these dresses, she said; she wanted fresh air, and could not go for a walk, considering she intended to dance all night; Ruth must take her out in the pony-phæton.

Now Kate being our guest, this request for a drive could not, of course, be overlooked, and as she professed to be afraid to trust herself with me, because I had once met with a trifling accident while driving, and she was not herself used to hold reins, Ruth had to go, and whether or not the drive did Kate the good she professed to require, it certainly brightened Ruth a little, and that, as I suspected, was its real object.

The ball was a very bright, well-got-up affair. Everybody one had ever heard of in that part of the world seemed to be there. Some of the men may, however, have found it a little stupid, for there were too many of them, and consequently a difficulty about partners. Our programmes were filled up as fast as possible.

The heir, to whose majority we were doing honour, led off with a very great lady who happened to be in the neighbourhood, staying at a country place her family had in the next county. There were also other important people to whom it was right he should do his duty, and then his next partner was Ruth. He had secured her soon after we entered the room.

Just as that dance was ending, I saw, among a group of unoccupied men standing near the door, the tall form of Frank Merton. He could only just have entered, or I must have seen him sooner, for during that waltz I and my partner had several times passed that place, and he was not there.

When next I saw Ruth she was sitting by my mother; young Norbury was standing beside them laughing and talking, and through the crowd Frank Merton was progressing towards them.

An evening such as this was not likely to come often. I was making the most of it, and dancing continually, being, like most girls of my age, exceedingly fond of this amusement. The next dance, a gallop, was the last before supper, to which I went with my partner.

Glancing up and down the long table, I looked for any of our party, and saw my mother near the upper end, my cousin Kate in another place, but Ruth nowhere. Some time afterwards I heard from my mother that she had gone home. She did not dance again, it seemed, after the time when I saw young Norbury lead her to a seat beside my mother.

Frank Merton had asked her, but she declined, saying her previous engagements compelled her to do so. My mother said Frank seemed vexed and disappointed, and soon after he disappeared, and she did not see him again, and then Ruth told her she wished to go home, her head ached so she could not stay, but she did not like to hurry mother, and so compel all of us to leave. Might she go with Mrs. MacMahon, who intended to slip away before supper, and would leave her at home?

Mrs. MacMahon was our nearest neighbour, her husband's place adjoined ours—"marched with it," as the Irish say. She had one little girl, an object of great solicitude, as she was often ill, and this being the case at present, Mrs. MacMahon was anxious to go home early. In fact, she would not have come to the Hall, but that from the nature of the occasion she was unwilling to send an excuse.

So Ruth went home with her, to the astonishment of our uncle, who was sitting up reading, and nursing the gouty foot that had made him stay at home.

When, some hours afterwards, we returned, Ruth was asleep. The next morning Kate and I lingered over our late breakfast, recounting all the little events of the ball. My mother, who with my uncle had long before breakfasted at our usual early hour, came in, and Kate at once began to ask her about Frank Merton, what had made him come and go so suddenly; but mother only knew that he seemed grave or vexed when Ruth declined to dance with him, "which was unreasonable," she continued, "for I knew the only blanks on her card were for dances she does not like."

With this Kate went off to write letters, declaring everybody was scolding her for her silence, and I went to look after Ruth, who was still complaining of headache, mother said, when she took breakfast to her some hours before.

Ruth, however, was up. I found her sitting on the low window-seat of a room that was appropriated to our studies in the days when a governess ruled over us, and it had ever since been peculiarly our own.

Our desks and book-shelves were there, the second-best piano on which we still sometimes practised, and our baskets of work that gave a littered and home-like look to the room.

Below its windows lay the grass garden, hedged round by dense evergreens, and away in the upper corner of the enclosure was the old water-butt, in which the dynamite box lay safely.

Sitting down in the other corner of the wide window-seat, I naturally began to talk of the ball.

Ruth, gazing out of the window with an open book on her knee, answered in a dreary sort of way, and neither of us spoke of the person whom we were both at the same time thinking of most.

I was rapidly turning over in my mind that this forced silence about Frank Merton implied too much, when our attention was attracted by the sound of voices immediately below, and in another minute my uncle and Frank issued from the arch at the glass door which led out of the house, and, crossing the garden, made straight for the water-butt.

Turning my astonished gaze from them to Ruth, I saw that she was deadly pale, and that she had shrunk back as though to be out of view if they should turn.

But they neither turned nor stopped until, reaching the butt, Frank sprang up on the block of stone where it stood, and throwing his hat on the grass, began loosening his cuffs, and pushing up the sleeves on his right arm he thrust it down the butt, and we distinctly saw him lift from it the fatal box.

Ruth was standing now, with parted lips and strained eyes, watching their proceedings. I put my arm around her.

"Don't be foolish," I said; "the thing is too well soaked to do harm."

Frank threw it on the grass beside his hat, and dried his arm. Then lifting it, he and my uncle returned to the house.

Very soon after, mother came into the room smiling, and yet looking a little agitated.

"Ruth," she said, "Frank Merton is below, asking to see you; will you go down?"

The colour went and came over Ruth's fair face.

"That box, mother!" she said; "they've got it."

"I know, my dear, but there is no harm in it now;" and in a few minutes Ruth, struggling hard to look calm, descended to the breakfast-room, near the open door of which Frank was standing.

Going with her half-way down the staircase, I just got a glimpse of his tall figure as, taking her hand, he drew her into the room and closed the door, and when next I saw her she was his promised bride.

Our uncle's notions about propriety as a leading characteristic of young girls who had been rightly brought up were always much enforced upon us by my mother, to whom indeed he chiefly communicated them.

There was an especial point that since we grew up had been driven in upon our slightly indignant attention—namely, that the permission of parents or guardians should always be obtained by a gentleman before he ventured in the slightest manner to convey to a young gentlewoman the idea that he was alive to her attractions, and solicitous of her notice.

Such a clause in the code of manners really will not work, and were it universal, parents and guardians would have perplexed lives.

We, however, were supposed to be bound by it, and thus Frank Merton had been kept for some time either in a dilemma or on the horns of one.

Whichever of these positions is the worst had been his, since in an unguarded hour he had poured out to Ruth the story of his love for her. And this with the full knowledge of the punctilio in our family on this very subject!

He knew also, knew well, how she was loved and valued at home, and that she was the favourite niece of the just a little stern and uncompromising Colonel Lyons, besides being the prettiest, and in every way most attractive girl in the neighbourhood.

What had he to offer, when the matter became known, against all this, and also against the fair worldly prospects which appertained to Ruth? for our uncle was rich, and had no relatives so near as we were.

All he could put in the opposite scale were his love and his profession.

The first he had most unadvisedly made known without any warrant for doing so, and the second was at present of no value, as, though qualified for a profession, he had as yet no standing in it, and was only "looking for an opening"—had, in fact, looked for several, and failed in getting any.

Thus it was that when he went off suddenly to Yorkshire to confer with an old doctor, who, from ill-health, was about to resign a good position, he arranged with Ruth that if he were successful in obtaining the reversion of this gentleman's practice, and also had the prospect of succeeding him in a public appointment which he held, he would at once write to Colonel Lyons and state these things, and asking his permission and our mother's to pay his addresses to Ruth, would enclose a letter for her to be given with their permission.

Of course there was something of a plot in all this, but what could they do, hedged in by our uncle's proprieties? And all the time Ruth had given Frank no promise, only a silent permission that he might do as he said.

They told me all about it afterwards, and I thought they had both behaved extremely well, though I could not but see the half-audacious way in which Frank seemed to have assured himself he would be accepted by all parties; but, of course, he must have known how handsome he was, and clever, and sure of getting on when once he got a start.

How long they had the breakfast-room to themselves that morning I am sure I do not know; it seemed to me for hours. Ruth said it was only a few minutes; but luncheon was always laid in that room, and probably Ruth remembered that a servant armed with a large tray might soon be expected, for she came to the first turn of the stairs and softly called "Nora."

Feverish with waiting to know what was going on, I was not far off, and springing down the stairs after her I was in the room as soon.

On the table lay the dynamite box, open; beside it an envelope directed to Ruth, a bunch of white-blossomed heath, and a heap of damp green moss.

Frank, who had seized my hand, telling me he was to be my brother, now began to laugh at the blank, puzzled way in which I gazed at the table.

"The whole affair has exploded," he said, "and it's all right."

So this was what the box contained! White heath for Ruth to wear at the ball, to be handed to her, along with the letter that accompanied it, by my uncle, provided mother and he were satisfied with the contents of a letter from Frank, which he laid on the moss that was to keep fresh the pure white bells of the heather.

So much for living in a land of conspirators! One can't get even the flowers for a ball in peace.

Both they and her lover's letter had been drowned by Ruth's own earnest entreaty, and she all the time fretting and thinking Frank had either failed in his mission or had forgotten her; whilst Frank, the very hour the matter was secure, had written in all due form to our uncle, giving him a highly favourable but true account of the position he had secured, and saying, as he did also in his letter to Ruth, that he might not be able to leave for some days, but as soon as his business was complete he would hurry back and still hoped to be in time for the Norburys' ball, on which occasion he begged Ruth to wear the white heath.

No reply he knew could reach him, his start for home being so uncertain, so if he could not know his fate sooner, the heath in her hair and dress would tell him all was right.

And Ruth wore damask roses, and so mistook his seeming silence that she grew faint and ill at the sight of him.

True to his name and nature, Frank came to our house next morning, and asked Colonel Lyons for an answer to his letter.

Then came mutual explanations and a visit to the water-butt.

Frank and Ruth are settling themselves now in their Yorkshire home, having lately returned from their honeymoon, spent in Switzerland.

The Editor's Note Book.

THAT Lord Salisbury should have had an overwhelming majority in the House of Lords was so certain beforehand that very little importance attached to the division, and the debate itself was regarded almost with indifference, seeing that it was really only a formal demonstration, and that the main battle was at the same time being fought out in the House of Commons. The most remarkable incident in the debate was the rebuke which Lord Derby administered to "dissatisfied and disgusted" Liberals. Truly there is no zeal like that of a convert!

FORTUNE has not favoured the Government in connection with Egyptian affairs, and it was certainly unlucky for them that the news of Baker Pasha's defeat should have arrived just at the opening of the session, and that of the massacre of the garrison of Sinkat a few hours only before the debate on the Vote of Censure. In South Africa, however, the accident of the death of Cetewayo has cut a knot which it seemed impossible to untie, and, for the moment, the Zulu Question ceases from troubling. Now that the sable monarch is out of the way, colonial opinion seems to think the easiest and safest way out of the difficulty lies in the annexation of the country. But it will be time enough to think about that end of Africa when we are not so urgently occupied with the other.

AT the eleventh hour the Government—driven into action either by the fall of Sinkat and the massacre of its brave garrison, or by the remonstrances of many of their own supporters—have determined to attempt the relief of Tokar, and, if it is not too late, the attempt will no doubt be successful.

BUT if it is right to relieve Tokar, why was it not right also to save the lives of Tewfik and his men at Sinkat? Why, if the extensive publication in Egypt and the Soudan of the fact that we have undertaken this enterprise is going to do as much good as Lord Wolseley expects, was not such an announcement made weeks ago? Procrastination, hesitation, compromise, half-heartedness—these are the evil geni of the Cabinet just now. It is quite time that the constituencies had an opportunity of expressing their views on the situation.

THE annual Parliamentary Bradlaugh farce was performed last week, and, as usual, nobody came out of it with flying colours. Perhaps the most noteworthy point in the ridiculous proceedings of the evening was the proof which was given of the extreme weakness of Mr. Gladstone's influence with the Radical members of his party. Mr. Bradlaugh is now to be prosecuted by the Government for illegally voting, but it is not to be supposed that anybody looks upon this step as being intended seriously.

So far, the upshot of the matter is that Mr. Bradlaugh has resigned his seat; much, it would seem, to the surprise of most of his friends; and that the electors of Northampton will have another opportunity of re-electing Mr. Labouchere's late colleague, if they still feel desirous of the honour of being represented by him.

It is a great testimony to the enormous power and influence which are still possessed by the Times newspaper that the death of its editor should be regarded as a public event of great, if not indeed of national, importance. Abler editors even than Mr. Chenery, who died last week, might cease to conduct other great newspapers, and their disappearance would meet with a mere passing comment, but the Times still remains the greatest paper in the world, and its editor fills a place in English public life which is, in all our journalism, without a parallel.

THE restless energy of the Prince of Wales is being utilised by the South Kensington wire-pullers without much regard to consequences, but it is time that His Royal Highness should be warned that the never-ceasing sending round of the hat under his auspices is rapidly becoming a nuisance. The Royal College of Music, the Fisheries Exhibition of last year, and the Health Exhibition of this, have all been worked in season and out of season with an eagerness which has been both tiresome and irritating, and the heir to the throne has "pushed" his wares with an amount of industry and persistency which many a commercial traveller from Manchester or Birmingham might have envied.

THE latest idea involves the sending round of two hats at once, one for a new Wellington Statue, the other for the decoration of Wellington Place, as Hyde Park Corner is in future to be called. Courtiers and people who want to stand well with "society" will probably subscribe as much as is wanted, but I do not think that the general public will trouble themselves much about the matter. And I am very much afraid that some day, when that general public's money is really wanted, it will be found that a willing horse has been very injudiciously over-driven.

I SHOULD recommend any one who is going to read the Queen's new book carefully to avoid the notices in the papers. The book itself is a very simple record of family life, which will be interesting to people who like to know how Royalty manages its domestic affairs, but it stands in much danger of being made absolutely ludicrous by the gushing adulation which has been poured out upon it. Indeed, if candour did not seem to savour of disloyalty, I think that most people would confess that they find the latest addition to Royal literature somewhat tedious.

THE difficulties of the London Steamboat Company are perhaps explicable to some extent by circumstances of a more or less private nature, which are not patent on the surface, but there can also be no doubt that the Company has suffered because it has not had the good sense to keep itself abreast of the times.

THE competition of the District Railway and of the Charing Cross branch of the South Eastern ought to have called into existence something better than the inconvenient little boats, which have for so long been thought good enough for travellers above bridge on the Thames, but the Company has been content to go on in the old way, and to offer to the public nothing better in the way of shelter from the weather than the dirty, stuffy little dens which represent the cabins of its boats, and the equally insufficient accommodation of its landing stages. If the re-constituted business is to have a chance of success there must be reform all round.

A MEETING of representatives of metropolitan vestries and district boards was held last week, and Mr. Boulnois, the chairman, in opening the proceedings, expressed his conviction that, although the present system is not perfect—I suppose he found it impossible to avoid admitting so much, at least—yet one centralised corporation would not prove a remedy. Other speakers were eloquent in favour of local self-government, and there was no difficulty in passing a resolution to that effect.

MR. BOULNOIS happens to be chairman of the Marylebone Board of Guardians, which is one of the best in London, and apparently judges all other vestries by his own. But to talk of "local self-government"; in face of the notorious fact that, with scarcely a couple of exceptions, the elections to these bodies are in the hands of small cliques, which take advantage, for their own ends, of the indifference to such matters which has grown up in the minds of ratepayers; is ridiculous.

NOR is it altogether fair to blame the ratepayers for their apathy and to say that the misgovernment of which they complain is their own fault. The contemptuous indifference with which most local authorities are regarded is, to a great extent, the outcome of the ingenious tactics by which a certain class of local politicians has contrived to drive almost all but themselves out of the field of local politics. What man of any position, for instance, with any feeling of self-respect, would care to be a member of the Clerkenwell vestry?

So much license has been given the Salvation Army, and so many opportunities have been afforded its members of making themselves a nuisance to their neighbours, that "General" Booth may be excused if he began to think that he might do pretty much as he liked, and that the excellence of his motives would effectually atone for anything not quite straightforward in his proceedings.

A VERY severe shock has been given to this idea by the judgment of the Court of Appeal, which declares that Mr. Booth must be bound by the ordinary rules of law and equity—not to mention commercial morality—and cannot be permitted to buy the lease of a public-house, covenanting to keep it up as such, and then wilfully to do what would have the effect of entirely destroying its business. Mr. Booth is held to have forfeited his lease of the Eagle Tavern, and the only relief that is given him is the permission to re-demise it to its original holder at a rent of £100 a year—the purchase cost the Salvationists a matter of £16,000—with the additional privilege of paying all damages and costs.

FURTHERMORE—and this is perhaps the most disagreeable part of the business from the point of view of the Salvationist Head Quarters—an injunction was granted to restrain Mr. Booth from any acts tending to injure the plaintiff's interest in the rest of the Grecian Theatre property. The defeat of the "Army" is complete, and now, perhaps, there will be peace in the neighbourhood of the City Road.

It is reported that the Duke of Marlborough is going to sell his pictures. The Sunderland Library has already been cleared out of its quarters at Blenheim, and, without books or art decorations, the great, gaunt palace will be a more melancholy place of residence than ever. The Duke would probably not be inclined to refuse any reasonable offer for the house itself, if he were allowed to sell it. A nation's gratitude never took a more costly or unsatisfactory form than when Blenheim was built for the great soldier.

MR. LABOUCHERE, in Truth, deals with the question of smoking in theatres in his usual confident and trenchant manner, and declares that no danger can arise from the smoking of cigarettes in passages and halls; that very few ladies are incommoded by the practice; that the ladies who do not like it are behind the age and nuisances; and that the one respect in which music-halls are better than theatres is that smoking is allowed in them. Regard for other people's ideas and wishes is not usual with Mr. Labouchere and his friends, but more cynical selfishness than this I have not often met with.

Western Yarns for Travellers.

As last Tuesday's west-bound train passed Cape Horn, a large party of Englishmen, of the "direct-from-Lunnon" variety, crowded out on the platform and loudly expressed their dissatisfaction at the scenery, which was "not at all up to the guide-books, you know, by Jove!"

As they returned to their seats to enjoy a jolly good British all-round grumble, entirely oblivious of the indignant glances of the native passengers, a meek-looking, gentle-voiced journalist from 'Frisco approached from the other end of the car and volunteered to give the tourists some valuable facts concerning the country. In an ingenious and plausible way, he answered their questions in a manner that reduced our critics from over the pond to a condition of profound amazement, not to say awe.

The next morning the journalist was informed by the porter that a committee of gentlemen wished to see him in the baggage car. As he entered the latter, he found a dozen travellers, all native, and to the manner born, waiting to receive him, hat in hand. The spokesman advanced and said:

"You are the party who was giving those globe-trotters in the rear sleeper some pointers about the coast, I believe?"

"I am, sir," said the quilldriver modestly.

"You told them, I understand," continued the chairman, "that Mount Shasta was seventy-six thousand feet high?"

"The same."

"You divulged the well-known fact that trains on this road were often detained four days by herds of buffalo, and that they frequently have to use a Gatling gun on the cow-catcher to prevent the locomotive being pushed off the track by grizzly bears?"

"Yes, sir."

"You further acquainted them with the circumstance that the Digger Indians live to the average age of two hundred and four, and that the rarification of the air on the plains is such that an ordinary pin looks like a telegraph-pole at the distance of forty-two miles?"

"I think I wedged that in," responded the newspaper man.

"And we are informed they all made a memorandum of your statement that at the Palace Hotel an average of two waiters per day were shot by the guests for bringing cold soup—eh?"

"They did."

"And, finally, we believe that you are the originator of that beautiful—that b-e-a-u-tiful—fact regarding that fallen redwood-tree up at Mariposa—I mean the hollow one into which the six-horse stage drives, and comes out of a knot-hole one hundred and sixty-five feet farther along?"

"I told them all about it."

"Just so, just so," said the committeeman, grasping the patriot's hand and producing a well-filled buckskin bag; "and I am instructed by this committee of your fellow-countrymen to present you with this slight token of our appreciation of the noble manner in which you have vindicated the honour of our native land. Heaven bless you, sir!"

Fashions.

FIRST, as to new colours; and, as the traveller said of the snakes in Iceland, there are none. We are bringing out all the old reds, light and dark, hard and soft, and giving them new names—the ugliest of these being a dirty pinkish-grey, which is called "Old Tongue," and looks as if the dyer had been uncertain whether the stuff would come out red or grey. Grey in slate and mouse, rather darker than last year's shades, is as popular as ever. Royal-blue, gros bleu, as the old china-makers called the beautiful ultramarine shade, will be very much worn during the spring months. "The Sara Bernhardt blue" is a bold grouping of several blues which were never supposed to have the slightest affinity for each other—peacock-blue, sapphire-blue, and turquoise-blue—in narrow strips, or arabesques, or spots, which at a little distance seem to blend together into one very odd colour. A few Gloire de Dijon roses upon the original dress gave the blue decision.

BONNETS will be small, made of plush, velvet, and silk cased, with the horse-shoe crown. In front they will not fit too close to the face, but rise with a half-coroneted front from the hair.

THE latest mystery of Paris is unquestionably the new pelisse, made of brocade, ottoman, stamped velvet, or silk and wool brocade. So artfully is this garment cut and fabricated that not even a jury of English ladies could decide the question whether it should be considered a dress or a dolman. The severity of outline given by a tight-fitting dress is altogether avoided in the pelisse, and it is yet sufficiently elegant to be worn in a drawing-room when other ladies have left their wraps in the cloak-room. The fronts are cut in one, from shoulder to hem, and also part of the backs, allowing for drapery to be let in. The sleeve is a modified jacket-sleeve, set in high on the shoulder. The trimming laid on is of a simple character, a rich silk cord at the edge, and knots of it on shoulders, at the waist behind, or looping across the front like a hussar jacket. One of the subtle niceties of the Parisian pelisse is its adaptation to either house or street wear; to make it suitable for the former the side can be drawn up, and fastened with a cord and buttons, thus becoming a pointed tunic looped up at one side.

OTHER pelisses, less artistic than that to which allusion is made, are being produced every day, the chief characteristics of which are the draped backs, quite a sudden change from the plain jacket of the earlier part of the season. Not a few of these have full bodices, pleated or gathered, and are confined at the waist by broad belts fastening in front with a large buckle. Sleeves rather full at the shoulder and drawn in half tight at the cuff. All kinds of materials seem to be used; even homely serge is pressed into service, but such simple textiles can only be employed for short pelisses which allow the frill of the underskirt to be revealed quite five or six inches in depth. Handsomer overalls, of slate-grey or mouse-coloured velvet, are to be seen on fashionable ladies, but most of these have the dolman sleeve falling over the hand, so cannot take rank as pelisses in the strict meaning of the word.

JACKETS are either very long or very short; that is to say, the long casaque completely covers the skirt, and is cut proportionately wide, or its place is taken by a short tight jacket, with short basque, fur-bordered. The latter requires to be well cut and well finished, good tailor style, to be even tolerable. The substitution of very narrow fur trimming for the deep sets of last year has been necessitated by the increased length of the jackets, which made so much fur a burthen when the bordering was from nine to twelve inches deep. One of these sets of fur, intended originally for a jacket of medium length, is only enough when cut into two to edge the long casaque as at present worn. The same width of the fur answers for dress tunics.

ABOUT twenty years ago, perhaps more, a pretty crimson cloth cloak was worn, with a double cape caught up behind with a bow or rosette of ribbon. Nothing more seasonable, either as regards colour or shape, was ever worn than the Galway cloak, the idea of which was borrowed from the Claddagh fishwives, who had a warm cloth, native made, the wool being shorn, spun, dyed, and woven near home. The crimson-coloured cloth has once again come into use for dolmans, and also for short tight jackets, the latter bordered with grey fur. The fashionable shade for the red cloth is soft and pleasing to the eye, nothing of the hard, aggressive, military scarlet, which does not assimilate with other colours in the rest of the costume.

THERE is no change compelled by fashion which is more unpleasant to us at first than an alteration in the everyday style of our hair-dressing. It is not so much the strange appearance presented by the looking-glass—that one may forget—but there is always a feeling that the erection, whatever it may be, is coming down. From a week to a fortnight is required to inspire confidence in the change, and even at the expiration of this time there are daily reminders of the new conditions in the hats and bonnets, which were chosen to suit the old mode of hair-dressing. Ladies would therefore be well-advised to begin early in the season to habituate themselves to change before the time comes round for choosing spring bonnets.

THE Grecian knot lying low on the neck behind must be abandoned. Paris always disapproved of it, and never sufficiently considered this English fashion in designing new bonnets. Now we are constrained to accept new conditions ourselves, and it is merely a question of how high upon the head the coil of hair is to be arranged. The bonnet with the horseshoe back seems to require something to fill the centre, and we daily see plaited rolls of hair visible under the bonnet. When hair is luxuriant and with the brightness of youth, a little display is a natural desire. Later on in the year these young ladies will resign themselves to have all their back hair concealed under their bonnets.

As there must be no projections at the back, but all the loops, twists, and plaits up on the top, firmly fastening with tortoiseshell or wire pins is necessary to ensure comfort. Make a parting straight across from ear to ear, brush one part to the front and one to the back. From the centre of the front half take a little piece and twist it into a firm little knot on the top of the head, to which the back part is to be fastened eventually. Use the rest of the front for small curls, fringe, or frizz, as seems most becoming. Take the centre of the back portion, comb up from the nape of the neck until it is so high that it can be twisted round the little foundation. Hold the switch of hair in the left hand, and roll round with the right, pinning firmly. Take up the sides, one after the other, comb up, twist again, and pin. When the hair has thoroughly taken this change of direction varieties of top-knots can be tried. A large loose plait of hair is sometimes added on if Nature has not been too bountiful. A figure of 8 is also a good arrangement. The coils must not be twisted tightly, but allowed to mingle with the curls on the top of the head.

THE hair in front is being dressed much higher during the last few months. A light fringe of short hair falls low on the forehead, softening the hard outline given by drawing up or combing up the rest of the hair. The coil on the top of the head supports the bonnet and prevents the front falling down too low upon the curled hair in front. The top-knot allows of a great variety of ornament being added besides fancy combs and pins, strings of pearls, brooches, aigrettes, and artificial flowers, buds or blossoms. Butterflies, some closely resembling nature, and other bold flights of the manufacturer, tinselled grasshoppers, golden beetles, and humming-bird moths, are among the pretty ornaments worn on the head.

THE great art of this style of hair-dressing is to consider the size of the head in proportion to the body, and treat accordingly. Among the Greeks the oval head was the ideal of beauty; and though it may not be possible to bring heads not conformed like the Venus of Milo into a pure outline, the top-knot should give the idea of narrowing, not broadening, the head, and whatever fringe is allowed should be kept within limits. This is the reason for making the combing of the sides a distinct stage of the arrangement.

EVENING gloves are long again, as long as ever they were, and necessarily so as sleeves are shorter. The arm is much softened in effect by the double frills of lace which are sewed at the top of the glove, especially when the latter is drawn up over the elbow.

The Cup and The Lip.

ONE of the early Italian novelists has left us an anecdote of a pleasant old Florentine gentleman, Scoliao Franchi by name, which, if the proverb had not been as old as the Greeks, or probably as philosophy itself, might be supposed to have originated the famous admonition about "the cup and the lip."

Signor Scoliao, the story goes, was entertaining some friends at a tavern; and the wine had been flowing for some time, and the company very merry, when the old gentleman, who had the spirits of a young one, and who was gifted with a corresponding flow of words, wound up a panegyric which he had been making on the juice of the grape with the following peroration:

"So much, gentlemen, for the glories of wine in general; and now for a sample of them in particular, and that, too, in connection with my own glory, and in the shape of this particular glass of wine which I hold in my hand, and which I am about to have the honour and felicity of drinking.

"Gentlemen, it is a very remarkable circumstance, and worthy, if you reflect on it, of your deepest consideration, that this particular glass of wine—look at it, if you please, and observe it well, as a thing contemplated in the decrees of fate—was destined from all eternity to be drunk by me, simple as I stand here, Scoliao Franchi. Moot as you will the point; bolt the matter to the bray; sift, with all the enquiries on such subjects, from Aristotle to St. Austin, every particle of evidence left in the respective sieves of your subtleties out of the whole grinding and trituration of the great question of fate, free-will, foreknowledge, liberty, necessity, and unavoidability; and you will find nothing in the whole rounds of certainty more certain than the drinking and imbibition of this particular glass of wine by me, Scoliao Franchi.

All the folios that could be written on the other side—all the armies that could be brought against me to hinder me, though they were bigger than Charlemagne's or than Agriean's—all the eclipses, comets, and earthquakes, gathered together—if that were possible—from all time—or whatsoever else might turn, terrify, and annihilate a man from his purpose, if it were not absolutely decreed as in this instance, could turn, terrify, or in the least degree interfere with, or obstruct, the passage of this particular pre-ordained glass of wine into the throat and stomach of Scoliao Franchi."

The orator had no sooner uttered these words than the friend who sat on his right, and who had been nicely calculating the mode of doing it, snatched the glass out of his hand, and swallowed the wine himself.

Postage-Stamp Collecting.

OF the many ways in which the almost instinctive love of collecting manifests itself there is none, perhaps, which is more generally popular than that which selects as its objects the postage-stamps of the world. It is comparatively rare, indeed, to meet with a family some member of which is not a philatelist, either on his or her own account, or on that of a friend, while the trade in foreign stamps has assumed proportions so large as fairly to entitle it to distinction as a recognised branch of commerce. And the pursuit, if we may so call it, has this great advantage over the accumulation of crests and similar objects with which it has often been compared, that it is not only interesting but is also instructive, almost forcing its votaries to acquire, albeit unconsciously, a certain acquaintance with modern geography and history, and also with the relative value of the coinages of different countries. Considered from an educational point of view, therefore, philately is decidedly a taste to be encouraged, while viewed merely in the light of an amusement, it is a capital occupation for whiling away a leisure hour, for young and old hands alike can always find pleasure in the arrangement and comparison of the treasures which adorn their albums.

IN the hope of assisting any of our readers who may meditate enrolling themselves as recruits in the already large army of stamp-collectors, we venture to offer a few hints as to the most successful method of setting to work. In the first place, of course, an album of some kind must be procured. The most perfect collection of stamps, if left unsorted and unarranged, would be valueless, just as would be a museum of geological specimens if the objects were merely stacked in heaps upon the floor. In choosing the album, however, some difficulty will very likely be experienced. If we go into a stationer's shop and state our wishes, we are probably shown a gorgeous volume, with pages devoted to each of the stamp-producing countries of the world, and with a variety of more or less uninteresting statistics printed in brilliant colours at the head of each page. Both sides of the paper are ruled into formal squares, and no allowance is made in the binding for the greatly increased thickness which ensues when the book is filled with stamps and post-cards. Consequently, a neat appearance can never be obtained, and there is a monotonous regularity throughout the album which is far from pleasing to the eye.

By visiting a stamp-dealer, however, an album can be procured which is in every way superior to this, and which, were it more generally known, would soon drive all other competitors from the field. This is the "Imperial" Album, which is issued in two handsome and well-bound volumes, and ranges in price from about twelve or fourteen shillings to a couple of guineas, according to the quality of the binding. Expensive, perhaps, but so great an improvement upon all others as to be more than worth the additional cost. Each country has one, two, or more pages to itself, ruled upon one side of the paper only with a space for every variety of stamp issued up to the date of publication. These spaces are of the exact form and size of the stamp, and are arranged in artistic patterns, so that a well-filled page has a remarkably pretty appearance. The spaces, too, are numbered, while upon the opposite page is a full description of the stamp for which each is intended. So, when a new stamp is procured, its place is waiting for it, and all the collector has to do is to compare his acquisition with the printed description in order that he may be sure of relegating it to its proper position.

New stamps, of course, are constantly being issued, and from time to time additional sheets are published for their reception, which after a time can be bound into a separate volume. At intervals of eighteen months or so, too, supplements are published, containing spaces for every stamp issued meanwhile. If these be used, of course all newly-issued stamps must be laid aside for a time until the publication of the supplement. Or, the new issues may be neatly arranged in the blank space in the original pages, care being taken to place them as near as possible to those stamps which they supersede without spoiling the effect of the design. This latter is, perhaps, the best system, as the stamps of each country are then kept together, and the inconvenience of loose sheets or an additional volume avoided. If the expense of this album is thought too great there are several others which meet with more or less patronage, such as the "Lincoln," the "Crown," the "Universal," etc. Purchase none, however, which are ruled upon both sides of the paper; neatness in such a case is unattainable.

A STAMP should never be fastened in its place by the primitive plan of besmearing the whole of the lower surface with gum or paste. If this be done, the paper contracts into unsightly creases, is sure, sooner or later, to become discoloured, and, more important still, the stamp cannot be removed without damaging the page. If each corner be lightly touched with strong and clear gum it will be found amply sufficient, and removal may then be effected without difficulty. With stamps torn from envelopes it is generally necessary to soak for a short time in water, in order to remove the thick paper adhering to the back, which can hardly ever be induced to stick nicely upon the pages of the album. Certain stamps, however, must never be allowed to undergo this treatment, as their colours will not stand the action of the water. Some of the Russian issues are terrible offenders in this respect, the colours washing off with the greatest facility at the least suspicion of moisture.

POSTCARDS should always be preserved uncut, and spaces are now left for them in all the principal albums. They may be fastened by the unstamped end to the narrow sheet of stout paper introduced between the pages, but require the very strongest of gum to hold them firmly. Envelope and wrapper stamps must be cut, but should not be clipped too closely; spaces are provided for these in the "Imperial" Album, just as for those of an adhesive character.

IN selecting stamps for the album, care should always be taken to choose the most perfect examples. The perforation, for instance, should not be damaged, and the postmark should obliterate as little of the surface as possible. Some stamps, again, are more faded than others, although printed from the same die; choose always the most brightly-coloured specimens. Unused stamps, of course, are preferable, when they can be obtained, to those which have passed through the post; but at the same time it must be remembered that these are more often counterfeit than are those which are defaced.

AND this brings us to another branch of our subject. Forgeries, unhappily, are only too common among postage-stamps, and the imitation in some cases is so close and exact that it can with difficulty be detected. Beware of the cheap packets of "rare stamps" which are so largely advertised; were these what they purport to be they could not be sold for three times the money. If you wish to buy stamps, go to a well-known and trustworthy dealer, who has a reputation to keep up. You will have to pay more highly for what you purchase, but will also have the satisfaction of knowing that your money has not been thrown away upon worthless imitations.

MANY forgeries can be detected at a glance, owing to the coarseness of the execution, the blurred and smeary appearance of the lines, or by slight inaccuracies in the minor details. Photographs, too, have a peculiar glossy appearance and a brownish tinge which at once betray their character. Others, again, require the testimony of an expert before a definite opinion can be pronounced upon them. Perhaps the most difficult of all forgeries to detect are "reprints," as they are called—i.e. impressions taken from the original die after it has become obsolete. Most of the old French Presidency and Republic stamps, for example, have been reprinted, as well as those of many other countries. Some of these, strange to say, have been reprinted in different colours from those of the original stamps. These, of course, may be easily detected, provided that the philatelist knows what their true colours should be, as may those in which perforation has been wrongly introduced, as is the case with some of the reprints of the British Guiana stamps of 1853.

THERE are many stamps which can rarely be met with except upon the dealer's sheets; these, of course, you must either buy or go without. It is astonishing, however, to find what large numbers of stamps may be obtained with but trifling expenditure, and luck will sometimes throw in one's way the chance of adding a quantity of rarities to one's collection for next to nothing. But, on the other hand, there are others which exist in but few only of even the best collections, and these, of course, are unprocurable. For some reasons, perhaps, this is scarcely to be regretted. With the impossibility of procuring new specimens, one's interest in a collection is pretty certain to languish, while so long as there are blank spaces to be filled there is a sure incentive for further work. Again, if every philatelist could be tolerably certain of obtaining a perfect collection in course of time there could be no rivalry, and rivalry and energy are sometimes interchangeable terms.

"LOCALS" are by some admitted into their albums, but even if genuine, which is not always the case, it may be doubted whether they should find place therein. They are not issued by Government, nor are they recognised by the regular postal authorities, so that their claims to insertion are very small. It may here be mentioned that all the stamps known as "Hamburg Locals" are pretenders, although they may be seen in many an album; many, if not all, of the American locals must be placed in the same category. There are some few locals, however, which may fairly be considered as postage-stamps, being issued by certain States for local use. Among these may be mentioned those of Brunswick, Cashmere, Hanover, La Guaira, Shanghai, and the Pony Express. Many of these, and especially the last-named, have been extensively imitated, and caution must therefore be exercised in accepting them for the album.

THERE are certain other stamps which are occasionally seen in albums, but which, undoubtedly, have no right to be present—such, for instance, as telegraph and receipt stamps, the old newspaper stamps, and the stamp now used upon registered-letter envelopes. The two former of these are not postage-stamps at all, and are therefore at once put out of court. The newspaper-stamps, now obsolete, combined tax and postage, and are therefore doubtfully eligible, while the registered-letter stamp refers to the amount chargeable for registration only, and though it passes through the post, has no claim to consideration as a postage-stamp. Still more inadmissible specimens are contained in some albums, belonging principally to collectors who hold that the great object in philately is to obtain as many stamps as possible, without reference to their value, authenticity, or claims to insertion; these, however, need not be further characterised.

An Eccentric Pigeon.

IN his "Mental Evolution of Animals," Mr. Romanes gives an instance of an odd perversion of instinct in a white fantail pigeon that lived with his family in a pigeon-house in the stable-yard. "He and his wife had been brought originally from Sussex, and had lived, respected and admired, to see their children of the third generation, when he suddenly became the victim of the infatuation I am about to describe. No eccentricity whatever was remarked in his conduct, until one day I chanced to pick up, somewhere in the garden, a ginger-bottle of the ordinary brown stone description. I flung it into the beer bottle of the ordinary brown stone description. That instant yard, where it fell immediately below the pigeon-house. He a series of genuflections, evidently doing homage to the bottle. He strutted round and round it, bowing and scraping and cooing, and performing the most ludicrous antics I ever beheld on the part of an enamoured pigeon. Nor did he cease these performances until we removed the bottle; and, which proved that this singular aberration of instinct had become a fixed delusion, whenever the bottle was thrown or placed in the yard, no matter whether it lay horizontally or was placed upright, the same ridiculous scene was enacted. At that moment the pigeon came flying down, with quite as great alacrity as when his peas were thrown out for his dinner, to continue his antics as long as the bottle remained there. Sometimes this would go on for hours, the other members of his family treating his movements with the most contemptuous indifference, and taking no notice whatever of the bottle. At last it became the regular amusement with which we entertained our visitors, to see this erratic pigeon making love to the object of his affections, and it was an entertainment which never failed, throughout that summer at least. Before next summer came round he was no more."

Sleep.

WHAT is sleep? We do not know. We can only say that it is a condition belonging to almost every animal organism, which seems naturally brought about by the activities of that organism, and which in some unexplained manner helps to reinstate the exhausted energy of brain and muscle. As to the sleep of plants, the true phenomena of sleep are restricted to the brain and the higher senses; there can be no sleep where these are absent.

Certain phenomena concerning sleep have been well observed; but the organic condition, or sum of conditions, on which these depend, remains so entire a mystery that we cannot venture on a tolerable definition of sleep. Let us be content with defining some of its leading characteristics. Look at that child; wearied with play, he has thrown himself upon the ground, and, resting a flushed cheek on one arm, he lies there breathing equally, with motionless limbs, eyes closed, brain shut out from lights and noises round him. If you touch his hand he withdraws it; if you tickle his cheek he will impatiently turn his head aside; but, even should he turn his whole body round, he will not, perhaps, open his eyes—will not know who it is, or what it is, that molests him; he will not wake. His mind, engaged in dreams, is disengaged from external things; they may make impressions on him, excite sensations in him, but these sensations are not wrought up into knowledge. His senses are dormant, or but feebly active, and his brain is busy with dreams; his limbs motionless, his fingers relax their grasp, and the muscles of his neck support his head. But the heart beats vigorously, and pumps the blood incessantly all over the body, the chest expands and contracts, the stomach and intestines digest, and all the secretions are going on.

We thus perceive how superficial is the analogy of sleep and death, supposed by the ancients to be brothers, and even by moderns supposed to resemble each other so closely that death is called an eternal sleep. But, strictly speaking, there is not only no true antagonism between sleep and life, there is not even an antagonism between sleep and waking. In death all the activities peculiar to the vital organism cease; in sleep, they all continue. Sleep is a form of life, not a cessation of life.—Lewes's Physiology.

Household Gardening.

ROSES IN GARDENS AND POTS.

EVERY year the queen of flowers increases in popularity, and never before have so many young trees been planted as during the present season. They have been planted in the form of standards on lawns and in borders, as dwarfs in beds, and as climbers for covering walls and fences. The choicer varieties are now also largely grown under glass, the growths being trained up the roofs of greenhouses after the manner of vines, while many thousands of the dwarf-growing sorts are established in pots for forcing.

ROSES ON LAWNS.

A row of standard Roses, all of the same height and planted at regular distances apart in a lawn, about two feet from the margin of the walk, can never fail being admired when seen in a clean, healthy condition, and bearing their handsome and deliciously perfumed blooms. Thus arranged they are distinct ornaments, and convenient for being enjoyed, as little or no stooping is needed for examining the charming arrangement of their delicate shell-like petals, nor for inhaling the refreshing fragrance of the flowers.

Roses of this character are established on briar-stocks by budding, and a very great mistake is made by numbers of persons in having the stocks too tall. In ordering Roses with stems four feet high, it seems to be forgotten that the blooms must be from eighteen inches to two feet higher still, and at that altitude it is obviously impossible that the full beauty of the flowers can be seen, as, being above the line of vision, they must be viewed from beneath. The stems on which standard Roses are established should not exceed two feet in height, and then if the Roses are two feet higher they will be at a quite sufficient altitude to be effective, while the centre of each flower can be seen.

With very great care in keeping the roots moist, even wet, during transit, Roses may still be planted. If desired to flourish in lawns, an excavation should be made at the least eighteen inches wide and deep for each standard, which must be planted in rich soil—two-thirds of strong loam and one-third of rich manure well mixed, forming an excellent compost.

Turf should not be laid over the roots quite to the stems, but each Rose should stand in the centre of a small circular bed at the least a foot in diameter, and six inches wider will be better. These miniature beds are not unsightly, but the reverse, when neatly formed and kept clean, with the grass edges smoothly trimmed.

Roses already established on lawns, and not flourishing as is desired, will be greatly benefited if a portion of the soil is dug from over the roots, a layer of very rich manure, three inches thick, added, and this covered with an inch or two of earth. If good manure cannot be readily obtained, soak the soil containing the roots with liquid manure. There is nothing better than household slops, nothing so good and so cheap; but stimulants of this kind are not needed by newly-planted Roses.

ROSES IN BEDS AND ON WALLS.

When these fail to produce luxuriant foliage and a profusion of beautiful flowers, the cause, in nine cases out of ten, is impoverished soil. Liquid manure poured on now with no unsparing hand is the remedy. Near walls and fences especially, the soil is usually dry below. Examine it a foot below the surface, and if it is in a crumbling state when crushed, pour in the liquid—soap-suds and household slops, guano-water, made by mixing an ounce of guano in two gallons of water, or soot-water, until the earth, instead of being dry, is quite saturated. The good effects of this treatment will be apparent throughout the season. It is a cheap and simple method of renovation that can be adopted by all.

ROSES ON ROOFS.

To see the magnificent yellow Maréchal Niel Rose in all its glory, the growths should be trained to wires under the roof of a greenhouse. The great golden blooms then hang down with their transparency unimpaired by wind or rain—festoons of them in such condition as can rarely be equalled in the open air. Grown in this manner, three thousand blooms have been gathered from one tree, representing a greater money value than if the roof had been covered with grapes. The favourite creamy-fawn-coloured Gloire de Dijon and the soft yellow Belle Lyonnaise are suitable for the same purpose, as is the American gem, Isabella Sprunt, small canary-yellow, and perhaps the most charming of Roses for button-holes.

Roses for this purpose are prepared in pots by nurserymen, and only need planting in a rich border either inside or outside the house, the roots well supplied with water, and the foliage kept free from insects, to grow luxuriantly and flower profusely. If the border be outside, the growths must be passed through apertures in the wall the same as vines, and the exposed stems covered with neat hay-bands from the hot sun in summer and severe frost in winter.

ROSES IN POTS.

There are probably few persons who rejoice in the possession of a light greenhouse or other suitable glass structure who do not grow Roses in pots, with the object of securing flowers before they expand in the open air. Indeed, so much are the blooms cherished that they have to be produced throughout the winter, and the result is that there is not a day in the year on which charming half-expanded Roses are not to be seen in Covent Garden Market.

It is very easy to have Roses in winter when well-prepared plants and suitable structures for growing them are provided. For this purpose the tea-scented Roses are the best, and they are established in pots by nurserymen for flowering under glass. But they will not succeed in a shaded house. A very light position is imperative; therefore only those whose greenhouses face the south, or at least receive a large share of sunshine, can successfully force Roses in winter.

The larger and richer-coloured hybrid perpetual Roses also flower under glass when not placed in too much heat very early in the season. That is where many amateurs fail. The present is an excellent time for placing Roses in greenhouses, and they should have a position as near the glass as possible. If the roots are kept constantly moist, the plants syringed daily in bright weather, and the growths kept absolutely free from insects, healthy foliage and beautiful blooms will be produced long before any can be cut from the plants in the open ground.

Half-a-dozen excellent varieties for flowering in pots are La France, peach; General Jacqueminot, crimson; Jules Margottin, deep pink; Niphetos, white; Madame Falcot, coppery-yellow; and Marie Van Houtte, creamy-yellow. Roses that have been established in pots for a year or more should have an inch or two of the surface soil removed, and fresh rich compost added, a mixture of two-thirds turfy loam and one-third decayed manure being the right kind; failing this, give liquid manure as advised for plants in beds, but only of half the strength named above.

A few Roses flower very well in the very light windows of rooms. The best for this purpose are the very dwarf crimson China Roses, and the lovely diminutive pink Fairy Roses. A comparatively new variety, appropriately named Little White Pet, is a gem of a Rose for window decoration, and it is not surprising that it is becoming popular.

PRUNING ROSES.

Roses in pots should be pruned now by shortening most of the shoots closely; in fact, all that are weak may be cut to within an inch or two of the base of each shoot; but some of the strong growths may be bent or coiled round if this can be conveniently done, and a greater number of flowers will be produced.

Roses on walls or in sheltered places may also be pruned. When trained for covering a surface the main stems should be about eight inches apart, and the side-growths that spring from these be cut off within an inch of the branches that produce them. Thus managed, and the plants well supported, also kept scrupulously free from insects, Roses on walls become like sheets of flowers, beautiful and sweet.

Roses in the open borders, although growing freely, should not yet be pruned. The early growths will in all probability be killed by late frosts, but the buds on the lower portions of the stems are yet dormant, and will remain so for another month if the shoots are not shortened; by that time the plants may be pruned and the lower buds start with impunity, as they will then stand a good chance of evading the effects of spring frosts that are often so destructive.

Queer Marriages.

THERE is no end to the laughable stories that the American clergy tell about the queer marriages they solemnise, and the queer fees which they receive, or sometimes do not receive.

One of the latest of these is told by the Rev. Samuel E. Appleton, of Philadelphia, and is to the following effect:

A young couple called on him not long ago and asked him to marry them, which he did. The happy groom then walked reluctantly to him and asked: "Doctor, how much is your fee?"

"I have no fixed price, but generally receive a couple of pounds," was the answer.

The bright smile of the groom seemed to leave him then, but bracing himself, he said:

"You see, doctor, I am a little short at present, but would like very much to pay you. I am a bird-fancier, and am importing a lot of educated parrots from London. Now, instead of paying you in cash, suppose I present you with one of these parrots on their arrival?"

"I should be glad to have a parrot," admitted the doctor.

"Well, it's agreed then. I will send you one in a few days; but have you a cage to put the bird in?"

"No, I have not. How much does a cage cost?"

"Oh, you can get a good one for ten shillings," was the reply.

Dr. Appleton handed the young man the amount required to buy the cage, and that was the last he ever saw of the groom, bride, parrot, cage, or the ten shillings.

Odds and Ends.

THE Rev. Stephen Mix, of Wethersfield, made a journey to Northampton in 1693 in search of a wife. He arrived at the Rev. Solomon Stoddard's, informed him of the object of his visit, and that the pressure of home duties required the utmost despatch. Mr. Stoddard took him into the room where his daughters were, and introduced him to Mary, Esther, Christiana, Sarah, Rebekah, and Hannah, and then retired. Mr. Mix, addressing Mary, the eldest daughter, said he had lately been settled at Wethersfield, and was desirous of obtaining a wife, and concluded by offering his heart and hand. She blushing replied that so important a proposition required time for consideration. He replied that he was pleased that she asked for time for reflection, and, in order to afford her the needed opportunity to think of his proposal, he would step into the next room and smoke a pipe with her father, and she could report to him. Having smoked his pipe and sent a message to Miss Mary that he was ready for her answer, she came in and asked for further time for consideration. He replied that she could reflect still longer on the subject, and send her answer by letter to Wethersfield. In a few weeks he received her reply, which is probably one of the most laconic epistles ever penned. Here is the model letter, which was soon followed by a wedding: "Northampton, 1693. Rev. Stephen Mix: Yes.—Mary Stoddard."

MADAME RUDERSDORFF was a great favourite with the Princess Royal of England, who is now the Crown Princess of Prussia. A few years after the marriage of the Princess, Madame Rudersdorff sang at a Court concert at Berlin, and was invited by the Crown Princess to breakfast with her. They breakfasted together informally, and afterwards madame sang several songs of Handel's, the Princess's favourite composer, her Royal hostess playing her accompaniments. After a while the Princess proposed a visit to the nursery. As madame was sitting on the floor, with one child playing with the charms on her watch-chain, another hanging over her shoulder, and the baby in her arms, the door opened, and the Crown Prince walked in. The Princess arose and introduced her visitor. Madame looked up, and, with her ready tact and wit, said: "Your Royal Highness, I must either disregard Court etiquette or drop the baby." The Prince bowed courteously, and said, with a smile: "Do what you like with etiquette, but regard the baby."

IN England a coach journey is regarded as one of the most charming and delightful methods of locomotion, given good roads and summer weather, of course. A gentleman was in the company of some Australian friends the other day. A Queenslander was boasting that his district was far ahead of any other known place in the accommodation, comfort, and variety of its coach travelling. "Variety, certainly!" replied a Victorian. "This was the variety when I travelled there lately. You could book first, second, and third class. Where the roads got deep and awkward, first-class passengers had the privilege of walking on ahead; second-class kept by the horses to beat them up with long saplings; whilst the third pushed the coach from behind."

JOHNNY had come home from school several times within a month with various bruises on his face and body, received in fights with his schoolmates, and on the last occasion his mother threatened him with severe punishment if he ever engaged in a fight again. Only a few days after, the lad appeared with a black eye, and, scared by the stern maternal greeting, "Well, sir?" he departed from his usual truthful ways and stammered: "I fell down and hit my head on a stone." "And which got the worst of it?" asked his big brother. "Oh, the other fellow," answered Johnny briskly. "He's gone home with two black eyes."

THE effect of Lord Coleridge's visit among the club dudes in New York has already resulted in the addition of several legal terms to their society vocabulary of slang. When they call the waiter they say: "Waiter, what's the retaining fee?" "Sixty cents, sir." "Sixty cents? Weally, Jones, I must enter a bill of exceptions and tax your costs."

Two gentlemen having a difference, one went to the other's door, and wrote "Scoundrel!" upon it. The other called on his neighbour, and was told by a servant that his master was not at home. "No matter" was the reply; "I only wished to return his visit, as he left his name at my door in the morning."

DURING the time that the late Sir Robert Peel was Premier, Lady Jane Peel was in the habit of pasting on a screen all the articles that appeared in the newspapers opposed to him. "There is nothing very singular in that," remarked Peel. "It is the duty of every good wife to screen her husband's faults."

"WHAT'S the price of this article?" said a deaf old lady. "Seven shillings," said the draper. "Seventeen shillings!" she exclaimed; "I'll give you thirteen." "Seven shillings is the price!" shouted the honest tradesman. "Oh, seven shillings!" the lady sharply rejoined; "I'll give you five."

A CLERGYMAN tells the following story: "I once married a handsome young couple, and as I took the bride by the hand at the close of the ceremony and gave her my warmest congratulations, she tossed her pretty head, and, pointing to the bridegroom, replied: 'I think he is the one to be congratulated.'"

A RICH miser has a niece whom he proclaims to be his sole heiress, but who has never seen any of his money. "Your niece is twenty years old," says a friend; "you ought to do something towards getting her settled." "Well," replied the miser after reflection, "I will pretend to be ill."

"PLEASE, sir, give a poor blind man a copper?" said a tramping beggar to a gentleman. "But you are not blind," remarked the gentleman. "No, but my partner is. He is standing down there round the corner watching to see if the police are coming."

A WICKLOW advertiser informs his customers that he alters their furs to suit the fashions, as follows: "N.B.—Capotes, victorines, etc., made up for ladies in fashionable style out of their own skins."

THE trouble with people who do nothing is that they are a long time about it.

WHAT is the average length of a London back-garden?—One yard.

DID you ever see a woman throw a stone at a hen? It is one of the most ludicrous scenes in everyday life. We recently observed the process—indeed, we paid more attention than the hen did, for she did not mind it at all and laid an egg the next day as if nothing had happened. In fact, that hen will now know for the first time that she served in the capacity of a target. The predatory fowl had invaded the precincts of the flower-bed, and was industriously pecking and scratching for the nutritious seed or the early worm, blissfully unconscious of impending danger. The lady now appears upon the scene with a broom. This she drops and picks up a rocky fragment of the Silurian age, and then makes her first mistake—they all do it—of seizing the projectile with the wrong hand. Then, with malice aforethought, she makes the further blunder of swinging her arm perpendicularly instead of horizontally—thereupon the stone flies into the air, describing an irregular elliptical curve, and strikes the surface of the earth as far from the hen as the thrower stood at the time, in a course due west from the same, the hen then bearing by the compass north-north-east. At the second attempt the stone narrowly missed the head of the thrower herself, who, seeing any further attempt would be suicidal, did what she might have done at first, started after the hen with an old and familiar weapon. The moral of which is: Stick to the broomstick.

"SAY, Bill, what is this I hear about your getting up an artificial Niagara out on Pigeon Creek? You folks seem to be going ahead!" "You're on. Going ahead! There isn't such a state as Indiana in the Union!" "But about them falls?" "Oh, we're raising 'em." "What, got to work already?" "More'n four months ago." "And how far have you progressed? What have you done?" "Well, they ain't exactly completed. Still, we've made a considerable start." "As how?" "Why, we've bought the frowsiest old carriage we could hang on to, hired the cheekiest chap in the state to engineer it, and charge thirteen dollars an hour to let it out. And, if that's not a good start towards the establishment of a local Niagara, I'd like to know what is."

"PAT," said his reverence, "I shall be very busy this afternoon, and if any one calls I do not wish to be disturbed." "All right, sor; will I tell them you're not in?" "No, Pat; that would be a lie." "An' phwat'll I say, yer reverence?" "Oh, just put them off with an evasive answer." At supper-time Pat was asked if any one had called. "Faix, there did." "And what did you tell him?" said the priest. "Shure, an' I gave an evasive answer." "How was that?" queried his reverence. "He axed me was yer honour in, an' I sez to him, sez I: 'Was yer gran'mother a hoot-owl?'"

WHEN the frightened haymakers fled from the British over Kingston Flats (near the Hudson River), in 1777, one Dutchman among the fugitives trod on a rake, the handle of which flew up and struck his head as smartly as does the staff of a policeman. Throwing up his pleading hands, he shouted: "I gives up! Hoorah for King Sheorge!" His sudden conversion was only known to a companion just ahead in the race, through whom it probably leaked out.

The New York Nation records an amusing incident at a book sale in that city. The owner of the collection gave five thousand dollars to ten several public libraries to be spent at the sale. The natural result was that the libraries bid against one another, and many of the books were run up to nearly double their market price.

"MISS Q.," said a professor at the college, "you will have an oration next Friday, and you may take as a subject 'The King of Spain.'" "Oh, professor, I cannot. That would be impossible." "Impossible! Why?" "Because it is impossible for a king to be a subject." Intense excitement in the class.

"Is this the way to Ryde?" said a traveller, who was as ignorant of horsemanship as of the place for which he was enquiring. The countryman to whom the question was addressed, carefully surveyed the horseman for a minute or two, and then replied: "Na, na; thee turns out thee toas too much."

"ARE ye going to start soon, Mr. Pilot?" said a cockney on board a steamer lying-to during a fog. "As soon as the fog clears up," replied the pilot. "Well, it's starlight now overhead," said the cockney. "Oh yes!" said the pilot, "but we are not going that way."

THE young man who is ashamed of his mother because she doesn't "put on style," and of his father because he doesn't use elegant language, is a baby that had no business to have ever grown up. An overdose of soothing syrup would have been a blessing to him.

COBDEN once threw the House of Commons into convulsions of laughter by an unconscious joke at the expense of Mr. Bright, who had just obtained a seat in Parliament. "The business of my honourable friend," said he, "is spinning yarns of low quality."

THIS was Jones's reply to a friend's intimation of his approaching marriage: "I should make my compliments to both of you; but, as I don't know the young lady, I can't felicitate you, and I know you so well that I can't felicitate her."

IF the young lady who cleans her kid gloves with benzoline, and wears them to church before they are thoroughly evaporated, knew what effect it has on the Christianity of those near her, she would probably go fishing for one Sunday.

A POPULAR writer laments the fact that American poets are declining. It is different with the American poets themselves. They lament the fact that the editors of magazines and newspapers are declining.

THE wedding service has been so arranged that the bride responds to the usual questions after the groom has responded. So we see even in the outset of married life woman is bound to have the last word.

"MY brethren," said Swift in a sermon, "there are three kinds of pride—of birth, of riches, and of talents. I shall not speak of the latter, none of you being liable to that abominable vice."

"You had better ask for manners than money," said a finely-dressed gentleman to a beggar who asked for alms. "I asked for what I thought you had the most of," was the cutting reply.

A LIVELY Hibernian exclaimed at a party where Theodore Hook shone the star of the evening: "Oh, Master Theodore, but you're the hook that nobody can bate."

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

ALSTER.—1. It was the custom formerly, when ladies themselves used to spin, for the bride to provide the house-linen. It is now not expected that she should do so, or supply any of the furniture. 2. It is impossible to tell you exactly what to get for your trousseau without knowing what your circumstances will be. As regards linen, you had better get a dozen of everything. 3. The bridegroom waits at the altar with his best man until the bride appears. She walks up the church on her father's arm, followed by her bridesmaids.

CAMBRIA.—We cannot possibly tell "what should be the rent of a furnished house in a picturesque northern county" unless we know the exact locality and all the circumstances of the case. Sometimes people will let a house for the sake of having it taken care of, and others may wish to make money of it. Much also depends on whether the place is one frequented by visitors, near the coast, a railway, and so on.

D. D. D.—You could rub the head with a little vaseline on flannel, or frequently apply a soft brush. You do not say what kind of wash you require, and therefore we cannot give you a recipe. There is a little book treating fully of the care of the hair, which would be useful to you—"Toilet Medicine," by Edwin Wooton, 2s. 6d. (W. Upcott Gill). Also see an article by the "Family Doctor," HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 124.

E. L.—We are not aware that there is any law to prevent your carrying out your intention. However, you should apply for information at the nearest police-station. Many things are tolerated in France against which there is in England a strong and wholesome prejudice.

ETNA.—1. You probably mean Mrs. Anna Jameson, who was born about the beginning of the century, and died a few years ago. She wrote on Art. 2. If the terra-cotta is well-sized, you can make etchings on it with a pen or fine brush, using either oils or water-colours.

G. P.—We believe that Howell and James are likely to have an exhibition of China-painting. There are no competitions for designs of Easter and birthday cards going on at present. They have competitions of that kind at the Female School of Art in Queen's Square, but of course these are limited to the pupils of the establishment.

JEAN.—The best plan would be to send your mackintosh to the maker. You might try rubbing the spots with brown soap, applied on a damp flannel, leave for a few hours, and wash off with care. Many cleaning stuffs are solvents, and would injure your mackintosh.

KING ARTHUR'S EXCALIBUR.—1. This question was answered last week. Please keep one pseudonym. 2. Your question about "mold" is both illegible and unintelligible. 3. From thirty to forty. 4. "King Arthur's Excalibur" is well able to decide this point for himself.

MARGUERITE.—1. Mr. Ruskin only gives lectures occasionally, and tickets of admission are generally pretty much in the hands of members. Mr. Ruskin's lectures are always well reported. See the Times of February 5th for that given on "Storm Clouds," at the London Institution on the previous evening. 2. "The Guardian Angel" and "Elsie Venner" are charming books by the same author. 3. It is difficult to obtain such an engagement, but you might advertise in the Queen or the Guardian. As you wish to be an amanuensis, we hope you will receive in good part the suggestion that your handwriting should not be so left-handed or so decorative. A plain hand easily read is indispensable for such a position.

M. H.—Jane and Ann Taylor flourished from about 1780 to 1860. Ann Taylor was about eighty years of age when she died. M. H. should see Josiah Gilbert's "Life of Jane and Ann Taylor," 2 vols. (H. S. King and Co.) The book is out of print and scarce, and can be obtained at most good circulating libraries—at any rate, can be seen at the British Museum Library.

N. M.—The materials for making the "Brass Repoussé Work" can be obtained of Barkinton and Krall, 291, Regent Street, London, W.

PENCE will find what she requires at Jevons and Mellor's, Worcester Street, Birmingham, who will send her a price list on application.

SPENCER.—We regret that the directions for knitting the shoulder-cape would take up too much of our space. Enquire for the instructions at any good Berlin-wool shop.

SWEET TOOTH.—1. The paragraph to which you refer respecting the value of cocoanut as an efficient food, was given in the "Odds and Ends" page in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 139. We cannot vouch for the truth of the statement; you have the tale as it was told to us. 2. Challen's Crystallised Cokernut answers admirably for all purposes to which freshly-grated cocoanut is applicable, and is very nice as a sweetmeat for dessert. It should be soaked in either hot or cold milk, and can then be eaten alone, or used for any of the recipes which have been given in this journal for cocoanut-cakes, rock, etc., etc. The following is a novelty and very good: Cocoanut cream: Soak an ounce of Challen's Crystallised Cokernut in a gill of cold milk for a few hours, or all night if convenient; also soak a sixpenny tin of "Nelson's Blancmange" in half a pint of milk for an hour, or more. Put both cokernut and blancmange into a stewpan over the fire, and stir until the latter is dissolved. Do not boil the mixture. Turn into a basin and stir occasionally until setting, in order to prevent the cokernut sinking to the bottom. Put the cream into a mould. This is a beautifully white and rich cream.

TIRED ANNIE.—1. Where do you find the quotation in Tennyson's works, and have you given it correctly? 2. We cannot trace this quotation.

T. L.—We have not received any letter of January 12th respecting John Brown's tombstone.

W. S.—Several correspondents kindly write that the part-song, "Evening," is by L. de Call. It is published by Novello and Co. in the "Orpheus," New Series, No. 54. The price of the part-song is 2d. It is also published in the old collection styled "Orpheus."

A Fountain of Fire.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

SHORTLY after sunset one evening in December, 1852, a couple of stalwart fishermen, while walking along the road from Port Erin to Castletown, were earnestly discussing a scene they had just witnessed, and at the entrance to the town they chanced to pause and look back. At the same moment, beyond the Mull Hills, which lay about five miles to the westward, there leaped high into the dusky air a huge fountain of fire, surmounted by a glowing target of smoke that quivered with red and blue and purple, and the landscape far and wide flashed with the same brilliant colours, much to the bewilderment of the shadows which had come to claim their own until morning, and were now fitting to and fro in a state of fantastic terror. Startled from his repose, Cronk-ny-Irey-Lhaa (the Hill of the Rising Sun) sprang out of the gloom that had been gathering around him, every feature of his weather-worn face becoming as distinct as the cloudy cushion on which his head was pillowed; while Barrule away in the north was almost as clearly defined as the deep gulf between Slieu Carnane and Bradda Head in the south; and the intervening patchwork of meadow, and moorland, and fallow, with the ruins of the old windmill in the foreground, and white-washed cottages dotted here and there in the distance, passed into view like the painted slide of a magic-lantern.

While the fishermen were gazing at this marvel in the same stupid way as a storm-driven puffin at a lighthouse window, there burst upon them the roar of a mighty thunder coming up in billows from the sea, and booming among the mountains, and the calm air was suddenly stirred by a wind that whistled dismally through the branches of the leafless trees, and the earth trembled in the throes of some fearful agony. Then followed a darkness, and silence, and stillness, intensified by the sharp contrast, and pervaded by unknown horrors.

They were no poltroons these two tall fellows in knee-boots, blue guernseys, and sou'-westers; only set them in a crank old lugger to ride out as fierce a gale as ever lashed the shores of the Isle of Man, provided that it followed the groove prescribed by custom, and neither of them would have shown the slightest signs of discomposure; but the strangeness of this terrible phenomenon turned their hearts to water, and instead of making for the open country, they rushed wildly along the narrow street and so into the market-place, in the centre of which a frightened, wondering crowd was already collected.

It was a curious scene, showing with tolerable accuracy the idiosyncrasies of those who took part in it. Mothers were as readily discernible as clucking hens with their young broods gathered around them; the unmarried ladies displayed a marked affection for their jewel-cases; some of the men had cash-boxes, others cheque-books, and one old fellow hugged a cabinet of fossils under his arm. The windows were broken in many of the houses around; there was an incessant fire of questions which no one could answer; and from the ivy upon the walls of the old castle came the terrified twittering of hundreds of sparrows and starlings, as if a severe thunderstorm were in progress.

Later in the evening there arrived a traveller from Douglas, eight miles towards the north-east as the crow flies, and another from Peel, eleven miles towards the north-west, and both brought accounts of an earthquake that had produced the greatest consternation for a time. This theory began to gain ground, though such disturbances had probably not troubled the island since the misty days—countless ages before St. Patrick banished the magician king, Mannanan-Mac-y-Lheir, across the wave—when the Stack of Scarlet was a submarine volcano, which set the limestone rocks around writhing in a torment they have never forgotten, for Castletown was the seat of government then as it was until recently.

But in order to ascertain what really had been, it will be necessary to go back to the previous evening and to transport ourselves to the hamlet of Cregneesh, lying among the Mull Hills at the extreme south of the island.

A strong easterly gale had been blowing all day; and although it had somewhat abated, it was still screaming through the rock-girt Sound, and the surges were pounding desperately at the cliffs, and the sad-faced moon, coming to peep between the long black bands of cloud that barred her dismal prison, would glide swiftly away, as if affrighted at the turmoil below. The gulls and gannets were inshore, cowering under the hedgerows; and only the puffins and cormorants clung to the most sheltered spots of their rocky ledges. But the rain had ceased when Callow Dhone—or Callow the Fair-haired, as we should call him—opened the door of his little thatched stone-cottage and looked out.

He was a tall, square-shouldered man, rather short in the legs, perhaps, with long powerful arms, and a pleasant, good-humoured face much bronzed and furrowed. While his yellow hair and beard showed here and there a trace of silver, which in this way comes to most of us in time, he was as active as many a young fellow of five-and-twenty; and his scarcely perceptible stoop was due, not to the weight of his sixty years, but to toiling over a heavy oar in a rough sea. Farming his own patch of ground during the months of winter and early spring, and during the rest of the year fishing in a lugger, of which he was part-owner, his dress was a singular mixture of a sailor and a landsman—knee-boots, blue guernsey, black coat, and an antique, brownish top-hat, very high, very narrow, and very flat in the brim. But if this costume gave him an odd appearance, one look into his clear blue eyes was enough to show that here was a man whose hand no one need be ashamed to shake—who would stand by his duty in all weathers; and, indeed, the downright honesty of Callow Dhone's grip sometimes brought the tears into one's eyes.

His wife was seated upon a bench with a tall, upright back, which stood on one side of the peat-fire, an old Dutch clock occupying the recess at the other side. She wore a large white cap, a jacket of unbleached wool, and a coarse brown dress, partly concealed by an apron; and the rushlight flickering upon the round table in the centre of the paved floor enabled one to see that she was spinning with an old-fashioned shuttle.

"What kind o' a night is it?" she asked in Manx.

"Just middlin'. It looks to be clearin' away to the east'ard, an' I'm thinkin' it's not blowin' so hard."

"Do you think you could find that botherin' goat for us?"

"Anyways, I can step out an' have a sight roun'," answered Callow Dhone, closing the door and going away down the road.

On either hand thatched cottages, facing every point of the compass, were scattered about in picturesque confusion; and among and around them were tiny fields, cut in the quaintest shapes, sloping this way and that, and surrounded by low walls of loose stones. Callow Dhone had heard of Douglas from some wonderful traveller, but had never been farther than Castletown, which, besides being a grand place for the sale of herrings and lobsters, was to him a town of surpassing magnitude and grandeur; and, though he was familiar with Port St. Mary, where his lugger and Norwegian skiff lay, Cregneesh might be called his world; for its inhabitants were all in all to one another, being bound by ties of kinship, and friendship, and sympathy, sharing their goods in time of need, and never marrying beyond their own small circle. So from every cottage at which he called to enquire about the truant goat, came offers to assist him in the search; but, unwilling to give trouble about so slight a matter, he shook his head and went away through the gorse and heather that carpets the moorland stretches of the Mull Hills, and at last arrived within sight of the Sound.

The ground trended away gradually for about a hundred yards towards the east, and then stopped short in sudden terror at the brink of the stupendous black precipice of Spanish Head; but southwards the hill dipped more sharply to its base of cliffs, less awful in height, yet presenting a bold front to the boiling sea that wind and tide were driving through the Sound as through a funnel, while the reefs and gulleys here only stirred the waves in a white fury. Beyond this half-mile of seething water lay the Calf, rolling upwards from its bristling walls of schist in grand sweeping curves, which, had they been produced downwards, would have met those of the mainland, so that it looked as if the channel between had been sliced out bodily. The grass-crowned rock-girt islet of Kitterland in the centre of the Sound was hidden beneath dense showers of spray, and beyond rose the sharp black point of the Thousla Rock from a caldron of foam, hissing as if it were a live thing. At the best of times, this is a tumultuous spot; for not only does the current gallop by like a racehorse, but also the bottom is so rugged that the waves spring up in the most disorderly manner, hustling and struggling with one another, leaping into the air in an angry embrace, lashing the rocks that stand in their way, and bent only on crowding through either of the two narrow passages. But on the wild December evening when Callow Dhone gazed down upon this scene, with the moon timidly dropping a streak of silver here and there, and the east wind tearing along in leaps and bounds, and the waves tossing their manes aloft and madly hurling themselves westward in their desperate endeavour to escape his scourges, and the white smoke flying from them in clouds as he mercilessly thrashed them onward, and mingled with the din of this strife of waters a hollow, moaning sound coming up from the caverns whither some of the fugitives had been driven—all this bore a weird resemblance to the maddened, resistless stampede of a drove of wild horses over the prairies. Accustomed though the old fisherman was to many a worse storm than this, he could not repress a shudder; and as he turned seawards, he muttered, "It would go hard with a boat on the Thousla Rock this night."

He had scarcely uttered these ominous words when he was startled at beholding a small brig staggering along through the waste of waters off Kione-y-Ghoggane. As far as could be seen in the uncertain moonlight, she had suffered no damage beyond the loss of her fore-topmast, the wreck of which had been cut away; and though it was clear that she was deeply-laden, she was under such short canvas, and came through the waves so bravely, that no great danger was to be apprehended from that quarter, especially as both wind and sea were undoubtedly falling. But in another respect she was in the utmost peril, for she was making so much leeway that by no possibility could she weather the Calf; indeed, it seemed probable that she would run foul of Spanish Head, and sink in the deep water at its base.

Callow Dhone's breath came fast and thick, and, gripping his yellow beard, he pulled at it as if it were a hawser; and then he gave a great sigh, and started off at a run for the edge of the precipice, where he looked down at the breakers, bursting like enormous bombs against the huge wall of rock that rose sheer out of the sea, four hundred feet below. He tried to calculate the brig's distance from the Head, and the rate at which she was travelling towards it, and he devised a dozen schemes for extricating her from her terrible dilemma, and he rejected them all as useless. Every moment was bringing her nearer and nearer; every gust was pushing her towards the grave; even now she was so horribly close to the rocks that on a calm day she would have been within hail. Callow Dhone groaned aloud. It was a fearful thing to stand there, and watch his fellow-creatures drifting to destruction, and to be unable to stretch out a hand to help them; and he clenched his fists until the nails were piercing his flesh, and shouted he knew not what.

But just as he had made up his mind that the brig would be battered to pieces against Spanish Head beneath his very feet, it almost seemed as if the wind, rebounding from the high cliffs, was sheering her off a little, or perhaps it was the drag of the current lifting her forward; at any rate she narrowly cleared the Head and stood across the entrance of the Sound, which gleamed like a snowy chasm in the moonlight. And now there was a bustle on board of her, and her skipper showed that he was a courageous man, capable of grappling with an emergency, for seeing that there was but one chance of safety, small though it was, he put his helm up, squared away his yards, and drove his vessel for the larger of the two channels between the Thousla Rock and Kitterland. This was a bold manoeuvre that Callow Dhone could well appreciate, and standing there alone on the cliff he took off his hat and waved it, and raised a lusty cheer, which the wind carried away like thistledown. Still, the danger ahead was almost as great as that which lay astern, and while he knew that he could be neither heard nor seen, such was his excitement that he ran along the cliffs, signalling with his hand and shouting, "Beware of the Thousla Rock!" which by this time was under water.

The brig was slashing along at a tremendous pace, regularly ploughing her way through the sea, and scarcely lifting at all. Wind and tide were both trying their strength upon her, both hurrying her westward, but she had so small a spread of canvas, that the latter, having the most to lay hold upon, proved the stronger of the two. When she reached the seething eddy off Kitterland, the current caught her by the keel, swung her round, and hurled her on to the reef. With a crash the foremast fell, and one poor fellow was gone for ever; and a huge sea poured over her, and three black specks were struggling in an avalanche of foam, which soon swallowed them up. This dreadful catastrophe seemed the work of a moment. In the twinkling of an eye, a fine shapely vessel spurning the waves right and left, and proudly defying the winds, and bearing a crew of brave, hopeful men, had vanished; and instead, there was a battered, groaning hulk, with a few miserable wretches clinging desperately to her torn rigging, and the wild seas sweeping triumphantly over her, and the rocky spikes piercing her poor strained sides. The awful contrast would have made a landsman shudder; but for a sailor it was something terrible to contemplate. "God help them, poor weak things!" was wrung from Callow Dhone's heart as he turned and fled up the hill towards Cregneesh.

Although his eye had been caught by a white object which he knew was his missing goat, perched on a dangerous crag close to where he had stood, it was no time to delay for anything of that sort when his fellow-creatures were in deadly peril. Had he not been a seaman well acquainted with the tricks of the Sound he would certainly have attributed a disaster of such magical suddenness to some malicious evil spirit. As it was, however, he saw that natural causes were at the bottom of it, and his thoughts were concentrated upon the rescue of the survivors. Given only time, a life-boat could have managed the business easily enough, but Castletown being the nearest station, this was out of the question. Although his best plan would have been to go to Port Erin, take a boat there, and row up in the comparatively smooth water under the lee of the land, his Norwegian skiff was lying in Port St. Mary, and she was such a fine, handy, reliable boat that he determined to make use of her and chance the rough sea.

When he arrived at Cregneesh, he briefly explained what had happened, and what he intended to do; and as the news spread from cottage to cottage, every man came forward and begged to be allowed to go with him.

This, of course, being impossible, he selected three powerful young fellows, whose brown cheeks glowed at the honour conferred upon them. The principle of "doing unto others as you would be done by," though long ago elbowed out of more crowded communities, still possessed a healthy vitality in this old-fashioned hamlet, where it was regarded as a mere matter of ordinary duty that lives should be risked on the chance of saving other lives.

Mothers and wives, sisters and daughters, issued from their cottages, and stood around, trembling and keeping back the tears with difficulty. Yet they wore brave faces, and, if their voices quivered, their words were words of encouragement, and not a syllable of remonstrance fell from one of them. They were proud of these fine fellows who were marching away so dauntlessly, carrying their lives in their hands; and it was not for them to show fear and cause needless trouble, but rather to help and invigorate. And if you had seen them waving their aprons, and heard them cheering huskily, and telling the very babies in their arms to cheer, as shoulder to shoulder the four in the yellow oilskins and sou'-westers walked down the mountain road without daring to look back for fear of being unmanned, and if you had afterwards seen them sobbing pitifully by their peat-fires, and shuddering at every gust of the wind without, I am quite sure you would have admired the heroism that enabled them to point out the path of duty, though its end were death, while all the time their yearning love was pulling so hard the other way.

But it was only a short time that they remained indoors. Putting on their quaint old bonnets, and wrapping shawls around them and taking the arms of husbands, or sons, or brothers, some went away to Fistard Head, and others as far as Perwick, to look down upon one of the most agonising spectacles it is possible to imagine—their dear ones for a whole hour or more in the very jaws of death. The period of waiting seemed interminable; but at length a shiver ran through the group on Perwick, for coming along through the white waters of Poolwash Bay was a small black dot, and then another. Here was a strange thing, the meaning of which they did not learn until afterwards.

It turned out that the men of Port St. Mary were not to be outdone by the men of Cregneesh, and when Callow Dhone ran his skiff into the harbour, they hurried away to another boat, and four of them jumped in and shoved her off also. So there were two boats travelling in company, which, at any rate, made it all the safer if an accident should happen to either of them.

Fortunately the gale had nearly blown itself out, and as the current, running like a mill-race in a clearly-defined line about a mile off the land, acted upon the sea somewhat as a taut rope does upon a swelling sail when pressed against it, the waves were much less boisterous than a few hours earlier. For all that, gnashing their teeth, and roaring, and plunging, and struggling, they led the two boats such a dangerous dance, that only careful management saved them from being swamped; and when at last they crept into the moonlight under the headland, it was clear that they had shipped a considerable amount of water.

It was a grand sight to see Callow Dhone and the three fine fellows behind him, tearing their oars through peaks of seething foam and gulfs of green water; and it was easy to imagine the grim, set look that a stern conflict with death always brings into the faces of brave men. One accustomed to handle the light sweeps of an outrigger upon the sheeny surface of the Thames, might possibly have found fault with their style—their curved backs, their tumble-forward over their hands, their habit of getting the weight on at the end instead of at the beginning of each stroke, occasionally their erratic time, and a dozen other things; but, while the wonder was that they were able to row at all in that wild medley of green valleys and snow-capped hills, their heavy oars came through the water with a powerful rip that made them bend like whips, and the boat sprang forward as if impelled by machinery, and, so far, the sea had been unable to harm this cockle-shell, which it tossed up and down so scornfully. The old fellow's nerve was as steady as if he were on shore. Half-turned round in his seat so as to be able to look ahead, he was humouring the waves like so many women, turning aside to let the more spiteful pass by, pleasantly coaxing and cajoling others of a more gentle aspect, and going slap-dash at others that showed claws not too dangerous. It was beautiful.

But the watchers on the cliffs saw only the danger of the thing.

They knew that a single false step, or it might be an unavoidable misfortune, meant death; and every foaming crest that bore down upon the boat, and every gulf that opened before her, and every plunge and spring she gave, sent a responsive thrill through their veins. Oh, how painfully their hearts throbbed! Their ruddy cheeks were bleached to a whiteness that looked ghastly in the moonlight, which now streamed from a clear blue sky. Yet knowing from frequent experience of such sad matters the value of encouragement, they actually compelled their voices to cheer; and when the cheers came back in their faces and flew away landwards, refusing to do their bidding, they took off their shawls and hats, and waved them aloft, and so followed the coastline.

However, Kione-y-Ghoggane and the Sugarloaf were reached safely, then Black Head, then Spanish Head, and at last the brave fellows were in the Sound, where the sea would have puzzled a life-boat. But Callow Dhone and the Cregneesh men knew its fretful ways; and so did the Port St. Mary men; and here taking advantage of a sheltering reef, and there slipping through an eddy, and twisting in a marvellous manner through the more peaceful spots in the rough water, and always treating the waves like rational beings to be coaxed and argued with, if high and mighty, or to be trodden upon, if humble, they gradually edged their way up the channel remote from the Thousla Rock, and eventually ran into the smooth water under the lee of Kitterland. And then you should have heard the mighty cheer that rang out from the cliffs and startled the puffins, and cormorants, and guillemots sleeping on their rocky ledges! And you should have seen those pale, worn faces now, with tears of joy streaming down their cheeks; and the men looking out mistily from eyes that refused to be manly! They clasped one another's hands and stood there quivering and voiceless, exhausted by the terrible strain and the supreme effort afterwards; and mingled with their love and gladness was a great pride for those who had done this deed. For the moment the shipwrecked sailors on Kitterland were forgotten—Callow Dhone and his brave crew occupied all their thoughts.

The brig seemed to be in much the same condition as when Callow Dhone had seen her from the mainland. As she was stoutly built, her hull was unbroken and her mainmast still standing. But the survivors of her crew had abandoned the rigging, and had managed to clamber up into a place of safety beyond the reach of the waves, though it subsequently appeared that her captain, failing in the attempt, had been washed away and drowned. These poor shivering creatures were perched upon the grassy platform on the top of Kitterland, where they were joined by the crews of the two boats, and after a while there came to the shore a signal that they all intended to remain there until the sea had somewhat abated. So, as there was nothing further to be done, and no good to be gained by waiting, the group on the cliffs went up the hill to Cregneesh to snatch a few hours' sleep, and in the early morning the four fine fellows who, to the music of cheers and throbbing hearts, had marched away to confront death, came back again to receive a greeting as warm, and proud, and loving as ever was bestowed upon a conqueror. They had landed the shipwrecked sailors at Port St. Mary.

I would gladly end my story here, but it was not to be; the worst had yet to come, when all danger seemed over. Though Lloyd's agent arrived at the Sound about mid-day, it was not considered safe to visit the wreck until pretty late in the afternoon. He found no difficulty in obtaining hands for the work of saving as much of the cargo as possible, for many had been attracted to the spot by the chance of salvage, others by curiosity, and others by interest in the proceedings of the previous evening. Among the latter were the eight brave fellows of Cregneesh and Port St. Mary, and, headed by Callow Dhone, they all offered their services, which were readily accepted. Thirty men in all crossed the Sound, landed on Kitterland, and boarded the hulk.

For a short time all went well, but scarcely had the sun set when there occurred the awful catastrophe that startled Castletown, Douglas, Peel, and, indeed, the whole island. In one moment the wreck and the thirty men on board of her had disappeared—blown into the air by the sixty tons of gunpowder that had formed the brig's cargo! It was a pitiful thing to meet death thus after braving the perils of the deep; but so it was, and so perished that fine old fellow, Callow Dhone.

Lengthening Days.

THE days draw out, and with the gloaming grey,
There softly mingles a faint flush of rose,
Streaked with bright lines of gold; the chill dark hours
Of Winter's dreary reign are on the wing,
And new-born hopes of coming Spring-tide's joys
Soothe wearied heart and brain.

Beneath the eaves
The roosting sparrows dream of future nests;
The blackbird skirls across the laurelled path,
Waking the echoes with his startled pipe,
Aroused from visions of a dusky mate
By some intruder's footfall.

In the air
There is a nameless fragrance, fresh and sweet—
A pure elixir of life-giving strength,
That fills the veins and makes the leaping pulse
Beat with new vigour. In the city streets
The busy workers whistle as they pass
In cheery crowds toward their daily toil.
And by the furrows, sweet with new-turned earth,
The ploughboy plods and sings. A kindred sense
Of winter over, and the summer nigh,
Makes glad alike the country and the town.
Joy for the lengthening days! and thanks to Him
Whose wisdom gives in turn, with Father-hand,
To all His children with impartial love,
The changing seasons of the rolling year.

Book IV.

CHAPTER I. "IT IS FATE."

VAUX ABBEY is a noble old place of great architectural beauty, in one of the most romantic and fertile districts of North Devon, and there Mrs. Dunbar-Vaux has assembled a large party of friends to spend Christmas.

The place had come into her husband's possession by one of those sudden failures in direct issue so welcomed by remote branches of ancient families. He had retired from the service, and taken up his abode at Vaux with all the zest of novelty, and all the pride of ownership in a place that well deserved such pride. True, it entailed some worry and annoyance, a great deal of lawyer's bother, and a necessity of altering his usual cognomen to that complex one of Dunbar-Vaux, which his friends found difficult to remember in any form of personal address; but he would have been an ungrateful man at best, to grumble at such trifles as these, seeing the substantial advantages appended to them.

It still wants a week of Christmas, and the Abbey has not received its full complement of guests. In the dusk of a late winter afternoon Mrs. Dunbar-Vaux is sitting toasting her pretty feet at her dressing-room fire, and chatting affectionately and cordially to a friend and guest who has only arrived an hour before.

The friend is Beryl Marsden.

"To think," Mrs. Dunbar is saying, "of the ages and ages since we have met like this. I owe a debt of gratitude to fate at last, though fate is exemplified by your illness and your husband's misfortunes; still, 'It's an ill wind,' you know, and I mean to cheer you up, and make you like your old self. You have been a perfect hermit for the last year or more."

It is indeed a very sad, if a very beautiful face, that looks up to her own in the reddened glow of the firelight, and the faint smile that steals to the lips has very little of the brightness and youth it ought to have had, considering that Beryl Marsden is still a young and very fair woman.

"I am so glad you are not going back to that hateful India," continues Madge emphatically. "When affairs are settled, I hope your husband will live in England altogether. You must try and persuade him."

Beryl is silent. In her heart she knows—what the world half suspects—that these same "affairs" of her husband are in a curious state of entanglement and confusion: a confusion which has not been without some stigma of dishonour, and which has never been fully explained to her in those cold, curt letters that have bidden her remain in England until further notice. And month after month has rolled by since that terrible illness which laid her prostrate at the very borders of death, and now it is sixteen months since she sped back in answer to that ominous message of Ivor Grant's—only to stretch empty arms for her lost treasures, and gaze with blank despair on the desolation of her life.

Sixteen months!

Well, time has not consoled her yet, for her heart has never lost its memory of grief, though that grief is kept in those inner chambers of her nature, that to the world at large are a sealed book.

She is altered in many ways since that glad and glorious spring-time when she trod the cowslip-meadows with her darlings by her side, and watched the skylark's flight with little Jack.

The heart's sorrows must leave their traces on the life they touch, and Beryl Marsden's had been heavy enough, Heaven knows! At times she seemed reckless, and defiant, and almost hard, but there was something about the tremulous lips, and in the sombre depths of the eyes that spoke still of the living, struggling womanhood within, asserting itself from those locked and hidden sources that grief had tried to chill into despair.

Every time Madge Dunbar looked at her, she felt an intense and wondering compassion filling all her soul. She was really and deeply attached to Beryl, and all these years of separation had not weakened their friendship. She might have wondered at the change more than she did but for the fact of herself possessing a nursery full of noisy, rosy little romps, and seeing how Beryl's face had paled and quivered at the sound of the laughing voices. She saw then how deep that wound had gone, and her heart went out in the full, strong tide of a true woman's sympathy for the bereaved mother.

It had only been with the greatest difficulty she had persuaded her to come to the Abbey, for Beryl shrank from gaiety and frivolity as from a rough hand laid upon a throbbing wound. There seemed no forgetfulness for her even in what the world calls "distraction." But Madge would take no denial, and so talked, and argued, and reasoned, and persuaded, that at last Beryl gave in, and to-day only had she arrived.

"Have some more tea," continues Madge Dunbar, turning to the tête-à-tête tea-table beside her. "You look cold and tired still."

Beryl accepts the cup, and stirs it thoughtfully, looking at the fire with dreamy absorbed eyes.

"Have you many people staying here?" she asks at last.

Her hostess runs over a list of names glibly enough. At one Beryl gives a perceptible start.

"Captain Grant—but he won't be from home at Christmas time, surely?"

"My husband says so. Didn't Ivor tell you? I thought you were such friends."

"He was very good to my boys," says Beryl, with a little catch in her breath. "I have not seen him often lately, though. He was away the last time I stayed at the Court, and in London we never meet."

"Well, you will see him here," says Madge cheerfully, all unwitting of the unwise action she has committed in bidding her husband give that invitation. "Do you remember," she adds suddenly, "the first time you met Captain Grant at my house, and what fun you made of him because he looked so bored and dandified?"

"Yes," says Beryl quietly, "I remember."

"He is a very good fellow, I think," continues Madge. "At least, my husband swears by him. Although they don't see much of each other, the friendship holds good, you see. What was it you called him, by-the-bye? My Lord—my Lord something?"

Beryl's face grows warm.

"Never mind," she says; "he turned out better than his looks led me to believe, and I have given up trying to judge people by first impressions. They are more often wrong than right?"

"My Lord—what was it?" continues Madge Dunbar pertinaciously. "Do tell me, dear, or I shall be puzzling my brains all night to remember."

"No, no," says Beryl hurriedly. "What does it matter? Let me forget I was ever so foolish."

"Has your opinion changed so entirely, then?" asks Mrs. Dunbar in some surprise.

"Yes," she answers very low; "he has been such a good friend to me—so thoughtful, so patient, so true, I—I hate myself when I think how once I misjudged him."

A vague uneasiness comes into Madge Dunbar's eyes. She had not expected to see her friend so moved by her jesting words. Knowing Beryl as she knows her—knowing, too, the emptiness of her life, the utter want of sympathy between her husband and herself—she feels a sense of disquietude at these warm words of praise for another man.

"He is certainly very nice," she says thoughtfully. "I wonder why he hasn't married."

"I asked him once," says Beryl, with a curious faint thrill at her heart as the magic-lantern slide of memory showed her that pale, sweet twilight when she and Ivor had paced to and fro under the trees, and he had answered her question with so sad and hopeless a voice.

"And what did he say?" asks Madge, slowly sipping her tea, with her eyes still on Beryl's face.

"He had once cared for a woman very dearly, but she was—dead."

"There are plenty others," says Madge somewhat scornfully; "I thought men were never faithful to shadows."

"I told him so," answers Beryl softly as she places her empty cup on the table. "But he said he could not care for the—others. It is a pity; he would make such a good husband."

"Oh, he will marry some day," says Madge lightly; "he must, of course. There is the Court, you know, to be kept in the family. He will bury his romance, and turn out a quiet, well-regulated British paterfamilias—see if he doesn't."

"I hope he will be happy," Beryl answers, looking straight into the fire with eyes that have grown strangely wistful beneath their dusky lashes.

"Why should he not?" asks Madge brusquely. "Don't run away with the idea, my love, that men care more for romance than reality. Prose is a much more comfortable and reliable thing than poetry, just as solid food is infinitely better for the palate than olives and sweetmeats. Romance should be taken as a sort of 'grace before meat'; we know it's necessary, but we feel very glad when it's over—men especially."

"Are you growing cynical?" asks Beryl with a faint smile. "It doesn't seem to suit you. You were romantic once, you know, when you fell in love with Cosmo."

"I dare say," laughs Mrs. Dunbar lightly; "that, too, is a necessary evil. Everyone falls in love, and we are all gods and goddesses, and angels and heroes, to each other, until marriage comes to put us right, and show us we are only very mortal after all. But as I said before, it is a more comfortable stage to arrive at, just as the plain food is the most wholesome, though it may not look so nice."

"I have had no romance in my life," says Beryl somewhat sadly, "so I ought to be happy and comfortable enough. I was very happy—once," she adds, her lips quivering, and a momentary dimness shutting out the dancing fire-flames from her gaze. "I suppose one can live on memory, though. Does that come within your definition of plain food, Madge?"

"My dearest," cries Mrs. Dunbar, throwing herself on her knees beside the slender figure, whose sorrowful face is suddenly hidden from her eyes, "pardon me if I hurt you. Indeed, I did not mean to waken the old pain. Will nothing comfort you or make it easier—"

"Nothing," sobs Beryl, as her head drops on her friend's shoulder in sudden abandonment of the grief that overwhelms her. "I can't forget, and I can't be happy, and I see nothing to look forward to in the future—it is all so hopeless, and desolate, and dark."

Two hours later, when Beryl Marsden swept into the drawing-room—a queenly figure in black velvet, with diamond stars in her rich hair, Madge looked at her, and watched her meeting with Ivor Grant with irrepressible curiosity.

But they were, to all outward seeming, only two well-bred handsome people, pleased at meeting each other unexpectedly.

What curiosity, however deep or fear-filled, could pierce into the man's heart, or hear its wild and painful throbs as the well-remembered music of the voice he loved fell again upon his ears, or who could read that fair, sad woman's face and know its soft content came from that inward inexplicable feeling of perfect restfulness and joy, that only one presence in the world had ever had power to bring?

Oh, blind human eyes that look upon the surface of all life, and think yourselves so wise, happy is it for you that you see not into the depths below—that you cannot read the woe and strife, the passion and despair, that stride into your midst, and play their part on to the bitter end!

"Captain Grant, will you kindly take Mrs. Marsden in to dinner?"

In silence Ivor gives his arm, in silence Beryl takes it. How can she tell that he is saying to himself with the very bathos of desperation:

"I have avoided her, shunned her, refused even to spend Christmas at the Court, because I was so sure she would be there, and now—I find her at my side. Heaven help me! what use to struggle—it is fate!"

CHAPTER II. TRIED—AND FOUND WANTING.

VAUX ABBEY was a charming place to stay at.

Everyone did just as he or she liked, and that delicious sense of liberty and good-humour pervaded the establishment which is essentially necessary to the enjoyment of a visit to a country house. The party assembled was a very pleasant one. There were some pretty and delightful women, an equal number of equally agreeable men; a host who was the soul of good-nature, and a hostess who made the most liberal-minded of chaperons.

The only shadow among the pervading brightness was Beryl Marsden's sad face, but even that gained a little warmth and cheerfulness after the first few days had passed, and she, too, began to yield to the genial influence around.

It was Christmas Eve, and the house-party had assembled in the beautiful old hall, for that pleasant excuse for gossip and flirtation—afternoon-tea. The only light was that from the blazing logs, and a small shaded lamp on the table at which Madge Dunbar was presiding.

Beryl was sitting close by her friend, ostensibly assisting her ; that is to say, she handed the cups to Ivor Grant, who again dispensed them either to the fair claimants, or their respective cavaliers.

A pleasant buzz of conversation and laughter mingled with the tinkle of the china. A discussion was going on with respect to some tableaux vivants to be performed that evening.

Beryl had refused to take part in them, despite all persuasion, but Ivor Grant was to be Lord Leicester to the Amy Robsart of Madge Dunbar.

She was jesting with him as to his looking the character, for as yet none of the costumes had been tried on at rehearsals.

"You mustn't look as sad as you did last night, my lord," she said laughingly as he bent down for the cup of tea she had filled for him. "Our scene is Leicester in the halcyon days of love and happiness."

"I will remember that," said Ivor in the same light tone. "I thought the shadow of good Queen Bess was hovering in the distance."

"I think she must have been a horrid woman," said Madge vindictively. "I dislike her very much—her vanities, her spite, her odious jealousy, her relentlessness, and her mania for dress."

"That is her most feminine characteristic," laughed Ivor. "You oughtn't to dislike that."

"I do, though. I always think of those fearful and wonderful be-ruffled gowns hanging on pegs in her wardrobes like dreary ghosts of herself. I wonder sometimes what they did with them all."

"I suppose the ladies-in-waiting had them," said Beryl. "I really forget if history chronicles the fact."

"What a fact to chronicle—the fate of a woman's gowns!" said Ivor Grant.

He was leaning negligently against a massive pillar of black marble that supported an antique bronze, and as he spoke both women looked up at him.

In an instant something flashed lightning-like through Madge Dunbar's mind.

His face, his attitude, brought back the clue to Beryl's laughing sobriquet, given so long ago at their first meeting.

"Ah," she said quickly, "I remember now."

"Remember what—the fate of the gowns?" asked Ivor, looking down at her from his tall height.

"No," and she laughed merrily; "nothing about the gowns; something concerning yourself, my lord. Really," and a mischievous light stole into her eyes, "it suited you very well."

"What suited me?" asked Ivor, somewhat mystified.

"A name I once heard applied to you," continued Madge with a glance at Beryl Marsden, who suddenly coloured hotly, and looked entreatingly at her.

"Tell me it, please," pleaded Ivor, noting the exchange of looks. "I should like to hear it."

"No doubt," said Madge demurely, "but I can't obtain Mrs. Marsden's permission to repeat it, so you must stifle your curiosity as best you can."

"I call that very cruel," said Ivor in an injured voice. "It is not the first time I have heard of that sobriquet, though I can't ascertain its nature. Don't be afraid of hurting my feelings, Mrs. Dunbar—I have none; or my vanity, for it was chaffed out of me long ago. I know it's no use to appeal to Mrs. Marsden, but you—you ought to be merciful!"

But Madge only shook her pretty head.

"I can't be a traitor," she said; "Beryl would never forgive me. I am sorry I mentioned the subject, only you looked so exactly like it."

"Like it! Like what?" cried Ivor imploringly. "Do you know you are putting me to the most refined torture?"

"I thought men were never curious," said Beryl gravely. Her beautiful face had regained its old composure.

"Oh yes, they are in matters concerning themselves," said Ivor quickly. "Now you might just as well confess, Mrs. Marsden, for I am determined to find out."

"It would be a pity to deprive you of some occupation," said Beryl with a faint flush. "I feel inclined to set you at defiance, and say, 'Do it if you can.'"

"You did that long ago," he said with a sudden grave look that made her tremble. "I have not tried yet to discover what you defied me to learn, but I have not forgotten."

"There are only two people in the secret," interposed Madge Dunbar merrily. "One daren't tell if she would, and the other wouldn't if she dared. Now which is the easier to deal with?"

"That sounds like a conundrum," said Ivor. "Perhaps I'll deal with you, as the man with the bundle of sticks. Taken together you are too much for me; separately—well, I might have a chance."

"Madge will not betray me," said Beryl with a glance at her friend's laughing face; "I am sure of that."

"No," said Madge saucily, "she won't. But don't you betray yourself, my dear."

Beryl had finished her tea, and now moved slowly away down the length of the great hall, her dusky draperies of olive velvet sweeping over the deep-coloured rugs that covered the oak floor, and catching rich lights from the burning logs that filled the great fireplace.

For a moment Ivor watched her in silence, then put down his cup and followed. Madge Dunbar's eyes had taken in both the hesitation which held him back and the counter force of attraction which bade him follow. She sighed involuntarily.

"What a noble pair they would have made, only I hope——"

What she hoped was cut short by her husband's voice. He had just entered, and came up to the tea-table.

"Madge, my dear, give me a cup. I am half frozen. By the way, I've got some news for you. Can you make room for another guest?"

"A dozen more," laughed his wife. "But who is it—man or woman?"

"Man. You know Guy Brookes is coming by the six o'clock express to-night? I've had a telegram to-day saying a friend of his from abroad has turned up unexpectedly; he must defer his visit a week or bring him down. Now we can't do without Guy, you know, he's such a capital fellow, so I just wired back to bring the friend too. You do not mind?"

"Not I," said his wife pleasantly; "the more the merrier. He must be a very wet blanket indeed to spoil our party."

Meanwhile, Ivor Grant had overtaken Beryl.

"You are not going to dress yet?" he said as he reached her side.

"Oh no; I am only going to the conservatory to get some flowers."

"May I come with you?"

"Of course, if you wish," she answered in a somewhat constrained voice.

They walked on together. Of late they had grown very silent. Words no longer came to their lips with the frank, easy grace of old, though, perhaps, even words were less dangerous than those long thoughtful pauses which held them embarrassed, and yet painfully conscious of the sweetness that each presence brought the other.

The conservatory had been a modern addition to the house. It opened out of a small drawing-room, and was unusually large, and furnished with a marvellous display of rare and tropical plants.

"White, as usual, I suppose?" said Ivor, standing before a magnificent azalea, whose snowy blossoms seemed to attract Beryl's glance.

"You never wear any flowers but white."

"I don't like gay colours," she answered gravely, "and Jack always used to bring me white flowers."

"Almost all you wear or do seems associated with him," said Ivor. "You have a very faithful memory where you love."

"Yes," she said, her face growing very pale and her eyes looking troubled. "You would not have me forget them, would you?" she added suddenly.

"God forbid," said Ivor with haste, "so long as the memory does not hurt you."

"Not as it did. I suppose grief, like joy, must die of its own intensity." She shuddered and half turned away. "I thought I should have died—once."

"I know," he answered, his voice sinking to those soothing tones he invariably used when alluding to that painful subject. "But even sorrow does not kill. Come, do not think of it now," he added earnestly. "Let me get some flowers for you; you have never yet allowed me to do so."

"Men have no taste," she said with a faint smile, "but I will see what you would select—if I gave you permission."

They sauntered on. From the hall beyond came a sound of opening and closing doors, of loud footsteps, and voices, and laughter.

"More new arrivals," said Ivor Grant. "I suppose that's Brookes; he was expected to-night."

"You know him?" questioned Beryl.

"He was in my old regiment. An awfully good fellow."

"That most inapplicable word to apply to a 'good fellow,'" she said, smiling. "Why awfully?"

"Oh, habit, I suppose, or bad example. One always hears it."

"Our beautifully irregular language is mostly made up of words one 'always hears, though we know they're wrong,'" commented Beryl. "Don't you think," she went on somewhat abruptly, "that your mother will be very lonely up at the Court, spending Christmas by herself? I think you ought to have gone to her."

For a moment he was silent. He had paused before a plant of white heath, and was cutting a spray of it with the scissors he had taken from her hand.

"I had a reason for not going," he said, his voice very low and stern.

"Was it a sufficiently good reason to allow of your paining her?"

"I thought it so," he answered, mechanically arranging the beautiful waxen blossoms with some loose, green, feathery grass.

"But she did not. Her letters tell me that."

"She does not know," he said sternly. "If she did she would have been the first to counsel me to keep my resolution. There are dangers from which a brave man flees, and at which a coward laughs."

"What danger is there at the Court?" asked Beryl, looking at him in surprise.

"None now," he said with a little mirthless laugh. "I fled it, and it pursued me."

"It is not—not Count Savona?" asked Beryl, unfeignedly surprised at any appearance of mystery in one usually so frank and open-hearted as Ivor Grant.

The flowers were nearly arranged now. He was mingling some sprigs of maidenhair-fern with the delicate heath and soft, feathery grass. He handed them to her, as she turned her anxious eyes to his in that involuntary question, and something in his gaze—in its pain, its passion, its sudden lifting of the veil that had so long hidden his heart's madness—smote her with a sense of terror and of shame.

"No," he said low and bitterly, "not—Count Savona. Will you have these flowers?"

She took them without a word. She was trembling greatly. They walked on again, scarce heeding where they went. The warm air was full of drowsy intoxication—the breath of the flowers seemed sweet and subtle as the breath of that struggling passion surging in their hearts and rushing to their lips. They could hear nothing, see nothing, think of nothing. The whole world in that moment seemed only—each other.

The situation was perilous, pathetic, infinitely tragic. Ten minutes before and neither had dreamt of the change a look would make—still less dreamt of taxing human weakness to the very verge of human endurance.

Silence was around them—silence in the air and the flowers, and on their sealed and trembling lips—a silence that seemed to turn all the realities of life into dreams, and leave only the tumultuous, intoxicating prescience of a joy they dared not fathom.

The moments passed. Ivor Grant was but a man—a man who had judged of temptations, laughed at them, perchance, but never faced one so fiery and so perilous as this. Resolves, control, reason, all went down like withes in the grasp of a fire. Something mighty as a giant wrestled in his heart and tore its way upwards through a thousand emotions and a whirlwind of feeling.

"Listen," he said. "I would not go to the Court because I wished to avoid you—because the friendship I promised was only an empty name. I—I could not act the lie any longer. I knew you would see the change—would wonder—would, perhaps, question me, and so, not to meet you, I fled. The rest you know."

Still she did not speak. The blood ebbed back to her face, and great tears burned behind her drooped and sorrowful eyes, but of all the words flaming and surging in her heart she could frame not one.

"I have angered—offended you. You will hate me now!" cried Ivor bitterly.

"Hate you!" Only a stifled murmur, a quick glance, then the flowers dropped on to the marble floor, her hands went up to cover her face, and she sank down on a seat sobbing as if her heart would break.

"You were the only friend I had," she cried between those stifled sobs. "Oh, why—why did you tell me this?"

"Because I could not help it," he said hoarsely. "I have kept it in long enough, God knows! It is beyond my strength any longer. You would pity me if you knew how I have suffered. Your heart is buried with your children, but mine, I—I think I gave you mine the first hour we met. It has been yours ever since."

Her sobs ceased. She lifted her head and looked at him.

"Is that true? And all these years— And the woman you told me of—the woman you loved, and said was—dead?"

"Was yourself, Beryl."

CHAPTER III. "IT MIGHT HAVE BEEN."

A LONG sorrowful pause followed those last words. In Beryl Marsden's heart still throbbed the gladness and bitterness, the wonder and the shock, of that long-guarded revelation.

He had loved her all these years; loved her, served her, thought for her as no man on earth had ever done, never betraying himself, never dishonouring that true and steadfast friendship which had been so sweet and sure a thing to her!

And now it was all over. The self-deception had been swept away in a moment. Never would they stand again and give to each other frank gaze and firm hand-clasp. The whole pitiful fabric they had raised was shattered at their feet. No wonder they could find no words, no wonder they dared not break the silence that seemed to hold their very lives in its brief, charmed pause, yet with each ebbing moment bore slowly and surely away the frail bark of vanishing happiness, and the self-delusive sophistries which had so long hidden the shoals and rocks of a cruel fate.

Ivor Grant broke the silence at last, bending down and touching with gentle hands the white clasped fingers through which slow tears still found their way.

"Do not cry any more," he said gently. "You have shed so many tears of late, and it hurts me to see you."

She dashed them away then with resolute effort.

"I am very foolish," she said unsteadily. "I—I am so sorry I ever came here. If I had known—"

"It would have made no difference," he said quietly. "Sooner or later I should have betrayed myself. A man can't play at indifference always, when his heart is aching with love."

"Is it right—is it fair to speak to me thus?" she said, paling to the hue of the lilies by her side.

"No, it is not," he said with quick contrition. "I never meant to do it; but it is so hard to keep words back. I would not insult you, pain you, for worlds," he added rapidly. "Don't judge me hardly, and—don't look at me like that," as the beautiful eyes met his in their sorrowful pain. "You make me feel a brute—a coward. Of course I know you can be nothing to me. I have known it always—always. But that has not helped me or cured me either, and now it has grown too much for my strength. I can't meet you, see you, be with you, day after day like this, so I must—leave you; there is nothing else to be done."

"No," she echoed drearily; "nothing else."

"I should like to ask you one thing," he said, growing very white. "You won't misjudge me, for even friendship gives me that right—the right to know if you are happy."

"Does it need asking?" said Beryl coldly. "Do happy women lead solitary lives like mine?"

"But your husband—he—he is good to you? Did you not love him when you married?"

"Oh, do not ask," she cried, a hot shamed flush creeping over cheek and brow. "I thought so; I thought my life would be safe and peaceful. I looked no deeper into my own heart, or his."

"And now?"

"Now things speak for themselves fairly well, I think," she answered bitterly; "not that I have any right to complain, or you any right to question. I was happy enough till—till they were taken from me."

"I know," he said hurriedly, "and think what your sorrow was to me who longed yet dared not offer consolation. Then all this long, lonely time has followed. To think of the miserable, aching, dreary hours I have spent. No, don't speak—I don't reproach you. There is nothing for which you are to blame except for filling my life to its very brim, until all other women pale as shadows before your memory. If you had been happy—beloved, loving—I would have been content I think, but I knew you were none of these, and the knowledge added and added to my love until the secret passed all power of will to keep it back. I know you are sorry," he continued, as he saw the tremor of the quivering lips, "but don't tell me so, don't pity me. Say I am a brute, a coward if you will; your scorn is easier to bear than your compassion."

"How could I scorn you?" she asked passionately. "As I look back upon these years—as I see you so kindly, so thoughtful, so linked in a thousand memories with my life's joys, and griefs, and loss—as I see, too, my own blindness and selfishness exacting from you so much, and recking naught of any pain they gave, I should be made of stone to scorn you for a weakness that is as noble as yourself."

"Your kindness tries me too hard," he said brokenly. "I am not a good man, nor strong enough to combat any longer with the fate that has thrown us together. You can't fancy what it is to love as I have loved you—always hopelessly—yet always faithfully, though knowing, almost from the first, that as I held your hands in mine, no miles of sea or land could separate us more utterly than we were separated. Yet still amidst it all if I had only felt you were happy I could have better borne the loneliness of my own life, but even that poor consolation was denied me. Oh," he cried bitterly, "what a poor, pitiful thing life is at best! Though one would give one's heart's blood for the welfare or happiness of another, one can but stand by helplessly watching the pain that nearly breaks one's own heart too."

She rose from her seat; her face looked like marble; her trembling hands went out to him in one piteous appeal of a woman's weakness to a man's.

"Don't say more. I can't bear it. So long you have been my friend—the tenderest, truest friend that ever woman had, and now—now I must lose you as I have lost everything else. It does seem a little—hard."

Her grief unmanned him. He caught the trembling hands and held them to his beating heart, and an agony of tenderness and self-reproach came into his eyes as they met the tear-drowned gaze of hers.

"You shall not lose me if it pains you. I will still be your friend."

She only looked at him.

"After to-night?" she said slowly.

He dropped her hands. The blood rushed to his very brow.

"You are right. I can't expect you to trust me since I can no longer trust myself, so I must leave you."

"Not yet—not now," she cried with a terror that brooked no concealment. "You could not leave like this."

"The sooner the better," he said huskily; "all has been said; it only remains to part for—both—our sakes."

The dressing-bell had rung long before, for dinner was to be an hour earlier on account of the tableaux, but neither of them had heard it. Beryl stood like one turned to stone.

"You must do as you think best," she said, speaking with slow and painful effort. "I—I leave it all to you."

"Then it is better I go. Sooner or later I knew one of two things must happen. Your lips would speak my banishment, or my pardon."

"But I do forgive you," she said quietly. "Do not think so hardly of me; only—only—"

"Only all the same our lives are severed," he said. "God bless you! Perhaps He will make you happy yet. As for me—"

"Don't," she cried piteously; "don't say I have brought trouble upon your life. I can't bear to think it—oh, I can't bear to think it!"

The tears broke forth again, but with one mad impulse he snatched her to his breast, and bade her weep them there.

"Think it is joy you have brought me," he whispered as his lips touched the dusky crown of her hair where it rested on his heart in grief's passionate abandonment, "the sweetest joy I have ever known, though for sake of it I must leave you at last."

"I—I have heard of love so often," she said brokenly. "But now it seems to me I never understood what it meant, until—until—"

The broken pause needed no words, for he stooped and lifted her face, and at last read its meaning.

"So you too share my sorrow, and my—joy," he whispered in a strange, stifled voice. "And yet—and yet you bid me go."

"I must," she cried desperately. "What else is there for us to do but part? Since we have sinned, we must also suffer."

"I wish the suffering were only mine," he said passionately; "you have had so much already, and I, who would so gladly lift your burden, can only add to it."

"Let me go now," said Beryl, lifting her face in its shy and sudden shame, and striving to unclasp the strong and trembling hands that made so sweet a prison. "I must be mad—what am I thinking of?"

There came a sudden, stealthy step on the marble floor, and as they started apart, pale as with conscious guilt, a face looked at them through the screen of plants, and boughs, and flowering shrubs beyond.

"That blackguard here!" muttered Ivor Grant with uneomplimentary fervour.

"Count Savona!" cried Beryl, growing white as death.

"At your service, madame," said the suave, silky voice of the Italian. "Is it permitted to observe that the dinner-hour is close at hand, and the ladies are coming down en toilette? Madame's maid is enquiring everywhere for her."

Beryl bowed hastily, and rushed off. The count watched her with that smile Ivor knew and hated.

"Madame is as charming as ever. Is she still a—grass-widow?" he said.

Ivor Grant turned on his heel and walked away.

A Family Feud.

(A STORY IN FIVE WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER I.

FOR at least three centuries the Bradwells had figured as one of the leading families in North Brakeshire. It is true that people who before all things loved a lord, were compelled to turn from Hunstone Manor to the towers of Selworth Castle to offer their homage. But, as every local antiquarian was aware, the title of the Selworth magnate had been bought by very shady political services (some said by hard cash) of Walpole, whilst that of Sir Raymond Bradwell had been won by the gallantry and devotion of his ancestors on distant battlefields. This was a distinction with a difference, and then the peer was an absentee from his county during by far the greater part of every year. He preferred town quarters, or life in a fashionable foreign spa, to the rural quietude of Brakeshire valleys. The Bradwells, on the contrary, were always in residence. The secretary of any local charity knew where to find them when wanted. Sir Raymond was the most active member of the Hunstone bench of magistrates.

An "old" family, in our insular sense of the term, is almost of necessity a proud one, and the Bradwells were by no means deficient in the quality of haughtiness. They had shown it in a marked manner. Pride was at the bottom of a grievous breach in their ranks.

At the present date there were in this same countryside two distinct branches of the race; Sir Raymond Bradwell lording it at the ancestral seat of Hunstone Manor, and Mr. Francis Bradwell farming his own land at Croyle. The two were brothers, sons of the same father and the same mother; and yet they met as strangers—nay, as absolute foes.

The explanation was a very simple one, and a further reproduction of a commonplace story.

The younger son of old Sir Henry had been a great wanderer, and if he had not exactly wasted his substance in riotous living, he had done what in the parent's eyes was even worse and more unpardonable. He had taken to himself a wife without either rank or fortune. Any ordinary youthful follies would have been passed over, but this was an inexpiable crime. A child of the people, a plain farmer's daughter, brought into the charmed circle of Hunstone's gentry as the wife of a Bradwell! It was terrible! The old autocrat at once disowned the culprit, and sternly forbade any member of his family to so much as speak to him.

Sir Henry had long since passed away, but the bar remained. The present head of the family refused to have any dealings with the one who had so miserably tarnished the ancient glories of his house. "To love as well as a Bradwell," had become a local proverb to express a supercilious hate.

It had been a perpetual annoyance to Sir Henry, and after him to Sir Raymond, that the delinquent should have dared to settle and reside in the immediate neighbourhood of Hunstone Manor. Is not a discarded, disinherited relative—especially one set aside for such grave and valid reasons—bound by all the proprieties to hide his diminished head in far-off climes, in America, Australia, anywhere where his name will not provoke remark and emphasise his disgrace? Surely he owes this much by way of amends to his outraged kinsmen. One would think, too, that he himself would be more comfortable suffering for his faults at a discreet distance. But Mr. Francis Bradwell set at naught such reasoning. In his brother's words, he was a "thoroughly abandoned fool!" He added insult to injury by going boldly up and down Brakeshire, wherever his business took him, and smiling sarcastically if anybody reminded him of the sentence of outlawry so ostentatiously proclaimed.

"I'm afraid my people don't exactly understand the signs of the times," he said; "'tis a democratic age, and sooner or later Ray, for all his stiffness, will have to recognise the fact. Poor fellow! it's a hard lesson."

Francis Bradwell would, doubtless, have felt the misery and awkwardness of his position far more acutely if, in a monetary sense, he had not been placed beyond the reach of either his father's or his brother's anger. In this respect he was fortunate. By the terms of his mother's marriage-settlement a certain provision was his, which no adversary could touch. He was safe against both maledictions and threats. The sum of his inheritance was not large, but it ensured a competence. He invested it in Croyle Farm, and deliberately devoted himself to the career of an agriculturist.

And he promised to succeed from the very first. He possessed sound judgment and an industry for which in his salad days no one had given him credit. He put his shoulder to the wheel and speedily took rank as one of the most thrifty and go-ahead, and withal sensible farmers to be found in the district. He stocked his farm well, bought and sold with much dexterity, cultivated his crops on an approved plan, and was spoken of with admiration and envy at many a market ordinary. He had a good helpmate. Mrs. Francis Bradwell put forward no claims to be considered a lady of fashion, but she knew how to manage a household with prudence and frugality; she had humility enough to have half-admitted the justice of the Manor strictures upon her birth and unpretentious upbringing; she had good temper enough to have wholly forgiven them. And yet she was an autocrat within her own domain, and insisted with quiet severity upon every man-servant and every maid-servant fulfilling his and her duty. The rebellion of sloth or indifference she crushed without compunction. Sitting in the seat of authority she intended to rule, and carried out her will.

The flourishing state of the Croyle Farm hugely vexed the Hunstone baronet. Since his father's death he had suffered several heavy losses through a taste which had grown upon him for stock and share gambling. If matters went on at this rate, in a few years' time the balance of riches would have shifted across the valley. He took his brother's hardly-earned prosperity as an additional affront to himself, and put it all down in that long account of enmity which he vaguely hoped to be able one day to settle. On the rare occasions on which they met, Sir Raymond's scowl at the offender grew blacker and more ominous than even of yore, and to one or two of his principal associates at the covert-side and elsewhere, he spoke of "Mr. Francis Bradwell" in terms of concentrated bitterness which almost scandalised the listeners, familiar as they were with the facts of the situation. In some roundabout way one of these unguarded expressions of wrath reached the ears of the kindly old vicar, and he thought it his duty to remonstrate and attempt a reconciliation.

"It is of no use, sir, not the slightest in the world," Sir Raymond thundered out; "if it were not for the respect I am bound, I suppose, to show to your cloth, I should say so in stronger language. Such a wrong as he—Francis Bradwell—has done to my name and lineage is not easily wiped out and forgotten. You must prate of forgiveness to servant-girls and choir-boys, not to me, so far as Francis Bradwell is concerned." The well-intentioned effort was altogether a failure.

In appearance the brothers were unusually dissimilar. But that all the neighbourhood knew the truth, they might readily have been taken for total strangers, or for, at most, very distant kinsmen. The baronet was of medium height, thin and wiry, with dark oval features, and hair which at five-and-forty was as crisp and black as when he had made the grand tour with his Oxford tutor, a quarter of a century earlier. Mr. Francis Bradwell might have sat, not inaptly, for a portrait of the typical better-class British agriculturist. He was tall and well-built, and since his life on the Croyle homestead had commenced, he had added considerably to his weight. With portly form, and smiling, rubicund face, he formed a striking contrast to Sir Raymond, and in some scarcely definable sense seemed to form a fitting foil for that gentleman's caustic satire.

Although the elder brother had married—in due accordance with the claims of his station—several years before the younger's elopement with Ruth Rayne, the families at both Hunstone Manor and Croyle Farm were very small. The farmer and his wife had lost two daughters, and had a third living, a merry schoolgirl of ten summers.

The baronet had a daughter lately married, with great state, to a rising London physician, and one son, a pleasant-mannered young fellow of two-and-twenty. Sir Raymond Bradwell had now for several years been a widower. It was after his wife's death that he had begun to dabble most dangerously in the game of chance associated with the cabalistic quotations of the money market.

What an amazing bundle of incongruities and of apparent contradictions in this complex human nature! How wonderful is the magnetism exercised by certain follies and vices over those who for a single ill-omened hour become their dupes! Man's will is free, and yet lies dormant. He could escape at any moment if he would only arise and shake himself. But, alas! this is the very thing that he fails to do. It may be the foaming tankard, incautiously tampered with beyond a certain limit, and becoming henceforth an engine of the most wretched self-destruction. It may be the tables of Monte Carlo, patronised as a harmless tourist escapade at first, and by-and-by sweeping the luckless idler into the vortex of mad ruin. It may be the broker's circular from dingy London lanes that, incautiously relied upon, works disaster. In each and every case there is the same yielding to the delusive promises of hope, the same deafness to the warnings of experience, the same abandonment to the decrees of a kind or an unkind fate.

It was thus with the master of Hunstone Manor. He speculated and won, caught the terrible gambling fever, and speculated and lost—gained—lost afresh. At last, circumstances had enforced a certain measure of caution upon him. He had recklessly involved the estate, which should one day descend to his son, and to meet heavy claims he had to scrape together and to save every available shilling. For the time being he was a miser. And scarce a mile from his own threshold—across which the shadow of evil was so palpably falling—sat his disowned brother, daily growing richer. When he thought of it a dark line crossed his brow, and his fingers clenched themselves.

In his speculations Sir Raymond Bradwell had one confidant. At a Brighton hotel he had made the acquaintance of Captain Middleford, a gallant officer whose name had figured prominently on the front page of half-a-score of imposing prospectuses. He was impressed by the captain's bonhomie—by the air of easy dignity the captain assumed, and by the glibness with which he talked of millions. He invited his new friend down to Hunstone Manor, and in a very little while had given himself up like a sheep to the shearer.

But Captain Middleford was a wary and clever strategist, and knew better than to play his cards too openly. He had worked with many tools, and behind a mask. He had so contrived matters, that every loss Sir Raymond Bradwell imputed to his own short-sightedness, and every gain to his friend's perspicacity. In this manner, slowly but surely, he had obtained a firm grip upon both the Hunstone estate and its deluded proprietor, and as yet he was unsuspected.

CHAPTER II.

It was a soft spring evening, vocal, no doubt, in country lanes with melody of birds, and rustle of newly-opened leaves, and the faint drowsy hum of the thousand living things that hasten forward under sunny skies to welcome Queen Summer, and to swell the triumphal pageant of her train. But in London it was different. There mammon and fashion are the twin deities. The smiling calm of Nature only emphasised the madness of the universal race for fame and wealth, and served to bring tantalising visions to the throbbing brains of oppressed toilers. The slaves of counter and bar envied the very cabmen and omnibus-servants, for they, at least, felt the balmy south wind blow, and now and again feasted their eyes on the emerald of the parks.

Harry Bradwell had been busy all day with his books and his papers; he was a law-student by his father's strong desire, and had grown weary of the prolonged confinement. His rooms were pleasantly situated, it was true, and moreover had been furnished with abundance of luxury. But the young man pined, not unnaturally, for the freedom of outdoor life and habits. He had submitted to his parent's will with a fair grace, and was doing his best to ground himself in the dry-as-dust elements of scientific hair-splitting. But like the undertaking he did not, and in his own case he could hardly see its utility. He had even ventured a mild protest to Sir Raymond.

"I suppose I—I shall succeed—some day—a long while first, I hope—to the title and to the old place, and will law be of much use to me then, sir?"

"Decidedly it will; I only wish I had its intricacies at my fingers'-ends at the present moment," replied the baronet; "'twould be many a pound in my pocket, and many a load off my mind. Besides, study is work, and for young fellows like you work is the best thing going. You may enter the Church if you please, but an idle life I shall never consent to."

"And I do not wish it, sir; I accept your choice."

Accordingly Harry Bradwell had come to Eton Row. In figure and in feature Harry took largely after his father. He too was slim, and of little beyond the average height. He too was somewhat sallow of countenance, with curly jet-black hair, lofty, well proportioned brow, and dark penetrating eyes. He possessed in addition a cheery grace of deportment, which won him admiration in very varied society. It was already evident that the fairer sex would honour him with that distinct partiality which makes other would-be cavaliers of dames sneer enviously at "ladies' men."

But if Harry resembled Sir Raymond in looks, he differed very widely from him in mental idiosyncrasy and cast of character. It was hard to reconcile the views he took of things with the lineage from whence he had sprung. In an ancient and reputable Tory family, here was an impulsive young Revolutionist. Harry had a strong private conviction that the gods of birth and position which his ancestors had worshipped were doomed Dragons, worthy only of scorn and hostility.

Even with respect to the family feud he was by no means trustworthy. In his uncle's marriage, and present station as a farmer, he saw no grounds for his father's bitter hatred. Although he honoured Sir Raymond's commands so far as to hold no communication with the detested relatives, he failed to sympathise with the stern and vengeful feeling of pride. He shrugged his shoulders many a time in secret at his father's harsh speeches and loudly-declared contempt. His own creed was in unison with the spirit of Robbie Burns's famous song. He believed that, in spite of adventurous circumstances, "A man's a man for a' that." If Harry Bradwell could have healed the breach between the two brothers he would have done so.

The rays of the declining sun mounted higher on the narrow window-panes. The young man could stand his durance no longer.

"I'll go and have a couple of hours' stroll, anyhow," he soliloquised. "After that, perhaps I'll be in a mood for reading a dozen more pages."

He took his hat and walking-cane, and was soon out of Eton Row—journeying to meet Fate.

It was getting towards the height of the London season, and everywhere the streets were thronged by vehicles and pedestrians hurrying on varied errands of business or of pleasure—at this hour of the evening largely of the latter. Harry picked his way westward, and, wherever chance offered, selected on his route the less crowded thoroughfares. He was not specially enamoured of noise and bustle—few country-reared men or women are. He was crossing the comparative solitude of a quiet and semi-retired square when shouts arose. A butcher's cart was rattling down a side-street at a terrific pace, the horse having evidently become unmanageable.

To Harry Bradwell there was no appreciable danger; he was young, and could easily spring out of the way, if the animal declined to pause in its mad career. But to others the peril was not more sudden than real. A feeble and elderly lady was tottering across the road as best she could, leaning heavily on a girl's arm. The pair were menaced by injury to limb, if not to life. There was not a moment to lose, and the girl put forth all her strength to drag her companion to a point of safety. But fear seemed to have palsied the uncertain steps of the elder, and she halted in the very centre of the roadway. Harry noted the awful risk of the situation, and rushed to the rescue. With a mighty effort, and just in the nick of time, he succeeded in gaining the pavement with the old lady in his arms, and then he began to apologise for any roughness he might have shown.

"It was not an occasion to stand on ceremony," he said.

"Certainly not. We are very greatly your debtors—both of us," answered the girl warmly, and her eyes conveyed even more fervent thanks than her words.

The elder lady was too agitated to find ready speech for her gratitude, but she inclined her head and murmured "Yes, yes!" by way of corroboration of her companion's utterance.

"You are very welcome to any slight service I may have been able to render; I am glad to have been of use in the world for once," said Harry with a smile.

Unconsciously his glance rested with admiration on the maiden's flushed face. Gradually the idea was occurring to him that he had seldom or never before seen a countenance so sweet and lovely. Tried by the canons of a strict taste, and with the remembrance of accepted classical models, the girl's features were perhaps not exactly to be termed beautiful, and yet there was a potent charm about them. In their very irregularities they were piquant and winsome, and their expression was one which insensibly bespoke sympathy and trust. There are faces which strike the most callous observer as being the mirrors of pure and loving souls, and to this order belonged that of Harry Bradwell's new acquaintance.

In form the maiden was slight and sylph-like, with, surely, the very poetry of motion revealing itself in her simplest gesture. She had an exquisitely clear complexion, eyes of dreamy hazel, which just now were flashing like twin jewels in their excitement and thankfulness, and a wealth of rippling auburn hair that deepened into gold in the shadows of her dainty hat and tossing ribbons. In age she was probably not more than twenty, if as much.

The contrast between herself and the lady she was supporting was one between May and November.

A sudden impulse came to Harry as in the moment's pause he noted these things.

"As it is, I am afraid that you have both suffered a considerable shock," he said. "Unfortunately no one could have been in time to prevent that. If you have far to go, will you permit me to call a cab?"

"Oh, I think aunt and I will be able to manage, thank you. Our home is just in the next street—No. 90, Frome Road. You can walk, can you not, aunt?"

"I will try, Agnes," the old lady answered feebly.

"At any rate, you will not object to my escort for that distance?" Harry said again.

"You are very good," the girl replied simply.

Frome Road was a quiet, retiring thoroughfare, with its prim, stuccoed houses all of a pattern, and apparently requiring the assistance of their faded bronze numerals for mutual identification as well as for the assistance of the postman and stray callers.

No. 90, in Harry Bradwell's opinion, was reached all too quickly. By the way, an informal introduction had taken place, and Harry was now in a position to give point and shape to his conversation by the employment of the ladies' names. He could address the aunt as Mrs. Holby and the niece as Miss Fenton.

The syllables of "Fenton—Agnes Fenton" he took an absurd delight in mentally reiterating at least a dozen times. It was wasted trouble, for with a single flash they had been already stereotyped upon his memory.

"By your leave I will venture to call to-morrow and enquire concerning the consequences of your alarm, Mrs. Holby; I sincerely trust they will not be serious," he said, as the trio halted at the designated door. And again his gaze fell with a scarcely designed persistence on Agnes, and displayed a homage which he was powerless to conceal.

This time the carmine tide which mounted swiftly to the girl's temples was not simply the reaction from past terror. There was maidenly self-consciousness in it. She left her aunt to answer.

"Do not trouble in the least, Mr.—Mr. Bradwell," the lady replied. "I am quite uninjured, owing to your gallantry——"

Harry shook his head with a gentle deprecation of the renewed tribute.

"Anyone would have done the same," he interrupted.

"And I shall be quite well, I hope, after an hour or two's rest."

"I hope so too. But I shall wish to know, and so Miss Fenton and yourself must please endure a call."

"You will, of course, be welcome, Mr. Bradwell," answered Mrs. Holby with old-fashioned politeness.

CHAPTER III.

HARRY called at No. 90, Frome Road, not once but many times. The acquaintanceship so strangely commenced proved an exceedingly agreeable one to both the young man and the maiden. It rapidly ripened into friendship, and before either was quite aware of it, had developed into love of the most enduring kind.

Mrs. Holby, it seemed, was Agnes Fenton's great-aunt, and had adopted the girl in very early years. Agnes was an orphan, never having known one parent, and having but vague recollections of the other. Personally she was penniless, and it was not probable that Mrs. Holby would be able to make her a very great heiress.

The relict of the deceased engineer had an income amply sufficient for her own wants, but not susceptible of much diversion into other channels, and such as it was it ceased at her death. The knowledge of this fact made Mrs. Holby the more ready to encourage a possible suitor for her niece, especially when that suitor had so many claims to be considered a man of influence and wealth. It is not every damsel of Agnes's birth and station who wins the heart of the heir to a title.

The matchmaking instinct, which is always more or less pronounced in a woman's breast, whether she be young or old, rich or poor, gentle or simple, aroused itself, and Mrs. Holby was straining every nerve to bring about her niece's triumph. There was one great difficulty in the way, and one great fear which oppressed her. There was a secret which, if it should be revealed before irrevocable words were uttered, might mar everything. Would Agnes listen to reason, and consent to keep it? Once actually betrothed, Mrs. Holby believed that Harry Bradwell was too honourable to retreat, however awkward the dilemma in which his decision might place him.

Merrily the young man drifted with the stream. His leisure hours were spent far more frequently with Agnes Fenton than in the company of his sister and Dr. Marshbury, and at last he awoke fully and distinctly to the conviction that he was a prisoner in love's net, that Agnes Fenton held his happiness in her keeping.

It must always be a crisis in a man's history when he can no longer blind himself to the truth that his dearest hopes and aspirations are at a woman's mercy, when for the first time he comes to understand that a "Yes" or "No," which a maiden's lips may lightly utter, and a maiden's mind as lightly forget, must inevitably shape and colour his entire future. He stands at the parting of the ways, and joy or misery, hope or despair, are in another's giving. It was thus with Harry Bradwell.

And the problem was undeniably a complicated one. If, in a sense, Harry was his own master, being of age, and working steadily towards a position in which he might reasonably hope to earn his own bread, it was yet impossible to leave his father out of his review of the situation. He was compelled to enter on a dreary series of calculations as to what Sir Raymond would think, and say, and do. Harry knew very little of Agnes Fenton's antecedents. He had hitherto been content to bask in the sunlight of her presence without pressing home enquiries which might have proved inconvenient. He believed that she was a lady, there was a native refinement about her every word and act which forbade him to think otherwise. But he understood also that she was poor. Mrs. Holby had been frank enough to make that plain.

The widow had a knack of reading character, and with shrewd penetration judged that this fact would be no barrier to the realisation of her hopes. She guessed that the candid acknowledgment might even arouse sympathy, and such had actually been the case. To the attainment of Sir Raymond's consent to a marriage, the girl's poverty would, however, inevitably prove an obstacle, and Harry grew grave as he faced the possibility of an open rupture between his father and himself. There had been one unpalatable, unforgiven marriage in the family before. Was he, Harry, destined to contract a second?

Long and seriously did the young man meditate, but whatever the dangers ahead, the current of his affection had set too strongly to be easily stemmed. If conflict with his father's will should follow, he could not help it. His heart had made its choice, and, he was convinced, had made it worthily. What were houses or lands, or even the parental favour, in comparison with the treasure of a true girl's love? He would put his fate to the test.

The opportunity soon came. It was a warm sunny afternoon, and Harry had been daring enough to suggest a stroll in the open air.

"I want very particularly to have a quiet chat," he whispered. "Will you not oblige me with your confidence, Miss Fenton?"

Agnes coloured, and her foolish little heart insisted on fluttering to and fro like a bird in its cage. Yet mischief gleamed in her eyes as she replied demurely:

"I will listen, certainly, Mr. Bradwell; but if you wish to be so very quiet, would not our present apartment be preferable to the street, or even to the square yonder?" In a lower tone: "You may trust aunt, you know."

"I am sure I may. But still, Miss Fenton, I must, please, be firm to my first proposition. You will not refuse my petition?"

The sharp accent of doubt and fear which a keen and sympathetic ear could detect in the latter appeal touched the girl. She made no further demur.

"Very well, Mr. Bradwell—for an hour," she said.

Dressing in her own chamber, it was astonishing how nervous she was. Her fingers trembled so much that neither hat, nor gloves, nor light fleecy wrap could easily be adjusted. Her toilet occupied three times its usual number of minutes. A presentiment of the ordeal she was about to face had seized her. She was happy, fearful, hesitant, and annoyed with her own agitation at one and the same moment. At last she was ready, and descended into the drawing-room.

The conversation was most decorously commonplace until the open gate of the retired square was reached. Entering this, the subject which lay nearest Harry's heart was approached also.

"I fancy, somehow, that you have divined my purpose, Miss Fenton—Agnes," he began abruptly. "I wanted to tell you how much sunshine you have brought into my life, to thank you for it, and to ask—something else."

Very inconsequently and very inappropriately, as it seemed, Agnes interrupted him.

"Do you know that it almost seems, Mr. Bradwell, as if you and I were related," she murmured in strange, quivering, husky accents. "Has aunt never told you? Mrs. Francis Bradwell, of Croyle Farm, close to Hunstone, was my mother's sister. She is even nearer to me than Mrs. Holby, and I suppose she is your aunt also. But there has been a quarrel, has there not?"

If the green and brown vista opening so pleasantly between the dust-sprinkled trees had suddenly disclosed a veritable lion in the path, or if progress had been abruptly stayed by the grim outline of a barricade, Harry Bradwell could not have evinced greater dismay. His bewilderment and discomfiture for some seconds took away his breath. Slowly he recovered from the shock, and slowly he arrived at a comprehension of the full import of Agnes's statement. The girl he was wooing and had intended to win for his wife was closely connected, then, with that branch of his family against which his father's anger was so fierce and implacable. Poverty Sir Raymond might possibly—by prodigious effort—have been brought to overlook, but a relationship to Mrs. Francis Bradwell was unpardonable, and would infallibly place Agnes Fenton without the bounds of his charity. If Harry persevered with his suit he would have to reckon with his father's most determined hostility.

It was a trying time for the young man's more generous and enlightened principles. It was true that Sir Raymond could no more disinherit him than rob him of the succession to the title. The Hunstone Manor estate was strictly entailed. But many difficulties would have to be surmounted, and a long and arduous struggle loomed ahead if Harry remained firm to his first resolution, and declined to perpetuate the family quarrel. He wondered vaguely how it was that he had never heard of this awkward kinship before. He did not guess that it was the one fact which Mrs. Holby had most earnestly beought Agnes to keep in the background, and that it was in direct disobedience to her aunt's counsel and commands that the girl had now revealed it. Yet it was so. Agnes had recoiled from the idea of allowing her lover to walk blindfold into a maze of possible troubles and anxieties. He should know the whole truth. If then he cared sufficiently for her regard to resume his plea, she would not again interrupt him. Whatever the future might in that case bring forth, he would at least be unable to reproach her.

There was a long, harassing interval. Harry's brain was in a whirl, and he needed time to weigh these new and momentous considerations in the balances of his judgment against the vehement claims of passion. There was still an avenue of escape available, if he listened to the voice of prudence.

But at length he spoke, and there was neither cowardice nor hesitation in his tone.

"A dispute? Yes, there has been a dispute, of very ancient standing, and I have always been sorry for it," he said. "I have certainly no ill-will against my relatives at Croyle Farm. The information is a surprise to me, I must admit. But, Agnes, it can make no difference to my heart's need of your love. Can you give me that, and so make the sunshine still brighter and more lasting? Will you some day be my wife, Agnes?"

Tears were in the maiden's eyes, but they were tears of joy at suspense happily ended. Her answer was but a faint monosyllabic murmur, but it sufficed. Love had conquered.

(To be continued.)

Too Loving and Too True.

A HEART all hot with love, a mind aglow
With vivid fancy, and a trust complete,
She poured into her lover's bosom when he came;
And he—just once he breathed her fragrance sweet,
Then sated, turned away.

Like dust beneath his feet he trod her in the way;
And still she let those cruel feet pass on,
To ruin other lives in idle play,
And felt that she was blest thus to be trodden on.

Like some pale hedgerow rose he gathered her,
And twirled her in his fingers for awhile;
Looked on her beauty; and her full reward
Was in the careless sweetness of his smile.

Then, flung aside, a useless thing, she lay
In life's dry dust; and all her petals sweet
Grew brown; but she—she still rejoiced to die,
Where once had fall'n the shadowing of his feet.

Is it the tale of a withered rose that the sobbing night-winds tell?
Nay, but the fate of a little heart that loved too sadly well,
That never drained the cup of joy, her eager lips once tasted!
So often love is languished for! so often love is wasted!

The Little Brown Door.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

A LITTLE brown door—an odd thing to exercise a fascination over anyone, and yet it had fascinated me, and I could not give over watching it as I sat by my window, day after day, bound to my couch by a sprained ankle. A little brown door in the side of a small house, giving into a good-sized garden, bright with flowers and sunshine, pleasant with shady spots under old fruit-trees, or by great lilacs and hawthorns. Such a tempting garden—and yet no one ever walked in it, and the gay blossoms must have withered and died save for the gentle showers that came but rarely. I welcomed a cloud in the blue sky for the sake of the neglected flowers, and I watched to see the little brown door open with an odd curiosity that was almost anxiety.

It struck me that the people who lived in the house—and it was clear by the neatly-curtained windows that it had inhabitants—must be very strange creatures never to come out into the garden. If the sunshine was too strong for them, there was the twilight, or even the night—very pretty it looked when the moon was shining, and if there were only stars in the heavens it would be very soothing to a sad heart to walk in the soft darkness amidst summer fragrance.

I longed to walk in it as I lay looking at it far into the night, being very loth to go to bed, I slept so little; it seemed such a pity that no one should enjoy its beauty and quietness when there were toiling millions needing the refreshment it could afford to their wearied bodies and jaded spirits.

Some weeks previously I had taken a distaste to housekeeping; it had become to me a toil and an abomination, as needing a vigilance and forethought out of all proportion to the result gained, for I am a childless widow. And I am fain to confess that I took a distaste to my friends also; their voices sounded harsh in my ears, and all they said seemed but repetitions of what they had said many times before, and their faces seemed to me to wear always the same stereotyped smile, and their manners seemed to have lost all originality and spontaneity, until they themselves were little better than speaking automata.

Yet some were learned, some wise, some bewitching, and all good and kind, so clearly the fault was in myself. I consulted my doctor.

"You are hipped," he said. "You must have complete change. Try Norway."

I went home determined to follow his advice; but I would not try Norway. I would have a greater change. I remembered having noticed a certain lane in a certain village, with a house with a bill in a window of "Lodgings to Let." If rooms were to be had, I would go there.

I enquired. Rooms were vacant, and could be retained for me. I let my house furnished for a term; I dismissed my servants for a long holiday, and came down to the little village, quite free, and my own mistress absolutely. I rejoiced in my immunity from all social ties, restrictions, and boredom, and was thoroughly prepared to enjoy myself after a fashion of my own, for the brisk business I had transacted had shaken me into good health and cheerfulness.

The morning after my arrival I went out to luxuriate in the green fields, the trees, the blue sky, the birds, the bees, the butterflies, and even the moles and the ants, if I could descry them. I had read the works of Richard Jefferies, and I flattered myself was about to study Nature with an enlightened mind and educated eye. I went down shady lanes, and by a brook that would not babble or ripple, as a kindly brook should do, but flowed evenly and silently, not to say sluggishly. Still, I saw more beautiful and interesting things than in former rambles, and I thought pleasantly that my mind must really be intelligent and appreciative.

I entered a field; I kept by the hedge to observe the strange creatures it sheltered. I was going uphill, and the path was a little rugged. I looked away from the hedge and observed a cow gazing fixedly at me. I remembered that years ago my father had said to me, "Nellie, that cow wants to speak to you," and forthwith the animal had rushed at me, and was with difficulty frightened away by the umbrellas and shouts of my friends.

Now this cow was looking at me, and soon it moved towards me. I ran away downhill at my greatest speed. I was almost at the stile. I could hear the animal's heavy tread. I urged myself to greater swiftness. I stumbled through the unevenness of the ground and fell. I glanced round in despair, expecting to see the great eyes and terrible horns close to me, but a tuft of clover had attracted the attention of my enemy, and she was placidly munching it, and when she had finished she walked quietly away to the other side of the field.

I could not rise, my ankle was sprained, and I sat under the shelter of my great holland sunshade for two hours. I had coveted solitude, I had wanted to be alone with Nature. I had not met a human being since leaving my lodging. I had clearly made a wise choice in my selection of a locality, but I was not contented. I did not like sitting in the corner of a field with a cow for compulsory society, and was beginning to think that a place might be too solitary when my listening ears were gladdened by the sound of wheels.

I flourished my sunshade as high as I could, and called out: "Help, help!"

A vehicle drew up at the stile, and a powerful man came to me. He helped me to rise, lifted me over the stile, and then into his cart, and took me home, and upstairs, and for more than a fortnight I had been upon the couch, looking out at the garden opposite, and watching for the opening of the little brown door.

Next day when my landlady came up to enquire what I could fancy for dinner, I asked her who lived opposite.

A certain primness came over her as she said:

"A young woman—leastways, perhaps I should say a young lady—and a servant, ma'am."

"Nobody else?"

"Well, I believe there is a nurse-girl, and, I have heard, a child, but I don't know of myself. I keep myself to myself, and don't make friends with strangers."

"Have they been here long?"

"Nigh upon ten months."

"And the poor young thing is a widow?"

"I did not say so, ma'am," and her aspect increased in severity.

"She has friends to visit her, I hope?" I said.

"If so be, they come from afar. No one hereabouts cares to know her."

"I do," I said, wishing to startle my very virtuous landlady, for I knew the world too well not to read her suspicions.

"The gentry are free to pick and choose their friends," she said in a conciliatory manner, "humble folk need be more careful."

"But you know nothing really against her."

"No; but one must go by the looks of things."

And the conversation dropped.

My interest in the opening of the little brown door was increased. I wanted to see the mother and child. I knew she was young and pretty, and I thought she was sad, and my only chance of seeing her to know it was she, was when she went into the garden, for I could see nothing of the cottage—which stood some distance to the left—but the cherry-tree covered end in which was the little brown door; other trees intercepted my farther view.

At last my patient watching was rewarded, the door was drawn back, and I could see into the dimness of a little passage. Presently a straight, slim girl came and stood in the sunlight; she looked all round, and up at the sky—it was blue and cloudless—came a little farther into the garden, and stood as if testing the degree of heat, then went in. Shortly after a little procession came out of the narrow doorway. A middle-aged woman carrying a garden-chair, a little maid with a shawl and big umbrella, which she put up at once, then the mother, holding a child in her arms. She it was who had first come forth to reconnoitre, and see if Nature was in a fitting mood for the presence of her darling.

The chair was placed in deep shadow, the mother sat down, but rose quickly; she found the place too cold, I thought. Next she was stationed in the full sunshine; again she moved away, and finally settled where the sun shone through sparser foliage, and made a brilliancy of ever-changing pattern upon the grass. The child saw it and would get down to pick up the brightness that was gone ere his little hand could reach it. The little group were in a flutter of delight, and the boy was the centre of this interest and admiration. The mother led the infant, but he would get away from her, and then he ran sturdily after a butterfly. They then raised their hands in an enthusiasm of joy, and I saw that they were congratulating each other, and I understood that the child had been ill, and they were rejoicing at his renewed strength. And as the mother stood watching him I saw pride and joy in the pose of her erect figure, and, as she gazed upwards, I believed that she was making thanksgiving for his recovery. Then she ran after the boy, caught him in her arms, and kissed him; maid and servant did the same. Then she played about with him as joyously as himself, the little nurse sometimes joining in, the elder woman looking on with pleased approval.

I was enchanted; the scene was idyllic; love, joy, gratitude showing themselves in the simplest fashion. I was glad when the child was contumacious and would not go indoors, and bread-and-milk was brought to him, and he took his meal like a little king with gratified courtiers watching him. Then there was more play, and finally the mother carried her boy in, his little arms full of flowers, the others followed, and once more the little brown door was closed and the garden empty.

The next day, as soon as the noontide sun passed, and there was shade in the garden, mother and child were out again—she watching him and fearing to let him be in the sunshine; but the third afternoon she brought her book and sat quietly under a tree enjoying it, so I knew that she considered the child quite well and could trust him to the care of the nurse-girl.

One day I was watching the little fellow toddle about, when I observed him dart off towards the house at his quickest pace, with hands raised in delight. I followed his glance and saw standing in the doorway a tall, fair man. The sun shone upon him, and his hair and beard looked reddish-gold. This circumstance and something in his handsome presence touched some memory and made me think that I must know him, although I could not recollect who he was. Then I saw the young mother in his arms, his golden head bending over her brown one, and the child clinging to his legs, and I looked no more, although I felt that they could hardly grudge me the pleasure of witnessing their happiness.

Later I looked again; they were walking about the garden, he carrying the boy. That evening and several more the sound of laughter floated into my silent room, and I, the lonely watcher, shared in their mirth and joyousness.

"The husband is come home," I said to my landlady.

"Yes," she answered with her air of distrust, "he comes too seldom. A husband who is three times as much from home as in it, is not to my taste."

Her prejudice irritated me, but I knew the uselessness of opposing it.

"Can you tell me his name?" I asked.

"I have heard it is Elliott," she said as if under protest.

The name carried no information for me. The Elliotts are many, yet I could not call to mind that I had ever known one. Only some chance resemblance, I thought, but I wished that the tall handsome man had been an old acquaintance.

There is one evening that I shall never forget, though it was only made memorable by subsequent events. The sky was cloudless, the sunshine brilliant, and a soft breeze blew direct into my room, causing me to hear all external sounds with unusual distinctness. I watched my neighbours playing with their boy. I noticed what a personable pair they were, and I wished I was grandmother to the child. There was more frolic and fun than ever, and I rejoiced, for I had taken them all to my empty heart, and was glad in their gladness. But as the laughter sounded loud in my ears I missed its old mirthful ring, it was so full of excitement as to border on discordance. It struck me that they were trying, perhaps involuntarily, to ward off care by excess of merriment. And I saw them take to walking about soberly, the father carrying the boy, as on the first evening of his coming, with a sense of satisfaction.

CHAPTER II.

THE next day there were only two dejected figures moving about the garden, and once I saw mother and child crying together as she sat caressing him under the big apple-tree. Then the maid came out, and mother and nurse made pretence of a merry game to cheer the child, and I knew that the father was gone away, and I grieved that there should be need of such partings.

Time passed; my ankle was quite recovered. I took to walking again, determined to keep far away from a cow. When I was about near my lodgings, I always looked out for my pretty neighbour, and once I met her with child and nurse. I spoke to the child and herself, but she was reserved, or I was awkward, for I failed to make any way towards acquaintance, but I told her that I could see into her garden, and took pleasure in watching her boy, and afterwards I often observed her looking up at my window, and later she would make the child kiss his fingers to me.

More than a month after Mr. Elliott's visit, the little maid came in to ask me to go over at once, for mistress was frightened, baby was so strange. Strangers as they were, they had become, through my constant interest in them, so much parts of my life, that it seemed most natural for me to be asked to do something for them. I found the mother bending over the boy, who was insensible.

"We will put him in a bath," I said, "and send for the doctor."

"There is no one but nurse in the house, but I can get the water." And she did, calmly and quietly following out my directions, and the boy was sitting up smiling at her when the girl returned with the doctor.

"He will do," said the medical man, "probably a fit of indigestion—no need for anxiety," and he went away.

Mrs. Elliott thanked me very gratefully. I noticed that she had grown thin and careworn, and I felt anxious about the absence of the elderly servant. Was she unable to keep her from poverty? Money was not of consequence to me, I had plenty of it, and I began thinking at once how I could force a loan upon her.

"Your cook has not left you, I hope?"

"Oh no, she will be back to-morrow, I hope;" and she turned so white that I knew that there was something amiss, but did not see my way to ascertain what it was.

"I shall look in to see how the little darling is, the last thing," I said, and then went home to ponder on many subjects connected with my interesting young mother.

Just before sunset I went over to the cottage, and found baby sleeping quietly, apparently as well as ever. I asked Mrs. Elliott to walk with me in her garden, saying that I had long wished to explore its beauties. I admired some especially fine flowers, and then turning to her I said abruptly:

"It grieves me to see you so sad and careworn, so changed; tell me your trouble. I am an old woman, and have seen much sorrow, so perhaps can help you out of it."

She looked at me with such wonderful pathos, that I could scarcely refrain from taking her in my arms. Then the tears gathered in her great eyes, and she said with a sob:

"I shall be so glad if you do not mind." I drew my arm within her. "I am so frightened," she continued; "I have not heard from my husband since he left me, and he always writes every week."

"My poor child! can you not write to his parents or friends for news of him?"

"He has only a mother, and she does not know of me; but I have sent my servant to find out what has happened. He was going home when he left me."

"A secret marriage," I said, and then she told me the sorrowful story.

She was the daughter of a curate of a country parish. She first met Mr. Elliott when he was on a walking tour with a friend. The following year he came by himself, and took lodgings in the town, saying that it was an excellent place for reading, it was so quiet, and offered so few distractions. He continued his acquaintance with the curate, and was soon in love with the girl, who returned his affection. Her father sanctioned an engagement. He then took some malady and was soon ill unto death, when Mr. Elliott proposed to marry his daughter at once, to which he consented, being terribly anxious about her future, as he was a widower, and had no relations to whose care she could be confided.

It was a mournful wedding. The two went back to the dying man as soon as it was over, and stayed with him until the last. Then Mr. Elliott took his bride to a village within reasonable distance of the university. And she did not mind the loneliness and isolation of her life, because he came to see her occasionally. At the time of the marriage Mr. Elliott was only a few months over twenty-one, and his mother was still absolute mistress in the home that was then his by inheritance. He was loth to tell her of his marriage; he wanted to tell of it with great tact and delicacy; he wanted to lead up to the idea of his taking a wife, so that the fact of his having done so might not come upon her as a great shock. Three years he had been trying to do this, and Ruth waited patiently; now that she had a boy she did not mind how long she waited, she told me with pretty impressiveness, but I minded, and I thought that here was a wrong that I might be able to right. She told me that his mother was a great lady, famous for her beauty and her wit, and that she was afraid she would be very angry with Alfred for marrying without her sanction. I asked this lady's maiden-name, and found that it had been Percy—Arabella Percy. Instantly the impression that I had seen Mr. Elliott before was accounted for. Arabella Percy, the beautiful, the imperious, had been a very dear friend of my own before I started with my husband on his long foreign service. When I returned to England I heard that she was married, but not to whom, and we had not seen each other for twenty-five years.

"I feel better," Ruth said when she had ended her little tale. "I have never told anyone—indeed, I have scarcely spoken to a lady since I have been married. People seem shy of me because my husband is not always with me, I suppose."

Then she spoke again of her fears and her longing for the morrow to know if he was very ill. I tried to soothe her, but she was full of apprehension, so I promised to be with her the next day, and consult with her on what was best to be done in the emergency which might arise.

I was so sorry for her sad position, and she was so sweet and docile, so willing to be advised, and so grateful for sympathy, that my heart was filled with tenderness for her, and I wished I could do her a real service.

I was walking with Ruth in the garden, when the servant came to tell her news. She was a strong, healthy woman, but her face was deadly white, and I could see her hands tremble as she stood before her mistress and said:

"I found the place, ma'am."

"And he was ill?" exclaimed Ruth.

"Yes, ma'am."

"Did you see him?"

"No, ma'am."

"Ah, you were very discreet. You got my letter to him, and have brought me his answer?"

"I could not get to the house," and the woman wrung her hands.

"I would not cause him a moment's trouble for worlds. You were right to keep away; but you managed to hear what is the matter, and how he is getting on? He is better?" And she looked up with imploring eyes into the woman's face.

The poor creature burst into tears.

"Is he so very bad? Oh, I must see him," she cried in great anguish.

"Here, take baby; he is getting frightened at your sad looks," I said, putting him into her arms with a roughness that set him crying. "I will question cook; she seems a bit dazed."

I pushed her down into the seat near, led the woman aside, and soon learned the terrible truth.

Mr. Elliott had been killed in a railway accident on his way home, and had been buried many weeks, and his name was upon the great monument over the family vault. It was reported in the village that his mother was nearly mad with grief, and that the estate would go to a very distant kinsman, whom nobody about the place had ever seen.

As carefully and kindly as I could, I told the awful news to the poor young widow. I was almost afraid that she would lose her reason, she was so utterly despairing. She had neither sight nor hearing for her boy, although his pitiful grief at her changed appearance was enough to melt a heart of stone. I sent him away to be amused and comforted, and I watched with her until morning, when she fell into the heavy sleep of exhaustion.

When I returned to her, the child was in her lap, her tears falling on his golden head.

"He would wish me to think of him," she said softly.

"Assuredly his child must be your first thought," I answered, kissing her. "He will grow up just like his father."

"You think so?" she said, with a brightening of her sad face.

"I am sure of it."

"And you will help me to get him his rights? He would wish it, I know; he has often talked of the fine estate that would belong to the little beggar, as he sometimes called him." And fast the tears fell on the little face that looked wonderingly up into hers.

"He is his father's heir, and shall have all that belongs to him; I will see to that." And I wiped away the tears from the little face, tremulous with vague misery. "But the first thing is to get proper mourning for you."

She shivered. I kissed her and gave my watch to the child to console him.

"It must be," I added. "You would wish to pay him every respect?"

"Yes, yes. Heaven bless you! I wish he knew that I had such a friend, he would be so glad."

"Perhaps he does know," I whispered.

She continued :

"He was always so sorry that I had no friends, but said that it should be made up to me in the future a hundredfold. And he is dead."

I knew those last words meant that there was an end of all things for her, and their simple pathos went to my heart. I felt the absolute futility of all attempts at consolation in such bitter grief as hers, and giving her one kiss of sympathy I busied myself with the child.

Presently he came from her lap to mine, and she did not miss him; the joy and glory of her life had departed, and all lesser things might pass from her, and she would scarcely be conscious of their loss. So young, and yet borne down by such terrible affliction, would the burden be more than she could bear? I wondered. And I clasped the child closer in my arms, thinking that then he should be to me as my own, my cherished little grandson. And then I remembered his real grandmother.

I walked about with the boy in the garden, then gave him to his nurse, and went to his mother. She was still in the same position. When I went close to her, she lifted her despairing eyes, and said :

"I will try to be calmer to-morrow."

"Yes, yes," I answered ; "and I may get the things? You will let me act as if I were your mother."

"Do what you will," she said, and her thoughts went back to her dead husband, and there I let them rest, for I was awed by the solemnity of her grief.

CHAPTER III.

I GOT mourning suitable for Alfred Elliott's widow; she did not notice its richness. I put the cap on the fair young head myself, it gave dignity to the sad face and slim figure. I was proud of the beautiful young widow, and I thought that her despairing mournfulness would plead eloquently with her late husband's mother by showing how deep had been her love for the son. I was always planning how to bring these two women together. Each had need of the other, and yet it would be easy to raise a barrier between them which should be well-nigh insurmountable. If the dowager Mrs. Elliott once declared that Ruth was not her son's wife, she would work hard to prove her words true.

She had been arrogant, domineering, and of strong will as Arabella Percy, and it was not reasonable to suppose that years of wealth, and of absolute rule over a minor and his estate, had made her more humble in mind or less confident of the infallibility of her own judgment.

I pondered the subject anxiously, prayerfully. I was bound to bring forward the claims of the infant and his mother, and I sought to do so in the way that should be least harmful. Every mode I thought of held dangers, covert sometimes, but real. Mrs. Elliott was like a fortress that must be assailed and conquered at once; there must be no parley or delay, or we should be repulsed with direful result. This I realised fully, and I decided on a proceeding that may seem foolish and unwarrantable, but I looked at it all round and I believed it to be the best I could do, and I hold that we must do what seems to us best, and leave the issue with Providence.

Ruth sorrowed only, and took no thought of anything, and was as wax in my hands. She never alluded to her boy's interests again. When I told her that I should take them all to a small town within some miles of her husband's estate the following day, she said simply, "Yes," and her tears fell faster.

We slept one night in the little town. I had some conversation with the landlord about the railway accident, which was still of recent memory, and heard of the death of young Squire Elliott, and the grief of his mother, and that she was a mighty high lady, and still at the Hall.

The next morning two handsome carriages drove out of the little town. Child and nurse in the first, the mother and myself in the second.

Ruth was quite passive. I think she was so absorbed in her grief as to be incapable of nervousness or excitement. I tried to cheer her, and the one thing she said was :

"If she would take the child, and let me go to him!"

Within a mile of the park-gates, I got into the first carriage and sent child and nurse to Ruth.

As I neared the house I felt very nervous, but I told myself that I was doing my best, and must not be faint-hearted.

Mrs. Elliott was at home. I sent in my card with my maiden-name written beneath the other. In a few minutes we met, after twenty-five years' separation. She was the same handsome, haughty woman, and I should have known her anywhere. There was no grey in her golden hair; but I saw traces of deep suffering in her face.

"I am glad to see you," she said, extending her hand with the stately graciousness I knew of old,

"I have been away from England many years," I answered, "and it is only lately that I heard where you were living."

"I have often wished we might meet again. We were good friends in the old time."

"I hope we shall be good friends again. Oh, I am so grieved for your loss!" and my eyes were full of tears. Hers were dry as she answered :

"The joy of my life is gone. I sit in solitude and desolation; he was my only one, and so noble and beautiful. I wish you could have seen him."

"I have seen him," I answered.

"You, Nellie! But, of course, he was much about in the world. And you liked him? He was handsome, and good, and clever—a son to be proud of and idolise."

"He was all these things, and more, and even to have had him for your son is an honour and a blessing. I envy you—I have never had a child."

"Poor thing! it is a great privation to be childless."

"I have adopted one," I replied, "a fair sweet girl, fit to be a duchess; her name is Ruth."

"You did well, you were always wise; but you saw my son often?"

"No; but I saw him before he started on his last visit to you. And I admired and respected him; but I did not then know that he was your child. I had never heard your married name, but Alfred Elliott was more than a good son, he was a good husband and a good father." I heard a gasping sob. She was standing grasping the back of a chair. I continued: "He was coming to tell you all, and obtain your forgiveness for his secrecy, when the terrible calamity overtook him, and he passed away, silent and unforgiven."

"What!" she cried; "he deceived me, my honest, frank boy!"

"His generous love hurried him into a marriage, and then he waited too long in breaking it to you; he disliked to do anything to change the even tenor of your lives."

"Oh, that he had spoken!" she moaned.

"He would have done so if he had lived an hour longer. Do not be hard upon him."

"I hard upon my own child? You do not know what you are saying. I hard upon him! I dare say he was right; the matter only needed explanation."

"Nothing more. Then you two would have understood each other, and been happier than ever, and been proud of his boy."

"His boy!"

"Himself over again, with the same golden hair and loving eyes; the sweetest child that lives."

"And his wife?"

"My adopted child, Ruth, sweet and tractable, but so deep in despair at the loss of her husband that I fear she will die too, and leave the dear boy an orphan indeed. I would gladly love and cherish him if I had the right."

"But you have not; it is mine. The love and the cherishing must be mine. The guidance and protection all mine. I am his rightful guardian."

There was intense haughtiness in her voice and manner. My heart resented it, yet I was glad, and answered gently:

"I know that is so, and that is why I have brought him to your knowledge."

"Thank you. And understand I am not angered with my son. I do not doubt he had good reason for what he did, and that a word of his would have made that reason clear. It can never be spoken, but I trust him. I would not have the world think there was ever division between him and me, in life, or in death. I trust him."

"You do well," I said, and I admired her proud endeavour to crush down and hide her bitter suffering at her son's deception, and to maintain her perfect belief in his goodness and wisdom.

"Where are my grandson and his mother?"

"Very near; I will bring them to you."

"You are still the old kind Nellie, but a little vague," and she smiled at me. "How soon?"

"In ten minutes," I replied.

As soon as the hall-door was opened I waved my hand, and my coachman drove on, and then another carriage moved out of the shadow of trees at this prearranged signal, and came towards the house. When it stopped at the steps I went down, and told my darling that she and her boy were acknowledged.

There was joy in her face for a moment, and she pressed my hand gratefully, but the deep melancholy was back at once, and she looked faint with grief as I led her up the steps, holding her boy by the hand.

As we entered the hall I observed that servants were drawn up in a line on either side, and before we had advanced many steps Mrs. Elliott, with most gracious dignity of mien, and saying, "Welcome to your home, dearest Ruth," put her arms round the girl and kissed her,

Then stooping she said, "Welcome to your own, my darling," and lifting the child, kissed him passionately. Then showing him to the servants she said: "This is the new squire, your late master's son. You have not heard of him, but my son and I always understood each other. Come near and speak to him."

An old woman, the nurse of the child's father, in obedience to a sign from her mistress, came first and kissed him. All came in turn, men and women; some of the women kissed his cheek or his hand, the men put a finger or two in his little palm, and "He is the image of the master;" "Surely he'll be a blessing to you;" "I'm glad the old line will last;" and other sayings of a like nature were uttered by all.

The child was amused, and smiled at every face as it looked at him and passed on. He sat erect on his grandmother's arm, and she held him proudly, as if he were a baby prince receiving the homage of his vassals.

Ruth watched him with dilated eyes; once I fancied that there was a gleam of triumph in them, for that her boy had his rightful place as his father's son, and wore his honours royally. As the last servant turned from the child her slight form swayed, and would have fallen, save for the old nurse, who caught her in her arms.

She was carried to Mrs. Elliott's room, while the grandest chamber of the house was made ready for her. She was the widow of the dead son, and mother of the living grandson, and was honoured accordingly.

I stayed at the Hall until my adopted child had attained a more resigned frame of mind, and then I went back to my home and my friends well pleased with my holiday. I left a peaceful household behind me, and I knew that it would be a very happy one as soon as time had dimmed its memory of the great bereavement, for Mrs. Elliott liked to manage and govern all things and all people, and Ruth wished to do nothing but love her boy, and admire and reverence his grandmother.

The Thrush.

THE brown bird came where his nest had been,
When the skies were bright and the leaves were green;
He came where the bare boughs aaway in the cold,
And his mate lay dead on the black wet mould.
Through the sunless air the frost had stilled
The wailing note of his melody thrilled,
As the sense of solitude, loss, and wrong
Broke in the flood of his passionate song.

He sang as of erst beside his nest,
To charm the ear that he loved the best,
In a sad and strange delight he sang,
Till his call through the desolate woodland rang;
Fuller and sweeter swelled the note
From the breaking heart and the quivering throat,
Till in the dreadful unanswering hush,
Silent and dead lay the lonely thrush.

So many a human singer will come
Where the hearth is cold and the hope is dumb,
And wake the notes that the dead loved well,
With a bitter joy in the old sweet swell;
Just so much the better than brutes we are,
We can catch an echo though faint and far;
As faith and memory breathe from the skies,
"The love that united us never dies."

The Editor's Note Book.

IT was fortunate for the Government that they were induced to take measures for active intervention in the Soudan before the division on the proposed vote of censure. There can be no doubt that the speeches of Mr. Forster and Mr. Goschen accurately reflected the opinions of a considerable number of Liberals, and that the past conduct of the Government has only been condoned by many of their habitual supporters in consequence of the hope that they mean to do better in the future.

ANOTHER circumstance which tends greatly to maintain Mr. Gladstone in power is the fact that the House did not, and is not likely to, see its way to giving Lord Salisbury what Mr. Goschen happily called a "political blank cheque." So it is more than probable that the Conservative party will have to wander aimlessly about in the cold shade of Opposition, as sheep without a shepherd, for at least the life of the present Parliament.

THE majority against the vote was smaller than that by which Mr. Gladstone is usually supported, but the Parnellites voted almost "solid" against the Liberals—as they would probably have voted against the Conservatives if Sir Stafford Northcote had been sitting on the right instead of on the left of the Speaker—so that the Government was, as a matter of fact, almost as strong as ever.

MR. MARRIOTT had the courage of his opinions in a greater degree than other weak-kneed Liberals who were of his way of thinking, but nevertheless went into the division lobby with Mr. Gladstone. Not only did he speak and vote against the Government, but next day resigned his seat in order to see at once what view the Brighton electorate takes of the situation.

NATURALLY enough he has been indignantly thrown over by the Liberal party in the borough, and can only hope to be re-elected by the Conservatives, assisted by such members of the Whig branch of the Liberal party as may be induced by the secrecy of the ballot to vote as they feel inclined, rather than as they are told. The result seems to be very doubtful, but the Liberals have secured a strong candidate in Mr. Robert Romer, Q.C., a senior wrangler, and one of the leaders of the Chancery Bar. Mr. Romer was educated at Trinity Hall, to which college Sir Charles Dilke and Professor Fawcett also belong.

GENERAL GORDON'S Slave-Trade proclamation, on which it is hardly fair to comment unfavourably until the full reasons for its issue have been given, will assuredly cause a good deal of trouble, but, if he with his diplomacy, and General Graham with his troops, are only successful in settling matters in the Soudan, public discontent at home will probably be very soon dissipated in words.

CERTAINLY our proceedings must "astonish the natives" not a little. In one part of the country our representative proclaims emphatically that he comes without troops and without arms to deliver the people from the Egyptians, and elsewhere we are under the painful necessity of calling the people rebels, and of marching out against them, for the protection of those same Egyptians, with soldiers, and cannon, and all the rest of it. But so long as everybody votes with his party at Westminster, all is presumably for the best.

STILL, it is an astonishing circumstance, and one which must be altogether inexplicable to our friends on the Continent, that England, who has been for so many years, and at so tremendous a cost, committed to the abolition of slavery, should find herself compelled, not only to temporise with but absolutely to enter into an alliance with slaveholders. Events, after all, are more the masters than the servants of the nations as they are of individuals.

No doubt the Speaker was right the other day in his ruling on a point of order which arose in the course of a speech of Mr. Healy's, but if the honourable gentleman is not out of order when he called Lord Rossmore "a bigoted and malevolent young puppy," it becomes curious matter for speculation to consider what sort of language would be so unparliamentary as to evoke the Speaker's reprobation.

THE Liverpool murders afford ghastly evidence that wholesale poisoning for the sake of insurance-money is as rife as ever, and that the value which the lower orders of the community place upon human life is not very much higher than that which obtains in China. It is impossible to suppose that a little more care on the part of the insurance offices would not go far to make the crime so dangerous as to be unremunerative.

A MOVEMENT has been set on foot for the preservation of the Alexandra Park to the public, and London is growing so rapidly northward, that it is earnestly to be hoped that the attempt may be successful. Between the Park and Highgate there are still some pretty fields, and a charming bit of old Hornsey Wood. If these could also be preserved it would be all the better, but I am afraid that this is too much to hope for.

LIEUTENANT WAGHORN, the founder of the overland route to India, died some years ago, a disappointed and unappreciated man, leaving relatives who were dependent upon him, in a state of poverty which was scarcely even mitigated by a grateful country. It is now proposed to erect a monument to his memory at a cost of from two to three thousand pounds. A little seasonable bread would have been more useful than all this stone.

CRITICS should never lose sight of the fact that people attach widely different meanings to words, and that there are all sorts of ways of looking at things. Thus, Miss Smith, governess, who brought an action against her employer, deposed that she had been most shamefully treated by that lady's children, in that they went so far as to put sugar on her bread and butter. If this was all the lady had to complain of, it would seem that she was almost too sensitive. The case was otherwise remarkable for the brilliantly humorous manner in which it was treated by Mr. Baron Pollock.

THE editor of Truth professes to feel much sympathy with poor Miss Fortescue, but certainly has an odd way of showing it. Last week, for instance, he published a number of stories to the lady's detriment, remarking that he did not believe they were true, but was afraid that a good many people might accept them as facts. On the face of them they were preposterous fabrications, and it seems a singular sort of kindness to have published them at all.

It always seems to me to be a contradiction in terms to speak of such productions as "Paw Clawdian" as good-humoured, and genial, and not calculated to hurt anybody's feelings, and so on. People do not appreciate being laughed at, however much, like the Marchioness with the orange peel, they may "make believe," and to point out the absurd and the ludicrous, and nothing but the absurd and the ludicrous, in one's neighbours is not always an infallible sign of a genial or kindly nature.

Of course it may be said that in concocting a parody of "Claudian," Mr. Burnand was no more obliged to show any regard or consideration for the feelings of Mr. Wilson Barrett or Miss Eastlake, Mr. Wills or Mr. Herman, than he was called upon, when he turned "The Tempest" into a Gaiety burlesque, to trouble himself with any feeling of respect or reverence for Shakespeare, and perhaps this is true. But then, if it is all so good-natured, why should Mr. George Sims and Mr. Henry Jones come in for a sneer in "Paw Clawdian," seeing that they have no connection at all with Mr. Wilson Barrett's latest success, except that they also have had plays produced at the Princess's?

THE fact is that burlesque, or parody, or travestie, or whatever it may be called, is, and has been in all ages, so highly appreciated by the public—always ready to laugh, if it is amused, without the slightest reference to the possible annoyance or mortification of the unfortunates who are held up to ridicule, and who, if they suffer, can only grin and bear it as best they may—that it is useless at this time of day to attempt to protest against it, and that it must be accepted like other developments of the drama.

BUT it is a form of dramatic cookery which is always popular in proportion to the quantities of spice and pepper which are put into it, though where the kindness and good-humour of the cook come in, I must confess I altogether fail to see.

As for "Paw Clawdian" itself, Mr. Burnand has fitted it with some of his most excruciating "side-splitters," and has made adroit use of those portions of the original which lend themselves most readily to burlesque, but the travestie really has to rely on the imitations which are given of the Princess's company, and naturally enough "Paw Clawdian" becomes rather tedious before he has finished his career.

MR. TOOLE (with a capital song), Miss Marie Linden, Mr. George Shelton and Mr. W. Brunton are as good as they possibly can be, and Mr. E. D. Ward delivers his curse with much humorous impressiveness and sings a comic song quite unusually well. I am bound to say that on the night of my visit the great majority of the audience were far more amused by the performance than I was, and that there is every prospect of a long and prosperous career for the piece. ## Charm of Flowers.

FLOWERS seem intended for the solace of ordinary humanity; children love them; quiet, tender, contented ordinary people love them as they grow; luxurious and disorderly people rejoice in them gathered. They are the cottager's treasure; and in the crowded town, mark, as with a little broken fragment of rainbow, the windows of the workers in whose heart rests the covenant of peace. Passionate or religious minds contemplate them with fond feverish intensity; the affection is seen severely calm in the works of many old religious painters, and mixed with more open and true country sentiment in those of our own pre-Raphaelites. To the child and the girl, the peasant and the manufacturing operative, to the grisette and the nun, the lover and monk, they are precious always. But to the men of supreme power and thoughtfulness, precious only at times; symbolically and pathetically often to the poets, but rarely for their own sakes. They fall forgotten from the great workman's and soldier's hands. Such men will take, in thankfulness, crowns of leaves, or crowns of thorns—not crowns of flowers.—Ruskin.

THE HYGIENE OF DRESS.

IN our last article we considered the hygiene of entertainments, and now we will go on to a subject not wholly unrelated thereto, to wit, the hygiene of dress.

CLOTHING should, in the first place, afford fit protection for our bodies, and in the second, it should be as pleasant as possible to the eye. We put this in the second place, yet we think this an instance in which we may invariably apply the quaint verse:

Straight is the line of duty,
Curved is the line of beauty.
Seek thou the first and thou shalt see
The second ever follow thee.

It is not beauty, but "fashion" which perverts our clothing from what is fit and serviceable.

IN our climate, almost all the year round, certain degrees of warmth must be sought, and clothing must be studied with this view. But it should be always remembered that clothing does not "create" warmth, it only keeps in what is there and prevents it from running to waste. To maintain heat in our bodies is really equivalent to taking so much food. There is a deep philosophy in the provincialism which calls chilly people "starved." It can, therefore, be readily understood that cumbrous clothing which impedes exercise is not truly warm clothing, yet one very common mistake is to resort to heavy wraps, while neglecting light, simple, and more truly warm arrangements. One hears ladies complain of cold hands, and sees them draw numb fingers from knitted or wool-lined gloves. On enquiry, one finds that their underclothing, at least any that is worthy to be so called—i.e. flannel or woollen—stops at their shoulders, and that their arms are only protected by the thin linen sleeve of a slip body, and the sleeve of their dress, probably of silk or cashmere. We have known many instances of cold hands growing warm as soon as the woollen underclothing was extended to the wrists.

IN this connection let us mention the great insanitary evils which often follow the inexplicable custom of baring the female neck and arms at evening parties. This is not seen so often now, but it still appears at times; and we fear that it is only held in abeyance by "fashion," and not by common-sense and good taste. Fatal illnesses have often arisen from chills received by this unnecessary exposure. The skin which covers the body is largely supplied with numerous and very fine small blood-vessels called capillaries, also with numerous little tubes which secrete perspiration. These structures are in a state of heat and activity during the heat and excitement of a crowded assembly, and if large surfaces like the arms and shoulders, and, above all, the front part of the chest, are exposed or imperfectly covered, a sudden and decided chill is felt—the activity of the skin is suddenly checked. Even if shawls and cloaks are thrown on in abundance, it must be remembered they must be considerably colder than the skins with which they come in contact; they may be even a little damp from lying in carriages or on hall-tables, perhaps near dripping garments. Besides, how is it possible to avoid a sudden draught?

THE true way to secure warmth is to have underclothing, so sensibly chosen and abundantly supplied, that a short, thick, tight-fitting jacket or coat is all that is needed for outdoor exercise. For those so sensitive that they cannot endure flannel next the skin, the flannel may be worn outside very thin and closely-fitting linen under-garments.

FUR is always very beautiful, and in many circumstances seems so natural and appropriate a protection, that it is hard even to hint that there are other circumstances in which it is not so desirable. Fur should be only used in loose outer garments, or as trimming, for fur is a skin in which the functions have ceased; it is, in plain words, leather, and does not absorb and carry off our perspiration as woollen garments do.

CLOTHING should be not only not too heavy, but it should not in any way hamper the natural and easy movements of the body, or of any single limb. What can be more absurd than to see a lady at a bank counter, struggling to get her cheques within reach of her hand, her arm being pinioned to her side? Or to see a gentleman holding "his chin in the air," to spare himself from mildly cutting his throat on his high stand-up shirt-collar? Tight-fitting trousers are not nice to look at, and certainly are not comfortable to wear, and our nerves surely have enough unavoidable irritation, without rasing them with petty miseries of this sort. The tight-fitting skirts were almost more irrational. They prevented anything like proper walking, and readily led to accidents from inability to move quickly and adroitly, and it was painful to think what would be the result if one of these unfortunately-attired ladies happened to fall!

ANOTHER injurious fashion—and it may be remembered that these things may always recur—was the walking-dress with a long train, which was worn out of doors knotted up and swinging behind a sheer waste of work and material, only producing a chronic bundle, and indoors as "a tail," which must have been a perfect nuisance among the exigencies of domestic life. A better device for weakening the spine and producing a general feeling of malaise and inadequacy for the duties of life could not well have been contrived. Another unnecessary appendage is called the "dress improver," certainly not the "figure improver." These artificial monstrosities can serve no useful purpose, they simply waste time, money, and temper. They cannot be beautiful, for if we found anything like them in Nature it would mean disease and abnormality.

HATS and bonnets should not be made too heavy, for this leads to headache and is injurious to the hair. There is not a word to be said for the "chimney-pot" hat. It is simply due to a "fashion" which has settled into pernicious "use and wont." Ladies' bonnets should not be so small as to be mere apologies for a head-covering; nor should they be hard and stiff. The prim Quaker bonnet has been said, by experienced "Friends," to be very provocative of headache.

It often seems as if ladies have no regard for their personal appearance, but only for the "fashion," else whole communities would not, at one time, change the style of wearing the hair, since no one style can possibly suit all ages and all sorts of faces. The chignon was a thoroughly unwholesome abomination. Again, hair should never be dragged and strained in a direction opposite from its natural growth, nor frizzled in a hot mat on the forehead. Elaborate hair-dressing is to be deprecated. It is not natural; it hurts the hair, which it often destroys, and the position of the arms and hands while performing the office of self-adornment is trying and exceedingly bad for delicate people. Doctors are just now suggesting that a return to the old-fashioned "night-cap" might avert some headaches and neuralgic troubles. In the case of ladies it does really seem as if such an article would give the head a refreshing rest from combs, hair-pins, etc. Few care to sleep with their hair straying in disorder; that might easily produce an irritation which would banish sleep, therefore the general custom is to secure the hair much as is done by day, only probably a little more tightly. Now, if a nightcap were used, the hair might be simply well brushed out, coiled up, and slipped into its crown. But such a nightcap must be of thin and soft material, rational shape, and delicate cleanliness.

We are thankful to hope that tight-lacing is a fashion that is really dying out. A tight constriction at the waist exerts injurious pressure on the liver, stomach, and other most important organs. It impedes the breathing, and provokes palpitation and other nervous symptoms. It often leads to fainting. The famous Dr. John Brown has given the world a humorous picture of his father's stern beadle standing beside a prostrate lady of the congregation, with the ominous words, "Shall I rip her up, sir?"

THE proper kind of boot we have already discussed in "The Care of the Feet." Suffice it for us to say that a very high-heeled and narrow boot is now on view in one of our surgical museums, labelled "The Deformity of Fashion." Woollen stockings should be worn, not only in winter, but whenever there is any chance of getting the feet wet. We should not rest contented with carelessly-bought "worsted stockings," but should carefully select our article from among the best "hand-knit." If we can get the real Shetland goods, we shall do well to do so, especially if we are greatly exposed to wet feet. The climate of Shetland is notoriously humid, and the islanders say "there is nothing but Shetland wool to save one from Shetland weather," while visitors to the island declare that they feel an appreciable difference in their comfort when they exchange garments of the best Scotch wool for the products of native industry. Yet it is said that the real breed of Shetland sheep is being allowed to pass away without any special effort to retain it—since Shetland industry has never been able to secure a healthy and active trade!

BUT in a subject ever varying as this, the best advice is that which asserts permanent principles. We may lay down the following rules: That our garments should follow the lines of our bodies. That the free use of our limbs should be secured. That no unnecessary burdens should be imposed on our strength. That when seeking warmth we should also be careful to secure cleanliness and lightness. That we should study what really suits our own appearance and requirements, and reject all fashions out of harmony with these. That we should seek for materials of purity and durability. That we should reject all manufactures which are unwholesome to the producers, and which entail cruelty upon any living creature. And that it is a matter of personal duty to seek knowledge on these subjects, and to give them most careful consideration.

Napoleon at St. Helena.

Reminiscences of a Veteran.

IN the pretty little town of Woodbridge, in Suffolk, lives an old veteran, Stephen Barber by name, now in his eighty-ninth year, who was one of the men on duty at St. Helena during the time Napoleon was a captive there. The following narrative, related in his own words, may prove of interest to many of our readers,

"Yes, sir, thank God! I'm middlin' well. I'm eighty-nine come the 22nd of June."

"Four days after Waterloo," I remark.

"Ah yes! that Waterloo worn't so much as folks make out; it is 'cos 'twas the last. There were a many worse actions than that. I were at Toulouse, though, in 1814, in the Twentieth Regiment. We came to Ireland arter that, so missed being at Waterloo. We sailed from Cork to St. Helena in 1816. Yes, I recollect Bony werry well. I was on guard over him at St. Helena, a werry arbitrary man he was. Wunnerful proud like. Admiral Cockburn, he were governor there afore Sir Hudson Lowe come. When he come to take charge on him, he says, says he, 'I 'on't take charge on him till I see him.' Bony, he hated Lowe, and when he come, went indoors, and barred all the doors. But Sir Hudson had the sappers up and broke all the doors open with sledge-hammers, and when he went in, took hold of Bony by the shoulders and turned him round, and looked him in the face and said, 'Now I'll take charge on him.' They said as how Bony had been werry hard on him afore, when he took Lowe prisoner, and would ha' shot him 'cos Lowe said as how Lord Paget worn't in command o' the cavalry; more he worn't, ye know, 'cos he was just made Earl o' Uxbridge! Napoleon, he used allus to take off his hat when he come up to any of us, and put it behind his back, and show us great honour; but if ever he saw an officer, he wouldn't look at him, he'd turn his back and walk right away. He was a beautiful-made man, he was. I never see one made like him—you couldn't ha' turned' one like him. He was werry proud of his figure, and allus wore low shoes, silk stockings, and tight breeches to show his legs. Yes, he was a handsome man, only werry dark complexion, ye know, which showed the Cossack [Corsican?]. He was afraid o' being made away with by poison. There used to be a beautiful spring o' water close by where I was on guard. His servant allus used to come down every morning with two great silver pitchers to fill with water. That's a curus thing, arter his layin' there all them years, they should take him up and bury him in Paris. I was one of the light company; there was twelve on us as carried him from Longwood to the Hut House arter he died. Then there was twelve o' the Grenadiers carried him to the cemetery. There was a lady on horseback with beautiful gold saddle-cloth, she stood on the top of a hill all the time, so she could look over the whole. When Napoleon died he was laid out in state, and no one who was not in uniform was allowed to see the body. Lots o' folks borrowed the soldiers' uniforms to go and see him as he laid. When he was put in the ground we gave him three times nine, just the same as a general officer. The captain of our company had charge of Napoleon personally. He had to tallygraft every time he went off duty. Captain Crockett was his name. After Napoleon died, his heart was taken out for to be embalmed. I saw the box it was in. Captain Crockett took that to England. He was made a major for his services. When Napoleon went out walking, there was most always General Bertram and General Montholon with him, one on the right hand, t'other on his left; they always walked with their hats under their arms, that was the ceremony. Sir Hudson Lowe was as nice a man as ever lived. He would walk about for an hour at a time, apparently thinking deep, and then, all of a sudden, off he'd run like a shot to put somethin' or another down, lest he should forget it, I s'pose. He did not care for to be saluted allus when we met him, and when we saluted would say sometimes, 'Oh, never mind me!' He'd a deal on his mind, no doubt. There was the Russian Ambassador and a Prussian, as well as the English and the French; that was to see Bony had his rights. You've heered, I dessay, that there was a new state prison built there, and a private chapel. There was a deal o' mutinising i' the island at one time, and while they was a-diggin' the foundations of that place they turned out no end of skeletons in irons that had been buried there; and one man, he was number ten in my company, swore nothin' on earth should make him go on guard there another night, as the night afore he saw his coffin laid at his feet, and when ordered there again, said, 'No! I'll take two hundred in the mornin' afore ever I'll go on guard there again!' I was number eleven, I was, so I said, 'Don't confine the man, I'll take his duty for him;' but, Lor' bless ye! I never see nothin' Napoleon, he went one day to look at this place while it was building; he said he would never go and live there, and took to his bed not long arter, and died. When we left there we went to North Ameriky."

My old veteran's wife—they have been married fifty-five years, he says—adds a little to their modest income by retailing sweets to the urchins in the neighbourhood. At this point in his yarn, in walks a youngster. "I want a ha'porth of mixed sweets." Veteran walks to the receptacle for such matters, grubs about a bit, can't find what is wanted, gives it up, and sings out: "Hi! missis! a bor wants a ha'porth o' mixed suckers; come you and see arter him; I don't know nothin' about sich things."

How to Work With the Microscope.

PART I.

THERE are few ways in which the spread of scientific knowledge is more strikingly exemplified than in the rapidly increasing popularity of the microscope, an instrument the use of which, not so many years since, was almost entirely confined to those few to whose researches it was an indispensable adjunct. At the present day, however, things are happily very different. The large demand for microscopes, and the consequent competition amongst manufacturers, have so greatly reduced prices that a really good and useful instrument may now be purchased for a comparatively small sum; so that investigation into the wonders and mysteries with which Nature has clothed even the most minute of her creations is now possible even to those whose narrow means preclude any great expenditure upon what to them is merely an amusement. The following hints and suggestions are intended for those who are as yet novices in the field of microscopic research, and who find that the commencement of their labours is attended with difficulties which hinder them from performing serviceable work.

IN the first place, a few words as to the choice of a microscope may not be out of place. The instruments which have from time to time been placed before the public are many and various, ranging from the simple pocket lens costing but a few pence to the elaborate and complicated instruments which are priced at from one hundred to one hundred and fifty pounds. With these latter, however, it is not now our intention to deal, for they are of service only in certain branches of science where great magnifying power is a necessity, while to the less ambitious student they would be of little practical value. It is not everyone, moreover, who has a hundred and fifty pounds to spare for such a purpose; by far the larger proportion of scientific workers being recruited from the ranks of those whose means leave but little margin for superfluous luxury. Neither shall we treat of the simple microscope, but shall confine our remarks to the ordinary forms of the "compound" instrument—i. e. that which is composed of several parts, and whose magnifying power can be increased or diminished at will.

THERE is a frequently quoted proverb to the effect that no rule is without an exception, and with regard to the microscope we find the exception which proves the rule, in the advice never upon any account to go to any but a well-known optician when purchasing an instrument. If you go to a second-rate man you are sure to get less value for your money, and although you may perhaps save a shilling or two in the first place, you are sure to repent of your folly sooner or later. All the really first-rate opticians offer for sale at about three guineas a really good microscope, with which work of even an advanced character may be performed, and which may be thoroughly depended upon for the two great requisites of magnifying power and clearness of definition. This instrument is neatly packed in a small mahogany case for convenience of carriage, and is provided with all the auxiliaries which are absolutely necessary.

UPON opening the box the microscope will be seen to consist of several parts, chief among which are the tube, or barrel, the stand, and the object-glass, or objective. The tube will be found to screw firmly into the stand, which is strongly clamped to a square of mahogany, so that perfect steadiness (a very necessary item) is assured during use. The upper portion of this tube, termed the eye-piece, is capable of removal, to allow of the substitution, if required, of others of higher magnifying power. These, however, are not provided with the lower-priced instruments, but must be purchased separately.

THE object-glass will be found enclosed in a cylindrical brass box, which is packed away in a kind of rack at the top of the case. Unscrew this, and you will find that the instrument in question consists of a small and beautifully finished compound lens of an inch and a half or so in total length. This is the most important part of the instrument, and will be found to screw into the lower end of the tube, which is then ready for use. It may here be remarked that all the modern microscopes are fitted with the "Universal" screw, so that the object-glasses of different makers are equally available.

IN the three-guinea microscope which I am now describing, the object-glass provided is formed of three parts, which may be used either separately or together. When all three are combined, they possess a focus of half an inch, and a magnifying power of one hundred and fifty diameters; that is, an object viewed through these appears one hundred and fifty times as long and as broad as is really the case. If two lenses only are used, the focus is altered from half an inch to one inch, and the magnifying power reduced to seventy-five diameters. If one glass be employed alone, the focus is altered to an inch and a half, and the magnifying power is that of thirty-five diameters only. Or, by arrangement at the time of purchase, an object-glass can be substituted, the foci and magnifying powers of which are as follows: Three lenses, equal to a quarter of an inch focus, and three hundred diameters; two lenses, equal to one-third of an inch focus, and one hundred and seventy-five diameters; one lens, equal to two-thirds of an inch focus, and ninety diameters. For ordinary purposes, however, this object-glass is far less serviceable than the preceding.

It may be well here to correct a common mistake. Many people imagine, on hearing that a certain lens magnifies, say, one hundred diameters, that an object seen through it appears one hundred times as large as it is in reality. This is not the case, for the object appears one hundred times as long and one hundred times as broad as it is when seen by the unaided eye. The total surface, therefore, is seen, in round numbers, about seven thousand eight hundred times larger than is really the case, while the magnifying power of a lens of three hundred diameters would be equivalent to more than seventy thousand times.

IN higher priced instruments each objective is complete in itself, and three or more are furnished according to circumstances. In either case, however, the lower powers are by far the more useful for ordinary work, and objectives with a less focus than a quarter of an inch are very seldom necessary. For it must be remembered that the higher the magnifying power the smaller the portion of an object which can be examined at a time, so that with the quarter-inch glass perhaps only one-seventieth part can be seen of an object the whole of which may be easily seen under an objective with a focus of an inch and a half. It may be here remarked that the foci thus given do not represent the distance at which an object must be placed from them in order to obtain a clear definition, but the object-glasses in question are supposed to possess a magnifying power equivalent to that of a lens with the focus mentioned. It will be found, for instance, that the one-inch objective must be placed but little more than half an inch from the object to be examined, and the others in corresponding proportion.

THE instrument being now fitted together, we will proceed to the manner of using it. Upon the upper portion of the stand will be seen two tolerably large milled heads, or wheels, by turning which the tube may be raised or depressed as required. This apparatus is known as the "coarse adjustment," and by its aid the necessary focus may be approximately obtained. Nearer the head of the tube is a single smaller wheel of a similar character. This is the "fine adjustment," which is of so delicate a character that the upward or downward movement of one thousandth part of an inch may be easily managed. By the aid of this the exact focus can be obtained. Beneath the tube, and forming part of the stand, is the "stage," upon which may be placed the slides, etc., intended for examination, a sliding bar being provided in order that they may be placed in the most suitable position. Underneath the stage, in the centre of which a large circular hole is cut, will be found a small mirror, which is so arranged that it may be freely turned in any direction. This mirror is to be used during the examination of transparent objects, which require that a powerful light shall be transmitted from below.

Now let us suppose that the microscope is successfully put together, a slide ready at hand, and the student prepared to set to work. Place the instrument in a good light, lay the slide upon the stage, taking care that the object is in the exact centre, and, looking down the tube meanwhile, gently work the wheels of the coarse adjustment until the focus is tolerably correct; then complete the business by the aid of the fine adjustment. Next arrange the mirror in such a manner that the light shall be reflected through the object to be examined. Having done this your preliminaries are complete, and your actual work may begin.

WHEN an opaque object is in the case the light must be differently managed, and the "condenser" will be called into play. This instrument is not furnished with the three-guinea microscope, and can be bought separately for a few shillings. It consists of a large and powerful lens fixed upon a moveable stand. Like the mirror already described this lens is so constructed that it can be turned in any required direction, and can also be raised or lowered if necessary. Arrange this in such a manner that the rays of light passing through it are concentrated upon the object under examination. This is not always easy to manage, and will require a little practice before the greatest procurable light is obtained.

IN the drawer at the bottom of the box will be found forceps of two kinds, the one of a simple and generally rather clumsy character, for raising small objects which cannot be lifted by the hand, and the other, entitled the "stage forceps," which fits upon the stage, and holds objects not easily damaged in the proper position for examination. In the case of insects, etc., these forceps are invaluable, as they can be turned in any direction, and the upper, lower, and side surfaces thus seen without difficulty. The remainder of the drawer is generally fitted up as a kind of rack, for holding slides in an upright position without contact with one another. This part of the drawer will be found especially useful when conveying a few slides for any distance.

IN the following paper a few hints will be offered upon light, management, and other details of more or less importance.

An American on China Decoration.

"THE fast four was rushing over the tracks between this city and Philadelphia the other day," says a contributor to the Crockery and Glass Journal of New York, "and seated beside us was a long angular party who had put us through the shorter catechism before we reached Newark, and had asked almost every question that language could frame excepting 'Who'd ju marry?' Of course he found out all about what we did to secure our daily soup, and he began thereupon to give us his opinions on china decoration. 'Now, I live in Brooklyn, and if I do say it myself, I've got some money and a reasonable amount of taste, and there's nothing I like more than nice china, and

I want it decorated to the Queen's taste. Some decorations I have seen and owned were just perfect and no mistake, but I know some people that wouldn't look at what I buy. They'd buy something in imitation of old Palissy, with frogs and snakes and all kinds of reptiles crawling over them. Fine things to eat out of, now ain't they? Well, I should smile. Then, some of my friends have bought stacks of Chinese stuff with a lot of hideous old heathens painted on it, enough to give a man the cholera infantum whenever he looked at them. Some of these decorators must be put to it for decorative ideas when they will put such abominable things on the ware, which would look a thousand per cent. prettier if it were left plain white. About one-half the stuff on sale nowadays is only fit to be smashed up and make roads with it, simply because the decorations spoil it. But I suppose there is always somebody ready to buy it if the price suits. Women are the worst lot to buy a dinner-set that you ever saw. They don't know anything about quality to begin with, and if they strike a decoration that tickles their fancy they buy it if it is the greatest abomination on earth. Case in point: my wife. Thought I'd let her try her hand at buying a dinner-set the other day, and what do you think? When I got home I found her just radiant, don't you know? and as I entered the dining-room she waved her hand towards the table, on which was spread a fine china dinner-set, on which was slapped in all sizes and impossible shapes a picture of Brooklyn Bridge. She said that she had just found what she had been gasping for for some weeks, as she wanted something to commemorate the opening. I tell you now, my friend, I am naturally an amiable man, but every time I go home now and find the table spread with that infernal set with two hundred and twenty 16,000,000 dols. bridges on it, it just makes me cross. Then I get my dinner in New York. Hello! get out here—eh? Well, good day!

Household Gardening.

WITH the close of February, the resting period of vegetation usually terminates, and the time of awakening arrives. The sleeping buds of trees and shrubs are summoned into activity, and opening hardy flowers—Snowdrops, Primroses, and Violets—proclaim the advent of spring. But the weather at this period is not always spring-like. Frequently, if not generally, when the winter has been remarkably mild, a cold wave passes over the land at a time when genial days are expected, shivering the advancing growths of trees and flowers. It may be so this year; if not in every part in which this Journal circulates, yet almost certainly in some districts keen winds will prevail, cutting the tender plants and budding flowers where no shelter can be afforded. In many cases, however, something can be found for placing on the windward side of plants that are liable to injury, whenever such aid may be needed. This year vegetation is very early, and consequently less sturdy than it is after a long cold winter, and the cultivator's fostering care becomes the more necessary. Let us now advert to plants of a different order—tender plants variously preserved.

PLANTS IN GREENHOUSES.

These, whatever they may be, should be closely examined now and put in order for the coming season. Young plants raised from cuttings last autumn and now growing freely in small pots, and these filled with roots, should be given pots a size larger.

In repotting a free-growing young plant, such as a Pelargonium, or any other of a succulent nature with rather large leaves that indicate brisk root-action, the pot in which it is to be placed should be two inches wider across the top than the one from which it is to be removed.

When a plant is transferred to a pot only very slightly larger than its present one, there is often not sufficient space between the ball of soil containing the roots and the sides of the new pot for the fresh compost to be pressed down properly without injuring the roots.

In shifting healthy young plants in the spring very little soil should be shaken from the roots; only just a little portion that is more or less loose on the surface needs removal, and the crocks, with a little that may adhere to them at the bottom of the ball.

A young plant that is not growing so freely as is desired and has not rooted strongly, may have a larger portion of the soil removed, as this may have become sour, or is in some other respects unsuitable, and it is always advisable that a considerable extent of roots be placed in actual contact with the fresh compost that is given. In this case a smaller pot should be selected than for a plant with abundance of roots coiled round the original soil, and where the soil is not materially disturbed.

No plant should be transferred from one pot to another, when the soil in which the plant is established is dry. Nor, on the other hand, must it be soddened with wet. Choose the medium between those two extremes, and the soil will be in the proper state. This is a very important matter—one of the secrets of success in plant culture, of even greater importance than the composition of the soil.

The soil to be used, too, must be similar in character as to moisture—i.e. neither distinctly wet nor decidedly dry. If when mixed it is in a very dry powdery state, spread it out, sprinkle it with water, and pass it through the hands, adding just sufficient water to enable the particles to slightly adhere when a handful is grasped, instead of falling away from each other.

If the earth when prepared is so wet as to be adhesive, and the mass feels like a lump of putty when grasped, spread the whole thinly in a dry place and leave it there, turning it occasionally, until the excess of water has evaporated and the soil is in the right condition. It is better to wait a week for this than to use the soil in a pasty uncongential state, which no roots will enter.

For all kinds of soft-wooded plants, such as Fuchsias, Geraniums, Chrysanthemums, with others of that texture of growth, a compost of from one half to two-thirds of loam, and the remaining portion leaf-mould, or cocoanut-fibre refuse, and peat, if readily obtainable, and a tenth part of the entire bulk of sand, will be suitable.

The pots to be used must be perfectly clean and dry, have half an inch of drainage placed in them, this covered with a thin layer of dry manure; then place in the soil, just enough to raise the top of the roots within an inch of the rim of the pot, and no higher.

In adding the remainder of the soil place in a little at a time, pressing it down from the bottom upwards as firm as the old soil placed with the roots in the pot. This identity of firmness of the old soil and the new is one of those matters so small and so simple, that experts in gardening appear to assume that everybody is aware of its import. But this is not so. How can the inexperienced know if they are not told? Yet this is one of the main points to remember in the repotting of plants.

The treatment of older plants will be alluded to, but in the meantime, remove every decayed leaf from plants in greenhouses, destroy every insect, and pour water copiously into every pot in which the soil is at all dry, and the plants will make free and healthy progress.

PLANTS IN FRAMES.

Many plants that are not sufficiently hardy to be exposed to the weather, yet not so tender as to need the protection of a greenhouse, are wintered in cold frames. Auriculas, Carnations, Pentstemons, Hollyhocks, Violas, Chrysanthemums, with various plants that are employed in carpet-bedding during the summer, are preserved in the manner indicated.

At this period of the year all the air possible must be afforded those plants in favourable weather by propping up the lights on wet, yet mild days, and drawing them off entirely for some hours when the weather is warm and dry.

All decaying portions must be promptly removed from the plants, and water must be given to those in which the soil in the pots is at all dry. It is a safe practice, however, to pour it on the soil only, not sprinkling the foliage at this early season, when the nights, if not the days, are cold; but in warm weather in summer an artificial shower all over the plants is very beneficial.

AURICULAS.

These charming Alpine gems now require special attention. The choice varieties are grown and flowered in four and a half inch pots. The plants have now fairly started into growth and will very shortly produce their flower trusses, their beautiful blooms expanding in April.

With the object of having the flower-stems as strong, the blooms as large, and the colours as bright as possible, a little of the old soil, an inch or so, is removed from the tops of the pots, and fresh rich compost added, such as loam and manure, decayed almost to mould, with a little sharp sand, the whole well mixed together with the hand.

If the soil in the pots is dry apply water freely before the top-dressing is added. This should be pressed down pretty firmly and close round the stems of the plants. In a day or two water must be given, after which the soil must be kept constantly moist; new roots will then issue and take possession of the fresh soil, and the growth of the plants will be sturdy and vigorous.

The plants grow and flower admirably in frames, and although they sustain no injury from even severe frost in winter when the soil is dry and the plants resting, yet in spring, when they are growing and the roots are kept moist, frost must be excluded by covering the glass with mats, or it will be very detrimental to the fresh green leaves and advancing flower-stems.

Insects are usually troublesome now—small green aphides. Immediately they are seen they should be brushed off with a feather, or dusted with snuff or tobacco-powder.

Auriculas are pattern plants for small gardens, as so many can be accommodated in a very small space, while they succeed well in and near towns. It is questionable if there are any plants that afford so much beauty in so little room as these; and some of the hardier sorts are admirably adapted for outside window-sills. They can be raised from seed, and particulars for raising them will be given at the proper time.

PLANTS IN ROOMS.

Much more water will now be needed by plants of all kinds growing in windows, than was necessary during the shorter days of winter. Those that are growing freely, whatever they are, and especially if the pots are crowded with roots, must be watered as often and as freely as is required for keeping the earth in the pots moist, from the top to the bottom. Not an insect must be allowed to remain on the leaves or stems, or the plants will soon be infested, and then, no matter how good the soil may be, and how correct the treatment in other respects, the plants cannot flourish.

Odds and Ends.

THE industrious London correspondent of one of the Edinburgh newspapers computes that Mr. Barry Sullivan, during the course of his dramatic career, has committed 17,000 murders, and has been killed in battle, slain in a duel, poisoned, or been fatally stabbed, 9,000 times. Mr. Henry Irving's record is not quite so full of blood, but our great tragedian has taken 15,000 lives, and on 7,000 occasions has been done to death in the full glare of the footlights. Mrs. Bancroft has been foully betrayed or abducted 3,200 times. Mr. Henry Neville has 3,100 times been ruined by the treachery of his friends. Miss Ada Cavendish has been betrayed, deserted, or abducted 5,600 times, and is still suffering similar misfortunes. Mr. Charles Warner has 2,000 times been killed by ardent liquors, and has nearly as often perished by accidents on sea and land. Mrs. Kendal has been 2,000 times deserted or betrayed, and has besides been otherwise basely treated 1,100 times. Mr. Kendal has 900 times fallen dead suddenly; and Mr. John Clayton—to his honour be it spoken—has nobly befriended 1,800 miserable and deserted women, and has subsequently married about half of them. As for Mr. Charles Wyndham, he has been divorced from 2,800 wives, and is now in America, where he is continuing his disgraceful and heartless conduct to crowded houses.

THE proprietor of a menagerie issued a placard offering one hundred pounds to anyone who would enter the cage of the lion. Towards the end of the performance a peasant walked up to the lion-tamer and said: "Sir, I have come to earn the one hundred pounds." General horror. The lion-tamer replied with a derisive sneer: "So you want to go into the lion's cage?" "Aye, sure," said the peasant. "Come on, then! There, I will open the trap-door for you, and you can step in." "Well, yes," answered the honest countryman, turning to the audience with a broad grin on his face, "I am going in, but the beast will have to come out first; you know the paper only says: 'Any one going into the cage shall have a hundred pounds.'"

MOORE has omitted one of the most touching and heart-stirring anecdotes connected with the funeral of Sheridan. The noble and select company had assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to departed genius, and the coffin was about to be placed in the hearse, when an elegantly-dressed personage, who pretended to be distantly related to the deceased, entered the chamber of death. At his urgent entreaties to view the face of his friend, the coffin lid was unscrewed, when, to the horror and surprise of the bystanders, he pulled out a warrant and arrested the body! Mr. Canning and Lord Sidmouth went into an adjoining room and paid the debt, which, it is said, amounted to five hundred pounds.

THE first book auction in England of which we have any record is of a date as far back as 1676, when the library of Dr. Seaman was brought to the hammer. Prefixed to the catalogue there is an address, which thus commences: "Reader, it hath not been usual here in England to make sale of books by way of auction, or who will give most for them; but it having been practised in other countries to the advantage of both buyers and sellers, it was therefore conceived (for the encouragement of learning), to publish the sale of these books in this manner of way."

A WELL-MEANING but intemperate divine, whose furious denunciations of the shortcomings of his flock justly laid him open to the commentary passed on Charles Fox, that though he knew how to hit the right nail on the head, he generally hit it till he split his work, was once impelled to ask one of his congregation what he thought of his philippics. "Sir," said his friend, "I think that good advice is like brandy-and-water—a capital thing in its way, but nobody likes to swallow it scalding hot."

PRACTICAL Hygiene is the latest study in the Burmese Court. King Theebaw has been so impressed by reading a "Sanitary Primer" that he has had the Mandalay Palace turned topey-turvy, and the royal habitation looks exactly like a British matron's house during a "Spring clean." Dens that have not been disturbed by a broom for years—perhaps a generation—are being turned inside out, and the health officer is abroad everywhere.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS painted the portrait of Mrs. Sheridan in the character of Saint Cecilia, which gave occasion to the happy compliment paid to the singer by Haydn. "What have you done?" said he to Sir Joshua; "you have made her listening to the angels, whereas you should have represented the angels as listening to her."

AN old bachelor recently was introduced to a beautiful widow of the same name as himself. The introduction was in this wise: "Mr. Evans, permit me to introduce you to Mrs. Evans." "Mrs. Evans!" exclaimed the spirited bachelor; "the very lady I have been in search of for the last forty years."

ON arriving at Calais on her way to make the grand tour, an English lady was surprised and somewhat indignant at being termed, for the first time in her life, "a foreigner." "You mistake, madame," said she to the libeller, with some pique; "it is you who are foreigners. We are English."

OUR well-doing in behalf of our fellow-men ought not to be left altogether to the impulse of occasion as it may arise. There should be habitual, careful, and frequent planning for it. Such planning is needful to keep us in a right temper, and to make us watchful of opportunities as they may occur.

UNTIL every good man is brave we must expect to find many good women timid—too timid even to believe in the correctness of their own best promptings, when these would place them in a minority.

UNDER Mr. Leitch's instruction, Queen Victoria attained to great proficiency in painting. On the occasion of one of his visits, Mr. Leitch saw a drawing of a subject behind Buckingham Palace, which Her Majesty had done entirely herself, and which Mr. Leitch described as "admirably done." He liked it so much that he obtained leave to take it away, in order to have it properly mounted. It was lying in his studio for this purpose, when Stanfield called, and, observing the drawing, he asked by whom it was painted. Mr. Leitch said it was by a pupil of his. "Oh, nonsense," Stanfield said. "Yes," said Mr. Leitch, "and it is by a lady." Stanfield looked at it again, and said: "Well, she paints too well for an amateur. She will be soon entering the ranks of professional artists."

WHEN visiting an old acquaintance—a farmer—at a time when albums were all the rage, a well-known wit was handed by the daughter a superannuated account-book, ruled for pounds, shillings, and pence, in which he was requested to write something pretty for her, with which request he complied in the following manner:

BEETHOVEN had incurred the displeasure of a petty German sovereign, whose territory was infinitely less than were his dynastic pretensions. Notice was served on him to quit the States of His Serene Highness within twenty-four hours. Beethoven wrote in reply: "Prince, if your highness will take the trouble to ascend to your balcony, you will see me cross the frontier in five minutes."

A PROMINENT lawyer contributes this as a new one. Clerk: "Prisoner at the bar, are you guilty or not guilty?" Prisoner: "Not guilty." Judge: "Who is your counsel?" Prisoner: "I have none; I am unable to employ a lawyer." Judge: "Mr. R., I appoint you to defend this man." Prisoner (after looking at the lawyer): "Well, then, I plead guilty."

"WHEN I left London six years ago, that mournful failure had already been out four or five seasons, and made dead sets of most of the rich fellows in society. Looks as though she'd take anything now." "Which one is that?" "The floppy specimen behind you. Do you know her?" "Yes. We are to be married next month."

"MY hearers," began the lecturer, "I trust—" Before he could proceed farther a Babel of voices shouted: "We'll trade with you, mister; we'll trade with you. Never you fear for that." The ignorant citizens thought he was going to open a shop in the town, and that he had risen to announce the fact.

THE attachment of some French ladies to their lapdogs amounts, in some instances, to infatuation. An ill-tempered lapdog having bitten a piece out of a male visitor's leg, his mistress thus expressed her compassion: "Poor dear little creature! I hope it will not make him sick!"

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTIONS.

E. J. B. wants to know where she can find the quotation, "Secure the shadow ere the substance fade."

H. D. will be glad to know who wrote the poem commencing "The wind before it woos the harp."

M. D. R. wishes to know where he can find the phrase, "Take heart of grace."

OCTAVE wants to know the meaning of the phrase, "Putting your eyes upon sticks," and its probable derivation.

ANSWERS.

AMERICAN.—The works of Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes can be procured through Messrs. Sampson Low, Fleet Street, and those of Washington Irving through any bookseller. "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" is the best known work of the first-named author, and the "Sketch Book" one of the most popular of the latter.

AMICUS.—1. See answer to "Brush," HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 145.

2. Legible, but too heavy, words too far apart, and generally stiff.

A YOUNG MAN FROM THE COUNTRY.—1. No doubt you are right in thinking that more things go to the making or marring of "domestic bliss" than the breaking of glass and crockery. Yet constant destruction of one's favourite sets are very trying to the temper, and you may remember that Pope gave it as one of the crowning graces of a lady, showing that he considered patience under such provocation unusual, that she is "Mistress of herself though China fall." You will find that not only does the use of "Toughened Glass" prevent many an angry word and contention as to whether the cat is or is not answerable for all breakages, but that it effects a real saving of money. It is a fact that toughened glass is unbreakable by any ordinary usage. We lately saw a practical joke, which is a case in point, played upon the master of a house whose wife had just invested in a complete set of toughened glass. The maid having had a private rehearsal, entered the room with a large tray full of tumblers and water-bottles; these she suddenly jerked in the air, and then let fall on the floor with a tremendous crash and clatter. Great indeed was the astonishment of our friend on finding, instead of a heap of broken glass, every article intact. He is now a firm believer in the "Domestic Bliss" theory. 2. We cannot tell you of any substitute for wine in cookery. There is nothing that we know of which will give the same character or flavour to a dish as sherry or claret; at the same time excellent dishes can be made without wine, only they are, as the French say, "autre chose." To make a variety in savoury dishes, vinegar and spices, as well as such sauces as Yorkshire Relish, or Brand's, can be used. We question very much, however, if anything is gained by omitting the small quantity of wine required for flavour, or if anything else which can be used instead of it, is equally wholesome.

C. A. C.—A correspondent, "Molly," has kindly sent instructions for Grecian netting, and offers a small specimen of the work if you wish for it. Please send a stamped envelope addressed to the Editor, when the instructions will be forwarded to you.

COUNTRY COZ.—1. Any oilman in a large way of business will supply you, or ironmonger—Messrs. Dean, London Bridge, for instance. 2. It is difficult to remove the stain of paraffin from a carpet. You might try Frockter and Forth's (High Street, Cheltenham) carpet-soap. 3. "Murphy's Games of Chess" (Bell), 5s. "Staunton's Chess Players' Handbook" (Bell), 5s. 4. Do you mean the blades? If so, emery powder will restore them; if the handles, you can do nothing, and had better send them to an ivory-turner.

E. H.—Please see answer respecting shoulder cape to "Spencer," in our issue of last week.

ENQUIRER.—We will answer your question respecting the poem, "February 3rd, 1852," as soon as we can obtain the information.

EXCLUSOR.—From practical experience we can strongly recommend "The Trypograph" (Zuccato's Patent) as an excellent copying machine. By writing with a stylus on a sheet of Trypographic Paper, placed over a finely corrugated metallic plate, a number of minute perforations are produced in the lines traced by the stylus. The perforated sheet, or stencil, is then placed in the printing apparatus, and fixed by means of bars. A sheet of the paper to be printed upon is placed underneath the stencil; a small quantity of printing colour is pressed into the perforations by means of a scraper or squeezer, and a fac-simile of the perforated writing is produced on the paper below. The operation may be repeated thousands of times. The Trypograph paper is prepared so that every stroke made upon it by the stylus is clearly distinguishable. In writing, the stylus is held in the manner of an ordinary pencil. A machine which would answer your purpose can be had for a guinea and a half. The dépôt is at 15, Charterhouse Street, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

HETTY R.—A tendency to candy is one of the most common faults of home-made marmalade. It generally is due to over-boiling, or to the use of too much sugar. The following is a recipe which has been well tried:

Take the peel off the lemons and boil it until tender, then cut it into fine shreds; squeeze the juice from the lemons, which wash in a little cold water, in order to get all the goodness; measure all the liquid, and to each pint allow three-quarters of a pound of loaf-sugar; boil this until it becomes a thick syrup, when put in the shred peel, and continue boiling until, on trying the marmalade, it will set. Pour into pots whilst hot.

H. L. B.—Yes. The story belongs also to the opera of "Tannhäuser."

IENA.—We are much obliged to the correspondents who have kindly sent copies of Bishop Heber's poem entitled "Sympathy":

A knight and a lady once met in a grove,
While each was in quest of a fugitive love;
A river ran mournfully murmuring by,
And they wept in its waters for sympathy.

"Oh never was knight such a sorrow that bore,"
"Oh never was maid so deserted before;"
From life and its woes let us instantly fly,
And jump in together for company.

They searched for an eddy that suited the deed,
But here was a bramble, and there was a weed;
"How tiresome it is!" said the fair with a sigh,
So they sat down to rest them in company.

They gazed at each other, the maid and the knight;
How fair was her form, and how goodly his height!
"One mournful embrace," sobbed the youth, "ere we die!"
So, kissing and crying, kept company.

"Oh had I but loved such an angel as you!"
"Oh had but my swain been a quarter as true!"
"To miss such perfection how blinded was I!"
Sure now they were excellent company!

At length spoke the lass, 'twixt a smile and a tear:
"The weather is cold for a watery bier;
When summer returns we may easily die;
Till then let us sorrow in company."

J. W.—"Iena," to whom we are much obliged, sends a copy of the "Convict's Escape," by Re Henry. It is too long for publication in our columns, therefore please forward us an envelope, stamped and addressed.

MISS M. M.—The Puzzles are discontinued. The monthly part will, therefore, answer your purpose if you prefer it to the weekly number.

MOLLY.—1. Many thanks. 2. The Christmas Number was published as advertised. 3. The Hon. Catharine Caroline Cavendish, youngest daughter of William, third Lord Chesham.

SARAH.—1. Yes. The basket should be first lined with moss. 2. Cleanse with Hudson's Extract of Soap, afterwards scour with fine sand. 3. Bath-brick powdered is the best thing. 4. It is generally recommended, and in any case can do no harm.

S. L.—We are sorry that we cannot obtain information about local tennis-clubs admitting ladies.

SUFFERER.—We have heard that the "Lairitz Pinewood Fabrics" give much relief in rheumatic and gouty affections. At any rate you could try them, and we should be glad to hear the result.

W. McW.—We find that a second edition of "T Leaves," containing "My First and Last Appearance on Any Stage," by Edward F. Turner, has been just published by Smith, Elder, and Co., price 3s. 6d.

YOUNG GOVERNESS.—1. The best book we know of for your purpose is No. 4 "Hughes's Science Readers," edited by A. Newsholme, M.D., which traverses the sciences of Botany and Physiology, stating, as simply as is consistent with accuracy, their main facts and principles. The little book is profusely illustrated, and as it is intended as a reading-book for elementary scholars in Standards VI. and VII., the matter is given as untechnically as possible. The published price is 1s. 6d. 2. You must take a few lessons, and afterwards books will help you.

A Pair of Ball Shoes.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"THEN you will not relent, Maude?" said George Uniacke.

"No, George. A woman is privileged to change her mind as often as she pleases," answered Maude Hardinge, impatiently turning away from her lover towards a merry group at a little distance from them on the Promenade, as if in haste to conclude the matter there and then; but he was not to be put off with such an answer.

"A woman may have a right to change her mind, Maude," he said gravely, "but she should keep her promises. You promised my dear old grandmother to come over with Harry the next time he brought the 'Arethusa' to Douglas, and now you refuse."

"What of that? Harry is only my brother. I am not bound to use ceremony with him, surely?"

"You wilfully misunderstand me, Maude. I dare say it doesn't so much matter to Harry, but it does matter to my grandmother that she should be disappointed, and—slighted by your refusal to let her see her only grandson's betrothed wife."

"I don't suppose she will care much," said Maude, pouting and holding up her full, round chin saucily; "she might have come over to see me if she was so anxious about it."

"Maude, Maude, you are determined to be contrary, or you would not talk so. Could you expect an old lady of eighty-nine to cross the Irish Sea in order to—to—"

"To view a girl of seventeen! Dear me! we're miles off each other, your grandmother and I, George. No, I don't expect it; and I don't see why she should expect me to cross the Irish Sea to be viewed. Captain Herries told Harry only the last voyage he made in the 'Arethusa' that the passage to the Isle of Man was the one he disliked most, especially in a yacht. But I see, George," she added, laughing, "you want to get rid of me, that you may marry your darling Alice."

"You will make me angry, Maude. How can you talk such nonsense? Alice is the same to me as a sister. Cousin Alice has lived with my grandmother ever since the death of her parents. I love her dearly; but you know better than to be jealous of poor blind Alice, Maude. It is not generous or kind."

"Just as generous and kind," retorted Maude, "as it is of you to tax me with flirting with Lord Silvermere and Tom Ushant. It is just the same thing."

"No, it is not, Maude. There is no truth in your pretended jealousy of Alice; but you know best whether I have any right to be jealous of Lord Silvermere and Ushant."

"Yes, of course I know all about it, and shall keep my knowledge to myself. I tell you what, George: I am not going to submit to a species of slavery—that I mayn't do this or that, and mustn't speak to anybody but with your gracious permission."

"I never wished to deny you the right to do exactly as you pleased, Maude. Your promise to come to Douglas to-day was of your own free will."

"Yes, I know; and now I refuse of my own free will. Have you forgotten that there is to be a ball to-night? I wouldn't give up that ball at The Queen's for all I could see. I have promised any number of partners to dance with them; and, you know," she said, turning her bonny bright eyes saucily upon him, "you don't like me to break my promise."

"No, I don't, Maude. But what matters the mere dancing at a ball compared with the disappointment and slight to my grandmother? She is so anxious, darling," he added, coming close to her, with an earnest entreaty in his voice, "to see my bride, my beautiful Maude. Change your mind, my darling. Remember how old and feeble she is, and I can honestly give her no good excuse for your non-appearance. Maude, suppose I can persuade Harry to postpone his visit to Douglas for a day—till after this ball—will you promise to come then?"

"No, I won't," cried Maude petulantly, the momentary softness evoked by his tenderness dying away in her anger at his persistence, and the reason she chose to assign to it: "That you may come to the ball, and watch me, I suppose; be an eye-witness of my flirtations with dear old Silvermere and jolly Tom Ushant—eh?"

"Oh, Maude! how can you belie your real nature with this affected love of flattery and tomfoolery? I don't believe you care for all these silly girls and frivolous men."

"I don't think it is at all polite of you, George, to talk of my special friends in such a way; and as to belying my real nature, I haven't any reality about me—girls never have. They are sham from one end to the other. I dare say I don't the least know what I like best. Probably I should be much happier boxed up with my Lady Glanville in Borth Castle than 'tripping the light fantastic' here. Not a doubt of it, George; it is so dull here, and so lively there. Alice's account of her serenely quiet happy days are amazingly attractive to a girl of my tame disposition; and if even I could forego the delight—the supreme happiness, I might call it—of wearing the loveliest dress and the prettiest pair of little shoes in the room to-night, I don't think I could stand the blue-moulding at Borth. No, it wouldn't do, George. Good-bye; I hope you'll enjoy the passage. Give my love to your dear and aged grandmother; tell her I didn't feel inclined to be trotted out this time. Perhaps next time Harry goes to Douglas I shall be a better girl, and if not—why, you know you are not obliged to carry on our engagement a moment longer than you like."

"Maude, Maude, there is many a true word spoken in jest," he said sorrowfully.

"Quite so; but I was speaking in downright earnest. I don't think we are a bit suited to each other—our tempers are not compatible, or perhaps they are too much alike, which comes to the same thing. You like your own way, and I like mine. We should always be fighting and squabbling if we were ever foolish enough to marry. Now, old Lord Silvermere would say 'Yes,' and I should say 'No,' and he would give in at once; or Tom Ushant would say, 'Do just what you like best. What pleases you pleases me.' Good-bye, George—"

"Fare thee well, and if for ever,
Still for ever fare thee well."

She kissed her hand to him as she walked briskly away to her companions, and he heard her merry laugh so directly upon her parting with him, that for a moment he fancied she was regaling them with a highly-spiced account of their recent interview, and then his heart smote him. No; whatever might be Maude's faults, and, alas! they were many, she was not little-minded or mean. Whatever she might say to him herself, she would not say a word of him to anyone that he might not hear.

He went back to the hotel to prepare for his departure sorrowfully enough.

Maude wasn't coming, he told her brother; she had promised to stay for the ball at The Queen's, and didn't like to change now.

"Excuse me, Uniacke, but you're an arrant donkey to put up with Maude's tantrums as you do. I should have made her go. Ball, indeed! Why she said only yesterday that nothing should induce her to put her foot inside the ball-room if they had it at The Queen's. How you mean to manage her when you are married, I don't know, for you seem quite incapable of it now. I consider you've caught a Tartar, Uniacke, and, though she's my sister, and the loveliest girl I know anywhere, I don't envy you, old fellow—I'd break it off if I were you. What will Lady Glanville say?"

"That's just it, Hardinge—I shouldn't care so much if it were not for my grandmother, but she will be so disappointed—and she's too old now to bear disappointments as we young folk can. I know she was greatly looking forward to Maude's coming—I had made so sure of it, that she will be quite unprepared, and now I am quite afraid of the effect of such a disappointment."

"I pity you, George—from my soul I do. She's a wilful young hussy, and wants a lesson."

"She's a darling, Harry, and I think that I love her the better, being so grave myself, for her merry quips and fanciful ways, though I grant you that 'we cannot call her winds and waters, sighs and tears; they are greater storms and tempests than almanacs can report'—and oh, Harry, she is so beautiful!"

"Ay, Uniacke, I see how it is with you—'His soul is so enfeathered to her love, that she may make, unmake, do what she list.' You are 'shot through the ear with a love-song; the very pin of your heart cleft with the blind bow-boy's butt-shaft.' She's beautiful, I own it, but, as far as I am concerned, 'kindness in woman, not their beautiful looks, shall win my love.'"

"When do you sail, Harry? Have I time to make one more effort to turn Maude from her wilfulness?"

"Not you, George, and, if I know her, it would be useless; I am just going aboard, and we shall have to start at once, or we shall not clear the sand-bank. Morris has been trying to throw cold water on the voyage altogether. He declares there was a haze round the moon last night, and Jupiter dogging her, or some such rubbish; but he has a share in the hotel, and, of course, it is in his interest to keep us here for the ball."

The "Arethusa" lay alongside the pier, about a mile from the shore, gently rising and falling on the waters. The wind was happily rising a little, or, as Harry Hardinge declared, "they would scarcely have managed the start without steam."

"We are only waiting for you, George," he shouted, as his friend sprang back on to the iron steps, and bounded up them on to the pier itself.

"All right, I shall not be a minute—just a moment's grace." He had seen Maude looking down at them from above—after all, then, she did care, and had come to see the last of them. "What a whimsical darling it is," he said to himself; and then, as he grasped her hands delightedly: "This is kind, Maude, to let me have a last glimpse of your dear face, or—have you indeed relented, and are you coming after all?"

"Not I, George—I only wanted to have a look at the 'Arethusa'—and at Harry. He never bade me good-bye."

"He quite expected you were coming, Maude, until I told him, a while ago, that you had changed your mind."

Harry's powerful voice was heard, calling lustily on George to hurry.

"I must go, Maude. May I have one kiss before we part? No one knows, darling, when we may meet again, or if we shall meet again. There is always a certain amount of risk in these cranky little craft."

"You had better not let Harry hear you call his lady-love a 'cranky craft,' George—and thank you for wishing me to share the 'certain amount of risk.' Perhaps I shall be safer dancing with Lord Silvermere and Tom Ushant."

She did not give the required permission, and walked purposely into full view of the yacht's company.

"You refuse me everything, Maude," said George Uniacke. "Farewell, my bonny bride. Heaven bless and keep you till we meet again!"

"Repenting, I vow," exclaimed Harry, when Maude with a sudden impulse, as the boat sailed clear, drew out her handkerchief, and waved it above her head.

"I don't know, Harry. I feel as if we were all going to be shipwrecked and drowned," replied his friend. "I am almost thankful Maude is not here."

Harry growled something in reply that was inaudible, and blind Miss Uniacke, who, with her aunt, was sitting near, said gently:

"Harry doesn't wish to hear any more evil prognostications, George. Mr. Morris and Captain Herries have been to take a solemn leave of him just before you came down. They both say there will be foul weather before we get to Douglas."

"They are a couple of croakers," said Harry testily. "The wind has freshened just nicely for us, and so they choose to think a storm is brewing."

"Morris and Herries are both old salts," said George Uniacke; "and if they think there will be a storm, depend upon it there will be one. I am all the more glad that Maude didn't come; but," he added to himself, as he looked vainly through his glass to catch a glimpse of her white dress, "I wish she had kissed me."

CHAPTER II.

WHEN Mrs. Strangways, with whom Maude was staying, entered the ball-room, extemporised in the Winter Gardens, a large glass building of the promenade-conservatory species, beautifully adorned with tropical plants, and ablaze with gorgeous flowers and gaslight, her party was at once reinforced by all Maude's promised partners, foremost in whose ranks were Lord Silvermere and Tom Ushant.

"I hope, Miss Hardinge," said the old nobleman, who had come to the town on purpose to find him a "wife, his braw house to keep," and thought that lovely Maude Hardinge would make a suitable and stately Lady Silvermere; "I hope that you approve the exchange from the stuffy rooms at The Queen's to this spacious and elegant crystal palace. I assure you it was no easy matter to persuade the authorities to allow of its perversion. They have only permitted such an innovation once before. I had to use all my influence."

"I am sorry you have had so much trouble, Lord Silvermere," said Maude, with only a semitone of pleasure in her rather languid voice. "I dare say the room at The Queen's would have done very well."

"Done very well, Miss Hardinge?" he asked, hurt at her want of appreciation of his gallantry and devotion to her service; "I thought I heard you say that nothing would induce you to attend the ball if they held it there? That was why I determined it should be elsewhere."

"Oh, really, Lord Silvermere," said Maude, "I often say things I don't mean; I am sorry—"

"Now, don't say that, Miss Hardinge—pray don't. I hope you don't mean that—I hope you are very glad, and that you are prepared to enjoy the evening. Don't forget—"

"Don't forget, Miss Hardinge," interrupted Tom Ushant, leaning forward, and putting his handsome young face close to the old beau's, who instinctively drew back to avoid the opportunity for comparisons which he felt might be odious, at any rate to him; "don't forget that you promised me the first waltz." He laid a stress on the word, knowing well that poor Lord Silvermere would not venture to tread the giddy maze—waltzing was beyond him, and only in the more sober-going dances could he beg for Maude's hand.

"I haven't forgotten, Mr. Ushant," she answered calmly, "but I don't think I mean to dance to-night."

"Not dance, Miss Hardinge?" echoed all her promised partners in amazed and disconcerted chorus.

"Not dance, Maude?" said her chaperon; "why, dear? What's the matter?"

"Oh, nothing—nothing at all, only I don't feel inclined, I'm sick of dancing—I've done nothing but dance ever since I came to this place."

"You sick of dancing, Miss Hardinge!" exclaimed Tom Ushant. "You make my hair stand on end—you, the very Terpsichore of Terpsichores! There must be something else. You don't look ill—you look—you look," said the young man, letting his admiration shine boldly out of his bright eyes—"you look too charming even to sit out one dance, much less not dance at all. Pray think of my forlorn destitution, if for this coming waltz, upon which I had set my heart, I am left minus my partner, and such a partner too—the queen of the ball!" He said this in a lower tone, but old Lord Silvermere jealously put his best ear forward.

"You never can mean seriously to carry out such a cruel intention, Miss Hardinge," he petitioned; and Mrs. Strangways interposed in an aside, wondering greatly at this new freak of her whimsical young guest's:

"My dear, you really must not sit out the whole evening—every one will be talking of it, and you such an inveterate dancer too. Ah, I see how it is—you are regretting, after all, that you did not go with Harry—I see."

Maude bridled up immediately, and, without a word of reply, she turned to Lord Silvermere and Tom Ushant with a merry smile, which was a little overdone, Tom, who had begun to understand her moods, thought; he saw that all was not right with her this evening.

"Of course I never meant it," she said; "on the contrary, I mean to dance every dance—dance till the gunpowder runs out at the heels of my blue shoes." She put out the said little blue shoes, and gazed at them comically for a few seconds, then, jumping up briskly, she put her hand on Tom Ushant's shoulder.

"Now, Mr. Ushant, they are just beginning that lovely 'Silver Rhine.' Let us dance waltzes while we may, for time is fast a-flying." Don't let's lose a demisemiquaver of your favourite. I shall be ready for your quadrille next, Lord Silvermere," she laughed, waving her hand as she whirled off with her handsome partner.

Tom Ushant was the best dancer in the room, and Maude and he made a suitable couple. Their first dance was by no means their last. Maude was not unwilling to forget the more clumsy partners to whom she had promised dances, and to make mistakes which gave him more and them less. As she would use no programme, refusing to have any names written on the little one that hung with her fan at her waist, it was easy to say, "I can't remember; I have forgotten."

One dance followed another till late in the evening, when, after an energetic polka with a young officer in the same regiment as Major Uniacke, Maude gladly agreed to rest a little while, whilst her partner foraged for refreshment.

"I'll go into the side wing, and sit there till you come," she said; "they won't find me out there, and I shall have a little peace."

Lieutenant Morton laughed, and departed, and Maude sat fanning herself under the shelter of some large ferns that screened her from the general observation.

As she sat there, two gentlemen came into the wing, and stopped in front of her hiding-place.

"Are you going down?" asked one of the other in an eager voice.

"Yes! I thought so. I should just like to make sure," replied the other, "though it is doubtful whether I could keep my legs in such a gale. I went out just now, after what I heard, and was almost blown away; and the wind's getting higher every minute."

"And you really think it may be the 'Arethusa'?" Well, I warned young Hardinge that there was dirty weather before them; but he wouldn't be warned."

"I told him the same; but he had made up his mind to go, and go he would. If it is the 'Arethusa,' Morris, there isn't the ghost of a chance for them; they're right on the sand-bank. The lifeboat has twice tried to reach them and failed. I'm afraid there's but a poor hope for them all. Of the whole lot, as far as I know, not one of them can swim but George Uniacke, and that poor blind girl and her old aunt are on board. I think I'll go down and see what is being done."

Maude tried to speak, to ask them to stop and tell her all she so wanted to know; but her voice made no audible sound, and they were gone before she could make them aware of her presence. She stood up, and pressed her hands to her forehead. Was it really true? And she had been dancing so wildly as not even to hear the rising tempest without. She looked around, and seeing a glass-door looking out on to the outer gardens, she attempted to open it, that she might judge of the weather for herself; but the wind, which she could hear in spite of the noise of the music and dancing, beat furiously against her, and closed the door violently in her face.

"You mustn't venture to open any door or window to-night, Miss Hardinge," said her partner, hurrying to her, with ice in one hand and jelly in the other. "The wind is simply awful; away from the music you can hear it. If it were once to get inside, it would lift the roof of our ball-room clean off our heads in no time. Which will you have—shiver or shake? Whichever you don't take, I will, and we will sit down here and enjoy a little quiet." He walked to a seat close by, but Maude scarcely heard what he said.

"I can't sit down," she answered abruptly; "and I don't want anything to eat. I just want to ask a question of the woman in the cloak-room. Don't wait for me;" and she was off before the astonished young man could put down his two plates.

Dashing into the cloak-room, Maude searched desperately for a slip of paper. There was none, but as she searched, her fan fell to the ground, and seeing upon it her programme, she snatched it, and wrote on it: "I hear that the 'Arethusa' is on the sand-bank, and all in her likely to perish. I am going down to the shore. Don't trouble about me. I shall be all right."

She laid her fan with the card on the counter, and asked for her cloak.

"When Mrs. Strangways comes, give her that," she said, and hurried out. Not until she was fairly outside the covered way from the Winter Gardens did she realise the risk and difficulty of the object she had in view.

"Shall I call a fly, miss?" enquired the porter at the outer gate. "I'm afraid there's none within call neither, it's so early—but I'll see, if you wish it."

His voice scarcely reached her, although she stood close to him, and both he and she had to hold on by the iron palisade to prevent their being blown down the street by the violence of the wind. As he spoke, a fly drove up, and Maude hurried into it.

"To the Promenade," she said as the porter put his head in to ask for directions. "And as near to the beach as he can get."

The man drove off, but was obliged to lash his horse furiously to induce it to face the blast that swept down the street directly against them.

It was but a few minutes' drive, and the man came to the door.

"This is as high as I durst go, miss, to the water." He evidently did not expect her to alight—indeed, he had great difficulty in keeping his footing as he waited. "The horse won't stand, miss," he continued. "Where shall I take 'e to?"

"Nowhere," said Maud; "but just tell me, for I can't see, the right way, and the nearest, to get down to the sands."

"Sands, miss!" exclaimed the man in astonishment. "Why, for sure—you're never going down—"

"Never mind," said Maude; "here is your fare. Just say if I am near any of the openings off the Promenade."

"I've drove you close up to one of 'em," he replied. "Take hold of me, miss; horse is quiet. I'll just put you right for it. But bless my heart alive, why you've but shoes on! Well, if ever—"

Maude till that moment had forgotten her ball-dress and her delicate shoes. The "loveliest dress and the prettiest little shoes," as she had told George Uniacke.

The thought of his probable fate darted through her like a knife.

Had he not asked her if he could persuade Harry to postpone his trip, would she consent to go, and she had said "No." It was her fault, then, that they were in peril of death at that moment, for Harry might have consented. It was too late to go back now to change either her dress or her shoes. She groped her way, after the man left her, with infinite difficulty down the paved descent from the Promenade to the sands, and, as she clung with all her strength, during a mighty gust, to the low wall, she heard a heavy step coming down behind her, and saw dimly a stout figure, which she hoped might be Captain Herries.

At any rate, she must run the risk, whether or no, for she felt that alone she could get no farther.

"Is that you, Captain Herries?" she called out.

"Hallo! Who's there? Did any one call?" shouted the sturdy seaman, himself obliged to cling in his turn and close beside her, as the blast swept powerfully past them.

"Oh, I am glad, Captain Herries. I want to go down to the beach to see if it's true that—that—"

"Why, bless my soul, it's Miss Hardinge! Ah, I know what you're after. I know—I know! That's what I've come about myself. Here, Miss Maude, take my arm. You must hold on tight. I'm pretty firm on my legs for my age, but I've never experienced a wind like this before, either afloat or ashore—never. We must go cautiously. Down below it will be more sheltered."

He was shouting in her ear with all his might, but his voice only sounded like a hoarse whisper.

He guided her by slow degrees down the incline, holding on occasionally as the furious blast threatened to tear them asunder, and whirl them away before it; but at length they arrived below in safety, and, sheltered a little by the wall, the captain stopped to ask how she dared to venture out on such an awful night.

"I heard what you and Mr. Morris were talking about—the 'Arethusa,'" she answered.

"Ay, ay, my dear; but it is only supposition, after all. The lifeboat has never been near enough to tell for certain who or what she is. It is only guesswork, after all. So don't you fret yourself for nothing. It may be the 'Arethusa,' but, if it be she, her passengers and crew may not be aboard her."

"But could they get off, Captain Herries? How could any boat live in such a sea? Oh, don't speak so just to comfort me. I had rather be told the truth. It was all my fault that Harry sailed to-day."

"To-day! Yesterday, you mean. My dear young lady, it's past one o'clock now, if not past two, and Harry has had ample time to get to Douglas, or—to put in elsewhere. Why should we anticipate evil?"

"You seemed to think it was the 'Arethusa,'" said Maude, "when you were speaking to Mr. Morris."

"I didn't know you were listening, little pitcher," said the sailor, trying to speak cheerily. "But come along. You're a brave girl to venture down here on such a night, and alone too; though you can't do any good, and had much better be snug in bed, or dancing in the ball-room, safe and warm—though, by Jupiter!" he exclaimed, as a sudden thought struck him, "I don't think they're very safe in a crystal palace like those Winter Gardens. Let the wind once get inside, and the roof would be lifted clean off. It has been done once before, with a far less wind than this, and made terrible havoc. Bless my soul! I never thought of that. I hope Morris will see to it. We'll try to cross to where the lifeboat starts from. She should be back by now. Hold on tight, or we shall both be blown over."

Maude clung desperately to her sturdy companion, as they slipped and slid through the slushy mud and wet sandy soil of the flat shore.

"The boat must have come in," shouted the captain in her ear, as before them, across the sands, they saw a number of lights flitting about in the darkness. "There's quite a crowd down there by the water. We must look out for waves, Miss Maude, for the tide will not be long before it turns, if it hasn't turned already. Hey, my man, has the lifeboat come in?" he asked, as for a few minutes there was a sudden lull, and two men passed them coming from the group collected on the shore. "What's going on? Have they found out what she is?"

"No, sir, no," replied one of them. "The boat's been out twice, but she can't work her way to them, and, poor chaps, they're like to go to pieces on that bank."

"What do they make her out to be?" enquired the captain eagerly.

"A smallish craft, sir, as near as they can tell, but 'twere getting dark afore they started first time, and they can't get nigh enough to hail her."

"More than likely, sir," chimed in his companion, "it's the yacht, the 'Arethusa,' as set sail for Douglas this very arternoon. You said yourself, sir, as they'd no right to run into the dirty weather afore 'em."

"Lord forbid! Lord forbid!" said the captain, and that Maude might hear no more evil surmisings, he hurried on with her.

"Won't they try again, Captain Herries?" she said anxiously; "they won't leave them there without another effort to save them. Oh, won't you try to persuade the lifeboat men to go again?"

"My dear, they're all picked men—they're all brave fellows—they won't let anyone perish for want of trying to save them; but there are times when even a lifeboat can do nothing. I have a strong hope that it may not be the 'Arethusa,' after all, though it's bad enough for any poor ship to be in such a strait, and Heaven help them, whoever they are! Your brother is not wanting in seamanship, and his master wouldn't let him keep on for Douglas if he saw danger ahead. I hope the 'Arethusa' is riding safely in port somewhere, and all on board her in no risk of such a death as yonder poor ship's crew."

"Oh, Captain Herries!" cried Maude, "you are only trying to comfort me, I know you are; you don't want to frighten me; but oh, do try and persuade them to go again, and see if they cannot save them."

"I will—I will, Miss Hardinge, but they will do their best without any persuasion on my part. Hold on, my dear, there's another gust. Dear me! what a night it is. In all my experience I never felt such a wind."

They had now reached the group of people collected on the strand, but, not as the captain thought, round the lifeboat and her baffled crew.

"What's astir, my mates?" asked the captain, pushing his way amongst them.

"A body washed ashore," replied his nearest neighbour.

Captain Herries felt Maude clutch his arm.

"From yon wreck, no doubt," said another; "but they've only just been able to grapple him, and don't know for certain if he's dead or alive. Well, Jim, which is it?" he thundered out, amid the howling of the wind and the roaring of the still distant waves, though on so flat a shore the flux and reflux of the tide was a matter of but a few moments either way. The men were the more anxious to use all despatch.

"He'll never speak no more," answered Jim with another shout; "he wor a gentleman, too, to go by his dress. Is the cart a-coming, Bill? He maybe has vatables—a gold watch an' so forth, on him, and we mustn't meddle wi' him till the bobby comes."

Maude slipped her hand out of the captain's arm, and pressed frantically amongst the men, till she reached the spot where the drowned man lay on the sand.

The water was already rolling in around him, lashed to greater speed by the fury of the tempest. There was only the dim uncertain light of the flickering lanterns, shielded for the most part by the jackets of those who carried them, and these few were gradually diminishing as they were caught by a sudden squall and blown out, but Maude, as it were by instinct, found her way. One man was kneeling by the body, supporting the head on his knee, whilst a second held a lantern by which he was endeavouring to ascertain something more about him.

"Ay, he's dead!" he said, putting the lantern within the shelter of his jacket; "he wor a gentleman, that's certain; he has gotten a gold ring on his finger, and—"

"Oh, let me see him," gasped Maude, pressing forward, "I must see him." Her voice was drowned in the renewal of the tempest, which swept in a considerable volume of water, and drove the crowd a few paces back, and floated the body inshore a little farther.

Tidal waves were not unknown on this coast, and the sailors knew well the danger they ran in the darkness, with the tide flowing in on such a night.

"Eh, stars alive, there's a woman!" they cried out, as when the blast had passed them they again brought out their lanterns. "Come away, come away; you'll be carried off for certain if you don't look out."

Captain Herries had by this time made out where his young companion was, and caught her by the arm.

"You must not go there," he cried; "such sights are not fit for a young girl. Be persuaded, my dear; be persuaded. You couldn't see if you did."

"I must, Captain Herries," said Maude decidedly. "It was my fault they went. I know I have been the cause of his death. I must see—let me go."

She broke from him, and knelt down in the wet sand, now fairly covered by the incoming tide, by the side of the helpless body. But it was too dark to see the face, and she turned in the dimness beseechingly to the men around her.

"Let me have a light to see his face. Pray let me have a light!"

"No, no," interposed the captain, who had heard all that had been said, and feared for the consequences should Maude discover, or fancy that she had discovered, the dead man to be her betrothed or her brother. "Come away, my dear young lady; it can't be the one you think. Pray—pray come away."

He tried to lift her from her kneeling posture, but Maude clung desperately to her determination. She grasped the dead man's arm, and lifted the clammy hand, feeling its icy cold fingers.

"Oh, lend me a light!" she entreated. "I can feel his ring. Oh, it is—it is George! I knew it, I knew it! Captain Herries, if you have any pity for me, let me know the truth, make them lend me a light. I shall go mad if I cannot see his face. Fishermen," she almost shrieked in her agony, "lend me a light. Won't you lend me a light?"

The men needed no further entreaty as soon as the word passed from one to another that the drowned man was the "young lady's sweetheart—poor thing!" all who had them were eager to lend their lanterns.

They crowded round her, first, as was but natural, trying to catch a glimpse of her pale face, and tangled blown-about hair and dress; then with the ready sympathy always evoked in generous hearts by real sorrow and suffering, they held the lanterns, a little ashamed of their curiosity concerning herself, close to the dead man's face.

Maude had miscalculated her own nerve. She bent down eagerly as the light came, looking first at the poor dead hand she held in hers. The ring was a signet-ring, and a sharp pang darted through her as she remembered how George Uniacke's signet-ring had hurt her hand as he had wrung it when they parted. Ah, when they parted, never to meet again—and she would not kiss him!

A groan burst unwillingly from her, and again the captain tried to prevent any further inspection.

"I have looked, my dear. I assure you it is useless; you couldn't tell, it is so mauled. Trust me, Maude; indeed—indeed, it is neither George Uniacke nor your brother."

But Maude was obstinate. She leaned over the dead man's face, her own looking white and scared in the lurid glare of the lanterns.

"Poor lass—poor lass! God pity thee if 'tis thy Joe," burst from one of the men as they watched her strained eyes fixed on the corpse with an agony of dreadful expectation. And after one long glance, Maude threw her hands above her head, and with a smothered cry, fell by his side, unconscious.

"Here comes the dead-cart; make way, lads, make way!" shouted the men. "There's no time to lose, the water's coming in fast. Pick up the poor chap, and let's get him in."

The cart drove up, and several men got down, bringing a fresh supply of lanterns.

"Is there a young lady here?" shouted a strong voice through the darkness. "Does anyone know if there's a lady here?"

Before Captain Herries, who had lifted Maude from the wet strand, could answer, a chorus of voices replied to the question.

"Aye, aye, sir, there's a lady, sure enough; she's just made out the dead man to be her sweetheart, and it's well-nigh killed her too, poor lass. Gentleman's gotten her there—close beside the body."

The owner of the voice pressed forward in the direction pointed out to him. He held up his lantern to Captain Herries' face.

"You here, Captain Herries! And—what? Is this Maude? Surely not Maude?"

"It is, indeed," cried the captain, and explained in few words what had brought her into such a state. "But is it really you, George Uniacke, or your ghost? I daren't make too sure that that poor fellow was not really either you or Harry Hardinge. Heaven be thanked that you are safe! Of course you all put into port elsewhere before the gale."

"Yes," began George Uniacke; "not exactly before it began, but in time to—"

He was cut short by a shout from the cart.

"Now then, sir, if the lady's going in the cart, you had better be quick, for the tide's coming in, and we have to get under the arch—another five minutes, and the horse will have to swim."

Maude was lifted into the cart, where George Uniacke and the captain supported her on one seat, whilst the corpse of the drowned man occupied the floor, and thus they reached the town in safety.

Maude was taken into the nearest shop, and means used for her restoration to consciousness.

"Her best medicine will be a sight of you," said Captain Herries to George Uniacke. "Never fear, stay by her, and as soon as she comes round let her know that you are all safe; that'll set her mind at rest at once, and turn her thoughts the right way."

Suddenly a boy darted into the room.

"Oh, father," he cried, breathless with excitement and haste, "the wind has blown the roof off the Winter Gardens, and there was a ball there, and all the people are crushed to death."

"For Heaven's sake don't let Miss Hardinge hear that, Uniacke!" exclaimed the captain. "Her aunt was there, she told me so. She was dancing till the moment she heard me say that a boat was stranded, and that it might be the 'Arethusa.' Look, she has her dancing-shoes on still, and her dress. I can't believe the tale, it is too horrible."

He seized the excited boy by the collar, and sternly bade him repeat his tale. But the child was frightened by his roughness, and burst out crying.

"I'm sure it's true," was all he could say.

And Captain Herries hurried out.

"It's only a step from this," he cried as he ran off. "I'll find out the truth for myself."

In a few minutes he returned.

"I met Morris coming away," he explained, as soon as his breathlessness and agitation would permit him to speak. "It is not all true, but still bad enough. Morris found that the hurricane was increasing tremendously. He felt the whole place rocking, and was afraid that if once the wind got inside the roof would go. He warned the dancers, and most of them left, only a few of the idiotic fools there always are insisted on dancing still, in spite of warning, aye, even after the band had left, and they danced to their deaths—as far as I can make out, not one of them has escaped. It was not more than ten minutes after Morris left that the catastrophe came, the roof was lifted up bodily, and fell in with an awful crash."

"What a mercy that Mrs. Strangways discovered Maude's absence so soon!" said Uniacke. "I went to her first, you know, as soon as I got here. She told me that she missed her directly after she left. Maude's note was given her in the cloak-room, and she returned home at once."

"It is, indeed," replied the captain. "I have brought a cab with me to take Miss Hardinge home in. There is great difficulty in getting one at all, for they are busy taking people to see the wreck at the Gardens, even at this time of day, and of course there are relatives anxious to ascertain the fate of those who are still missing. Heaven be thanked," said the old man, lifting his hat, "that so many were rescued in time, and that you and all your party are safe! Ah, Miss Maudie," he added, as the young girl opened her eyes and sat up, "I told you George and Harry were safe, but you would have it the poor dead man was your Joe. Look up and see who's ready to prove that he's alive, as well as your brother. Eh, lassie, little lassie, it doesn't do to make too sure, and even our sight may deceive us, and especially on such a night as this. But I'll be off now. She's all right, and when you've put these dry wraps round her she'll be ready to drive home. Mrs. Strangways will be anxious to see her safe back. Good-night, Miss Maudie. You and I'll not forget our midnight adventure on the sands in a hurry."

"Oh, George!" exclaimed Maude next morning, when, after a few hours' sleep, restored, refreshed, and greatly sobered by all she had gone through, and all she had since heard of the disastrous hurricane, she met her betrothed, "can you forgive me? I shall never forgive myself. You might all have been drowned through my wilfulness and wickedness. I shudder still when I think that I was dancing whilst you—"

"Were safe in port, dearest. It was not your fault, dear Maude, and I can only be too thankful that you were so determined, and did not let me persuade you to go with us."

"You didn't care to have me share your fate, George." There was a trace of the old love of contrariety in this little speech that made George smile.

"Decidedly not, dearest. My one thought, as we wondered if we should ever make the port, was, 'How thankful I am that Maude is not here!'"

"You didn't want me," sighed Maude, a little piqued. "You could wish to die alone, without me; but no wonder after the cruel way I treated you. Well, it was just what I deserved. How could I be so cruel—so silly?"

"Ah, Maudie," said George, tenderly folding her in his arms, "don't think I didn't care, dear one. I kept saying to myself all the time, as first we thought we should win the port, and then again as all hope seemed lost, 'Heaven be thanked that Maude did not come, but I wish she had kissed me!' and see, Maude, I have bribed Selina to give me these." He drew out a pair of mud-bespattered, dabbled satin shoes, that once had been a pale blue. "Don't laugh at me—nay, darling—but rather that than cry. I shall treasure them all my life long. To think how you went down in them to the shore, and braved all the peril and misery of that night for my sake! If ever I doubted your love for me, Maude, these little shoes, the prettiest pair in the room last night, have proved what a true, brave heart yours is. It is I who must crave forgiveness, darling, for I did think you were cold to me."

The above facts are all separately true. They all occurred within a few days of each other, and are fiction only so far as they are grouped together with one set of actors.

Spring.

SWEET child-empress of the year,
Wake the earth from winter sleep;
Come, and in thy bosom bear
Buds new-born, a mingled heap,
Blossoms of the future strewing,
Each new hope, and each new wooing,
All good deeds that shall be doing.

Zephyrus thy courier is
Who a-tiptoe ever goes,
Underneath his flying feet,
Bloom the pretty pale primrose,
Royal lilies high aspiring,
Violets in shade retiring,
Daffodils the sun-desiring.

Hark! a fairy harp he brings,
Sweeps his hand across the strings,
And the forest answer makes
To the melody he wakes.
And the pine, with odorous sigh,
Waveth, as he passeth by,
His tall branches tremblingly.

Zephyr, still your wild harp play;
April, hasten on to May,
Till in all her rosy charms,
Spring is clasped in Summer's arms.
Till our heart chords with the singing
Of the skylark, heavenward springing,
Are in softest concord ringing.

Book IV.

CHAPTER IV. THE PRICE OF SILENCE.

THE exigencies of polite society don't often allow for the intrusion of anything so vulgar and inconvenient as "feelings."

Ivor Grant, hastily donning a dress-coat, and Beryl Marsden, trembling under the hurried hands of her maid, were somewhat unlike the two grief-stricken and passionate people who had suddenly faced the tragic side of life, and now looked out upon its desolation.

Appearances must be kept up. There was no time for debate or discussion. Ivor knew he must face all these people, dine, talk, act as if nothing had happened—try, if possible, to screen Beryl from the consequences of his own folly—throw dust in the eyes of that hateful spy whose evil smile had been to him the first revelation of what the world would say and think, did it guess his secret or hers.

He went down to dinner, entering the room late, and taking his seat far from Beryl Marsden, yet not so far but that his eyes caught sight of the fair, sad face, and noted, with a sudden flush of eager delight, the spray of white heath and maidenhair at her breast.

The Count Savona was opposite to him, and caught the look and the flush, and smiled cynically.

"What transparent fools men in love are," he thought to himself. "How well they arranged to meet here, those two! I scarcely expected to find them so quickly. It is not a bad idea to get both mother and son into my toils, though he's a more difficult subject to manage. No fool at bottom, whatever he looks. Curse his impudence and conceit!"

Tongues were running riot; laughter and discussion were at their height. Beryl's unusual silence and Ivor Grant's unusual gaiety met with no comment. Everyone was talking of the tableaux and the costumes, and the various difficulties arising from them.

It was not until after the ladies had left, and the men drawn closer round the table, that Ivor Grant managed to get near his host and whisper:

"Cosmo, how did that Italian count get here?"

"Brookes brought him," said Colonel Dunbar in some surprise. "Why, what's the matter with him? Nothing wrong, I hope?"

"Not that I'm aware of," said Ivor Grant, shrugging his shoulders as he leant back again in his chair, "only—I hate him!"

His host looked at him in astonishment.

"You! My dear fellow, I thought you were too lazy and too indifferent to dislike anyone. What's he done?"

"Nothing—that's just it," said Ivor coolly. "But one may see a snake lying curled up at one's feet and shrink back from it with repulsion, not for what it's done, but for what it would do if it had the chance. That's how I feel towards the man."

"You surprise me," said the colonel with a somewhat uneasy glance at the pale, handsome face of the Italian. "Of course I know nothing about him. But he's only going to stay a few days, and Brookes says he's a capital fellow, so clever and accomplished and all that."

"No doubt," said Ivor, draining his glass quickly and setting it down. "To quote Mr. Toots, it's of 'no consequence'; avoidance is easy enough here."

"By the way," said Cosmo Dunbar, who was as essentially open and blundering as he was good-natured, "I'll tell you a good joke. My wife was telling me before dinner that she and Mrs. Marsden had a—bet, was it?—well, something of the sort, about your finding out a nickname she gave you the first time you met. Madge says 'twas at our house. I don't know about that, but women have such deuced memories for details. Well, Madge was crowing over this, for she said, as only she and Beryl knew, you could never find out. But the stupid little puss forgot she'd told me that same night, for she thought the name suited you to a T, and so I just held my tongue and listened to all this, and I thought, 'Oh no, my lady, I'll just open your eyes a bit,' so I said 'I know it too, my dear.' Bless me, you ought to have seen how she looked. 'Now, you dear stupid old Cosmo,' she says, 'you'll never go and let it out,' and of course," he added with a solemn wink at Ivor, "I said, 'On no account.'"

"And what was it?" asked Ivor eagerly.

"Oh no, no; honour among thieves," said the colonel, laughing. "I mustn't tell you, but I'll write it down."

"Done!" said Ivor, quickly producing a pencil and tablet.

"I haven't told you, have I?" said the colonel, chuckling over his own cleverness. "I do like to circumvent women, they're so uncommon sharp, or at least think they are."

He handed the tablet back to Ivor as he spoke, and with the colour rising hot and swift to his brow he read the words written there—"My Lord Conceit."

"Good, wasn't it?" laughed the colonel. "You were a very haw-haw looking sort of individual in those days, don't you know. Had a trick of half closing your eyes and looking at people as if it was too much trouble. She hit you off capitally."

"Yes," said Ivor, putting the tablets back into his pocket, "she read me very correctly."

His heart was sore and pained. He felt a sharp sense of humiliation as he thought of that night, and how he had thrown himself down at her feet in involuntary admiration of the beauty, and brilliance, and charm that he had never found in any woman before. He thought, too, of how she had defied him to find out that name, and how he had laughingly said he would take vengeance on her when he did. But now there was no longer time for jest between them.

In deep and solemn earnest they had to face life as it stood arrayed against them in the tempting, the treachery, the agony and shame of a hopeless passion.

Trying to evolve some order out of the chaos of suffering into which he was plunged, Ivor Grant sat there, deaf to the buzz of tongues and arguments of voices around him.

He knew he must leave her—there was no help, no other way to serve her now; but for a moment, as he thought of the queenly head that had lain on his breast, and the tearful eyes that had so unconsciously betrayed their secret, his heart seemed to grow still with a great dread, and a most bitter remorse.

He loved her so, and yet he must add to her sufferings—he would have counted no sacrifice too great for her happiness, and he had only given her pain.

"To-morrow I will leave her," he said to himself. "Just a few more hours to keep on the mask—to laugh and jest, and be society's puppet, and then it will be all over. I wonder if a man feels as I do when the rope is round his neck, and he looks up at the blue sky for the last—last time!"

There was a stir and bustle at the table. Those who had to take part in the tableaux were impatient to attire themselves in the wonderful and novel costumes whose unfamiliarity would take longer to adjust than the ordinary garb of nineteenth century life.

Ivor Grant was almost the last to leave the table. As he neared the door he found himself beside Count Savona. Instinctively he shrank away. The Italian noted the gesture of repugnance, and half smiled.

"I was about to ask the favour of a word with you," he said. "Will you smoke a cigarette with me in the conservatory, before you make your toilette for the tableaux? I should not ask you, but I have something particular to say."

"Concerning myself?" asked Ivor brusquely.

"Concerning yourself and one other person," said the count—"a lady."

The hot blood rushed to Ivor's face.

"How much does the brute guess?" he thought. "I suppose I had better find out."

"I am at your service for a quarter of an hour," he said aloud. "After that I must dress."

The count only bowed and led the way.

That scene was fresh in the memory of both as they entered the beautiful glass-house, with its mass of tropical verdure. The count lit a cigarette. Ivor coldly declined the one he proffered. They walked slowly up the aisle of flowers and shrubs.

"Well, your business?" said Ivor brusquely.

"You are impatient, my friend. It is as well to see we are quite alone before I commence," said the count, glancing around in a way that made Ivor Grant's blood grow hot as he thought of his own late imprudence. "Eavesdroppers are not conducive to the freedom of a tête-à-tête."

They reached the farthest end of the conservatory. It was quite deserted. Then the count took a low basket-chair, and leaning negligently back in it, poised the cigarette in his fingers and blew a cloud of light smoke from between his lips.

"You gave me fifteen minutes," he said coolly. "Ten will do. Have you ever met Beryl Marsden's husband?"

The insolent familiarity of the words, even more than the insolence of the manner, inspired Ivor Grant with the fiercest longing he had ever known to knock this man down.

"Speak more respectfully of the lady if you wish me to listen to you," he said fiercely. "What right have you to ask such a question?"

"Oh, mere friendly interest in you both," said the count, replacing the cigarette between his lips. "I will accept your reply as a negative. You don't know him. Perhaps it's as well. He is a brute. Not only that, but he is a swindler. He has one virtue, however; he is jealous of his wife, even though he does not profess to be faithful to her. I doubt if her life or yours would be worth an hour's purchase, if this same John Marsden knew of a certain little tender scene in this conservatory some two hours ago."

In all his life Ivor Grant had never felt how keen and cruel a thing humiliation might be, till he faced it now for the sake of the woman he loved better than his life. Yet even while facing and defying it, he knew how powerless he was to shield her name or vindicate her honour.

"You—you wish me to buy your silence, I suppose," he said, with such utter contempt of the man he addressed in his face and voice, that even callous and case-hardened as he was, the count winced beneath it.

"I simply wish to caution you," he said, lowering his eyes that their lurid, evil light might not yet betray his hatred of the man he held at bay. "What do you intend to do—run away with her?"

"You—!"

"Hush!" said the count, raising his hand warningly. "Do not use strong language. We are both men of the world. You do not suppose you can throw dust in my eyes at this time of day, and there's really no reason why you shouldn't—shall I say elope? If she knew what her husband was, her views as to wifely duty might undergo a change. Facts do alter cases, you know, and some good women—"

"Silence!" thundered Ivor, turning on him like a lion in his wrath. "If you dare utter another word of disrespect towards that lady, it will be at your peril."

"I am willing to take the risk," said the count coolly, but he rose from his chair, and tossed the cigarette away. "Duelling's out of fashion, but perhaps you've a fancy for heroics. It might please her, even if her name is compromised by your folly. Come," he added, dropping his voice, "don't let us quarrel. We can do better than that."

They stood and faced each other full of deadly anger and of deadly hate, yet prudence whispered to Ivor Grant that open defiance of this man would only injure instead of serve the woman he wished to protect, and, smothering his anger down, he stood there silent, waiting for the count's next words.

"I know more about Mrs. Marsden than you imagine," he said, after a moment's silence. "She is a very unhappy woman, and her life in India has been one long martyrdom to the caprices and tyrannies of a selfish despot. These embarrassments are due to a cause of which every one in the place—except perhaps his wife—was cognisant. His name is covered with ignominy, and he has retired to a remote district on the hills with a snug fund of his own securing, and a companion about whom the less said the better. I give you the information, and you may verify it very easily. Having done that—"

He paused. His look said all, and more than all, that his words would have implied, and Ivor could only stand there with clenched hands and throbbing pulses, longing to silence sneers and insinuations with one blow on the foul mouth that uttered them, yet withheld from yielding to the impulse by thought of that tearful, idolised face that once again seemed beseeching him to spare her, since he alone in all the world of men and women among which she moved, could she call friend.

"What you say may be true or not," he said at last, his voice only mastered by a strong effort. "It has nothing to do with me. I will not pretend to misunderstand your insinuations. You think I—I love the wife of the man you defame. Perhaps I do; but it is with a love that such men as you can no more understand than the toad beneath its stone can comprehend the light and glory of a world it never sees. Do you fancy," he added with rising passion that flamed and fired his glance until those evil eyes before him sank abashed for once; "do you fancy there is only one way for men to love?—that by robbing a woman of her good name and ruining her in the sight of the world they prove that love? You are mistaken for once. Beryl Marsden as a wife could be nothing to me, even though the man whose name she bears were a deeper blackguard than—yourself. I reverence her too well to lower her in the world's sight, and, perhaps, in my own. To-night, for the first time, I betrayed myself. To-night I leave her. Now, if you can believe truth exists, accept my words, and do your worst."

"You defy me, then? I think you are foolish. Your suffering and hers will be dearly bought, and you might have all the gain."

"Another such word, and I shall take the liberty of throwing you through that glass door," said Ivor coolly. "There is a nice easy drop of ten or fifteen feet before you make acquaintance with the terrace."

"You would regret it if you did," said the count quite as coolly. "I shouldn't advise you to try. Heroics and herculean feats are bad form, you know. I thought you were a sensible man. There was not much sainthood about you once, or 'reverence' for women either. However," and he drew out his watch, "I have said all I need. The fifteen minutes are up. So you are going to part?

Well, in a few years' time I dare say you'll find some one else has run away with her instead of yourself. You'll be sorry then you missed the chance. Meanwhile we'll see what John Marsden thinks of your 'reverence' for his wife."

"Stop!" cried Ivor suddenly; "bad as you are, you can't mean that. You won't threaten a woman for your own black malice? What is your object—money?"

"Yes," answered the count coolly; "I am not quite so disinterested as to give valuable information for nothing."

"I will buy your silence then," said Ivor contemptuously; "not from fear—do not fancy that—but for sake of the trouble and shame it may spare an innocent woman."

"It will cost you dear," said the count with the old evil smile on his thin lips.

"Name it," said Ivor shortly, his scorn of the mean and cowardly creature before him speaking out in every line of his face.

"That will require consideration," said the count tranquilly. "I cannot discuss it with you now. Besides——"

He stopped abruptly. A servant had entered the conservatory, and was looking round as if in search of someone. Catching sight of the two figures he advanced, holding a salver, on which lay a telegraphic message.

"For you, sir," he said to Ivor.

He took it, tore it open, then turned ghastly white.

"Great Heaven!" he muttered. "Dead—so sudden."

"Who is dead?" asked Count Savona eagerly. "Not—not your mother?"

"My mother? No, my uncle. He died this morning."

"Allow me to congratulate you, Sir Ivor Grant," said the mocking voice beside him. To himself the count added: "Twas well I waited; the price to an heir expectant and a baronet are two different things. How Providence favours the prudent!"

CHAPTER V.

I love you so much
That I only can leave you.

SOMEONE else had to take the part of "my lord of Leicester" that night. Ivor ascertained that a train left in an hour's time, and sent for Colonel Dunbar and begged him to make all excuses to his wife for his hurried departure.

No need of false excuses now. Fate had played into his hand again. For a moment he hesitated as to whether he should see Beryl or not, finally resolved that he would, and sent her a pencilled note begging her to come to him for a few moments in the library.

The room was quite deserted. Everyone was dressing, and the county guests had not arrived. Wondering greatly at the message, Beryl, who did not intend to change her simple dinner-dress, left her room and came as he had asked her.

He was pacing up and down the library in terrible agitation. The ghastliness and suffering of his face almost frightened her as she saw it.

He came up and placed the telegram in her hands.

"I leave in half an hour's time," he said.

She read it and her face changed.

"I am so sorry," she faltered. "And—your mother?"

"It will be a great blow to her," said Ivor sadly. "But I cannot speak of that now. I—I sent for you to warn you. That foreign spy saw us in the conservatory, as I feared. He puts the worst construction possible on our interview. Oh, my dear, don't look like that! It cuts me to the heart."

"He has spoken—told you this?" she cried, growing very white.

"For what purpose?"

Ivor was silent for a moment, wondering how much he dared tell her, or how little.

"I—I think he is safe," he said hurriedly; "but it is best not to make an enemy of him, and I thought I would warn you. Oh, Beryl," he added sorrowfully, "I can never forgive myself for bringing all this misery upon you, and I can't even shield you without making things worse."

He looked at her with all his soul in his longing eyes. He had been faithful to a dream so long, had struggled so bravely, and all for this!

"Tell me," he cried, "is there any way I can help you—is there anything I can do?"

She shook her head.

"Nothing; and do not reproach yourself. I am quite as much to blame. And why should we fear this man? We have done no wrong in sight of God or man. We know our weakness, and once knowing it resolved to suffer sooner than to yield. Why," she went on, looking up in his face with her brave, sweet smile, "I would myself tell my husband all that has passed between us, so sure am I that he could not but excuse it."

"Ah, my dear," said Ivor sadly, "you don't know much of men. The very fact of my self-betrayal brands me as a scoundrel in the eyes of others who have only had to look on, while I have had to endure. Oh, it is all so hard! It seems cowardly to run away and leave you to face unknown dangers, and unknown foes; to be alone, and I can't come to you; to suffer, and I can't aid you; to want help, sympathy, counsel, and I daren't give them you. I—I must not even ask you to write!"

"No," she said, turning very pale, and remembering how precious and how welcome had been those letters during her year of absence—how full of thought and kindness, and every trifling detail that might interest or amuse her in her exile from her darlings. "No, that would not do. Our parting must be complete as it is final."

"No, don't say that," he cried passionately. "It is like sending me out to meet my death-blow. Somewhere, somehow—even if the time be very far off—I shall hope to see you again. Think what a hard thing I am doing for you now. I leave you, because my love might harm you, and I would not have the shadow of dishonour fall upon your head. You know that, do you not?" bending and seizing her hands, and looking down into her upraised face with eyes that tears had dimmed.

"Oh yes," she said with a little pitiful sob. "You—you are far too good to me—you have always been."

"I wish I had the right, my dearest," he said tenderly. "For I would work for you, care for you, live for you as I think no man on earth could ever do. But it is not to be," he added with a heavy sigh. "You might judge how I love you if you only knew what it costs me to say—good-bye."

"In all your sorrow now—you can still think of me," she faltered, and involuntarily her hand went up to hide the slow, hot tears of weakness gathering in her eyes.

"I must always think of you," he said simply and earnestly. "I told you I had done so from the first hour we met. I am not a romantic fellow, or one who talks much about his feelings; but I did feel a changed man from that hour, though to you I was only a languid, idle fop, whose character you gauged more accurately than he did yours."

"Not that—oh, never that!" she said, flushing crimson. "I—I was mistaken."

"In 'My Lord Conceit' I hope so, sweet. He has a grain of something better in his heart, though he might never have known it but for you."

"You—you have found that out?" she cried, stepping back and paling and crimsoning alternately as she met his eyes.

"Yes; I told you I should if you defied me. Do you remember the vengeance I vowed? Perhaps had I been what you fancied, I might not care now for what the world would say. I might have even tried to blind your eyes, and teach you how little all other things look in comparison with love—love like mine. But I won't do anything that will bring a blush to your face, because—because I love you. And I will make no foolish vows or promises, because that love is so much deeper than mere empty words. I will only leave you now, without even a kiss on your lips, to make them less innocent for your children's angel touch. You know I meant no wrong, and I know it, for a man can't be strong always, however hard he tries, and I—I tried such a long time, dear. Now, no more tears; I can't bear to add to your unhappiness. If ever you need me, be quite sure you can always trust me, and that I should never misjudge you—never, though the whole world stood arrayed against you. But that I think you know. And now," with a sudden sharp catch of his breath, "I must go. I have run my time as close as I can. Only one word of caution—distrust Count Savona; and, if possible, avoid him. And now——"

There was no need to say it. The two pale, agonised faces looked up at each other as eyes might look in Death's farewell. The blood seemed to flow back to their suffering hearts, and the scorch of burning tears lay on cheek and lash. Her hands lay in his, close clasped in a trembling pressure. He raised them to his lips in silence.

"Heaven bless and guard you!" fell brokenly from him.

Then her hands dropped. She was alone.

For one moment of cold and passive despair she threw herself down on the couch, too wretched for tears, too sad for words, too weak for any movement or any thought. Only a numbing sense of desolation lay heavy upon soul and body, and she wondered dimly how her life would drag itself on, and how much longer that life was to be only a synonym for suffering.

The necessity of keeping up appearances made itself felt at last, and Beryl rose and went to her room and bathed her eyes and had her hair re-arranged, and then, with the weariest heartache she had ever known, took herself to the scene of the evening's festivities.

The tableaux vivants were a brilliant success. Madge Dunbar was radiant with delight, and seemed to have forgotten her momentary displeasure at the substituted Earl of Leicester.

After the tableaux there was a dance, and Beryl Marsden took the opportunity of retiring. She felt too wearied and wretched to play her part any longer, and only longed for solitude.

To think clearly was impossible. She was too unnerved and unstrung for that. At first she thought she would write to her husband, and beg him to let her go back to India.

The more distasteful duty looked, the more rigidly did she steel herself to fulfil it. A bitter disclaim of her own weakness and folly swept over her from time to time, but amidst it all she yet could not find it in her heart to blame Ivor Grant, nor could she think of anything in these past years that had spoilt that loyal friendship, or seemed aught but the outspring of a very generous and unselfish devotion; and a woman who has once known that, and felt its strong and gentle protection round her like an encircling arm, knows too that few things in life are more bitter than its sudden loss.

"If only he had not spoken!" she thought; and yet she knew well that he must have been sorely tried often and often if he had so loved her. There comes a time when human strength fails—when sophisms can no longer blind the eyes, and dull the ears, to sight or knowledge of danger.

That time had come to her as well as to him, taking vengeance on a long blindness. Through all the long dark hours of that night she lay there battling with her misery and her weakness. It was harder to fight now because her life was so empty and so loveless. All the harder because no childish touch could draw the arrow of suffering from her breast, or soothe her tortured heart with words of love.

As the dawn was breaking she closed her eyes in very weariness, and fell asleep. In her sleep she dreamt that she saw little Jack dancing over the cowslip meadows towards her, and that as she stretched her arms towards him he seemed to fade away, and kneeling at her feet was Ivor Grant.

She woke sobbing as if her heart would break.

The next mail took out a letter from her to John Marsden, entreating permission to go out to India once more.

A Family Feud.

(A STORY IN FIVE WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER IV.

It is said by the gentlemen who are at the greatest pains to analyse and weigh and label human emotions, that a lover's chief bliss precedes the formal engagement. In a sense this is frequently true. The first kiss of dawn on eastern hills is purer and more entrancingly beautiful than is the full blaze of day over the richest landscape; and the rosy, hushed thrill of opening passion—when doubt and subtle assurance are linked like twin shadows—has a charm peculiarly its own. But there are exceptions. Not seldom the lover's uncertainty has an element of pain in it, drawn from untoward surroundings and circumstances. He understands the power of the environment and knows that a cruel fate may in a moment blast his most promising schemes. It is as though the Alpine watcher were harassed by the continual fear that his early vision of dawn might after all prove a delusion and black night come back.

It had been largely thus with Harry Bradwell and Agnes Fenton, and each was happier and better content now that the ordeal of the avowal was over and that each was committed to a paramount interest in the other's future and fortunes. Confident in their love they could face a possible storm with courage and calmness. Doubt had lost its chief terrors and was incapable of inflicting a tithe of the sufferings of an earlier day. Harry, especially, felt relieved now that for good or ill he had taken a decisive step.

It was settled that for the present the engagement should be kept a secret. No idea of immediate marriage was entertained by either Harry or Agnes, and it could serve no useful purpose to vex Sir Raymond with the knowledge of his son's contumacy until it was necessary to do so.

At first Harry had found some little difficulty in persuading Agnes to take this view of the affair. To her frank, transparent habits of thought concealment in such a matter savoured of shame.

"I do not like clandestine contracts of any kind, Harry," she said, "and it seems to me that between parent and child there ought to be the fullest confidence."

"I perfectly agree with you in that as in other things," Harry replied, "but the proverb is a wise one which says that circumstances alter cases. They do—and alter them very materially. My father will object; that, I fear, is a foregone conclusion. And the principal grounds of his objection will be those to which you yourself have referred—grounds which as I hold are foolish, and even morally wrong. You would not carry your obedience so far as to wish me to yield to such a prejudice and embrace misery for life?"

"Certainly I should not wish you to be unhappy, if yielding would really make you so," answered the maiden with a demure smile.

"You know that such would be the result," and the young man emphasised his assurance with a caress. "Then why should I invite his condemnation before the disclosure is absolutely necessary?" Harry continued. "And there is another consideration which inclines me to a policy of silence. My father has met with some serious losses recently, I believe, and is already considerably worried. The time is very inopportune for an addition to his cares."

"I am sorry for him, and for you."

"So you see, dearest, it will be charity as well as wise policy to keep him in the dark for a while."

"Perhaps he will be the more angry afterwards. Ought I not for his sake, and in spite of your protestations, to have said 'No'? I am a selfish girl."

"You are the sweetest, best, most generous——"

A playful hand stopped the torrent of Harry's adjectives. When it was removed he proceeded with his arguments for delay as though Agnes were not already convinced.

"Then, as far as my own prospects apart from the Hunstone estate are concerned, I shall be much better prepared for a struggle in a year or two's time. I intend to work and master my profession, so that if the worse comes to the worst I shall yet be able to maintain a wife in reasonable comfort. I am heartily glad now that I have entered the law, dry-as-dust as its routine is."

"I hope, Harry, you will not allow me to be in any degree a drag on your studies."

"As if your smile were not my greatest encouragement!"

Mrs. Holby was delighted beyond measure at the turn events had taken. She had watched every phase of the little drama with an excitement and eager interest only second to those of the actors themselves. With feminine quickness of apprehension she had observed the approach, and progress, and passage of the crisis. She needed no telling of what had in this instance been the issue of the old-new question. She read her niece's happiness in the soft love-light that gleamed in Agnes's eyes, in the added sweetness of Agnes's smile, in the quivering music of Agnes's voice. She rejoiced with her adopted daughter as sincerely as any mother could have done. She lived over again the ecstasies of her own long buried past in the contemplation of this simple, innocent joy of Agnes Fenton.

Fortunately for the girl's peace and shrinking modesty she refrained from many questions. One, as she conceived, of some importance, she asked.

"And you did not inform your Harry that you had a tie already with his Brakeshire home?" she said.

"But indeed I did, aunt," Agnes answered.

The old lady started so severely that her gold-rimmed eye-glasses came with a clatter upon the tea-table, and narrowly escaped fracture on the edge of an antique sugar-basin.

"You did! And was he not disturbed?"

"I think he was troubled a little. But he would willingly heal that breach in his family if he could. Harry regrets his father's pride and severity. He explained everything to me after a time—how the quarrel began, and how it has been continued."

"Ah, just so! Ah!" and with a gradually subsiding volley of interjections, the widow suffered the subject to drop. But she did not cease to mentally revolve and debate it.

These were halcyon days at No. 90, Frome Road. Harry Bradwell was free to come and go when he pleased, and if he had been a frequent visitor before his betrothal, he was still more so now. And then there were the picture-galleries, and a score of other spring and summer exhibitions to escort Agnes to. Moreover, occasionally trips full of a strange and subtle delight were projected to places of interest within easy reach. Windsor, with its stately home of Royalty, Rochester, with its ruins and its memories, St. Albans, with its venerable abbey, were all explored; to say nothing of the pleasant villages down the valley of the Thames and elsewhere, which the great city is year by year drawing more closely into its whirlpool of commerce and fashion.

On one of these unpretending excursions an incident occurred which, all unwittingly to the joyous young couple, was destined to have a very real and potent influence on each of their lives in the near future.

They had been wandering into Surrey, and, returning, were hurrying out of Victoria Station, when the attention of both was simultaneously attracted by a group gathered around a gesticulating cabman. It was a typical London crowd. The artisan and the professional idler, the dandy and the man of many markets, the fine lady and the outcast of the gin-shop, the grey-haired cynic, who mistakenly believed himself a gentleman, and the irrepressible gamin, who would have betted on his chance of becoming one, were all represented. And in the centre of the throng stood the actors in the show—the one brazen, indignant, resenting injury; his fare meek, and terror-stricken, and in tears.

"What is wrong? Has there been an accident?" Agnes asked.

"No, no; only a cabman's dispute about distance, I expect," Harry answered, his shrewder glance taking in the salient features of the situation at once. As he spoke, the wrathful driver's invective broke out afresh and revealed the truth.

"And you reckon as I'm to be cheated by a story of that sort!" he shouted; "but you've mistook your man, missie. Lost your purse, or left it behind, indeed! Who'd believe ye? Nobody here believes ye, I'll be bound. You're a nice baggage, you are!" and a string of opprobrious epithets seemed likely to follow; but, perhaps, desiring to retain the sympathy of those to whom he was playing, he refrained, and concluded with a muttered oath instead.

The terrified expression on the victim's face awoke Agnes Fenton's pity. It seemed impossible to regard that shrinking, trembling agony as the mask of trickery and fraud. The girl whom the cabman was so bitterly upbraiding was, in appearance, younger even than Agnes's self. She was dressed with an amusing affectation of a gentility which she evidently did not possess. She was round and supple of figure, with dark, lustrous features which, under happier conditions, might have passed as beautiful. In her agitation she spoke with a disregard of the aspirate and of the rules of grammar which betrayed her humble rearing, and perhaps encouraged her antagonist in his abuse.

"I can't 'elp it a bit, and I tell you so. There isn't any money in my pocket at all. I wish—I wish some was in it," she said, with a pathetic little gasp in the pauses of her sentences.

"You're a liar!" said the cabman.

"Harry, Harry, let me lend her the money; it can't be much," Agnes whispered impulsively, and her hand was on the cabman's arm at the same instant.

"What is your claim?" she asked.

"Two shillin's, miss," the man replied with sulky surprise.

With a lightning flash of intuition the tortured defaulter divined what was taking place. She clasped her hands in a wild passionate appeal, and addressed herself to Agnes.

"Indeed I will make it good, if you will give me your name and where I can find you," she said. "I thought I had my purse until—until just now, and I must walk back, for I cannot go where I was going without money. Oh, do help me, miss."

Agnes was forestalled. With a private shrugging of the shoulders at what he thought the quixotic generosity of his fiancée, Harry had paid the florin, and the girl was free. Her thanks were profuse, and, Agnes believed, gushed from an overflowing heart. Harry was not so sanguine.

"Wait and see if the girl keeps her word and repays you," he said. "I have given her a written address, so that she will have no excuse for forgetfulness."

"I am sure she will repay the trifling loan," answered Agnes, almost with indignation in her accent; "if I ever know truth and honesty when I see them they were stamped upon that young woman's face, and I would rather have lost the silver twice over than have seen her suffer longer before that unfeeling crowd."

Harry Bradwell wisely declined a conflict with this enthusiasm.

"You have acted as a Good Samaritan, a friend in need, once more," he said, smiling; "anyhow you deserve praise for that. But what did your protégée say was her name?"

"Miriam Huke."

"An unusual one, and with quite an Israelitish ring about it."

With this the conversation turned into a fresh and more conventional channel.

CHAPTER V.

THE next day Agnes Fenton had her triumph. Miriam Huke proved the accuracy of her befriender's judgment by returning the price of her deliverance without delay. With the stamps she sent also a very modest, grateful letter.

"I shall always remember your kindness," she said. "I cannot tell you how much I thank you."

"So you see my charity was not misplaced, after all," Agnes remarked demurely to her lover. "You supposed that when we left Victoria Station last evening I had in all probability seen and heard the last of Miss Huke. Come, make a candid confession of your want of faith—was it not so?"

Harry laughed a little ruefully, yet with an undertone of genuine pleasure at the evidence of the stranger's honesty.

"Yes, I will own that I did," he replied. "I apologise to the absent young lady for my unfounded suspicions, which I'll guarantee were shared, more or less, by every other onlooker."

"That may be; 'tis a cold heartless world; and such a fact does not excuse you, Harry."

"Decidedly not. I will surrender at discretion; but I invariably am at your mercy, you know; and this is one more proof of what a lucky fellow I am—to win a wife as amiable as she is lovely, and as sagacious as she is forgiving."

Agnes threatened to beat a retreat.

"Fie on such barefaced flatteries!" she said. "Your compliments, sir, are worse than your subterfuges."

"They are sincere," he answered.

But Harry Bradwell had news to convey as well as Agnes, and regarded in some lights, his was less pleasant. It was now advanced summer, and Harry could not longer defer his return to Hunstone Manor. Sir Raymond had written an imperative demand for an interview, at least; and Harry feared that unless he obeyed, the attraction which kept him so perseveringly in the hot and dusty town might become the subject of awkward and premature investigations. To obviate the slightest danger, he proposed to leave for Brakeshire on the morrow, and he might be absent from Agnes's side for several months.

"But one thing is certain—we can trust each other, whatever the material distance between us," he said. "Yes, and in the face of all conceivable eventualities."

"I hope so," the maiden replied.

"I will send you all my news if you will let me," Harry went on. "It will be prosaic enough, no doubt."

"Not in my opinion," Agnes murmured sweetly.

"And we must arrange some plan by which I can receive letters in return—without running the risk of scrutiny, I mean. But this will not be difficult."

The girl was silent. Though convinced of the present advisability of concealment, she was but partially reconciled to it. Reserve was foreign to her ingenuous nature.

Harry observed the slight shadow on her face, and correctly interpreted its cause.

"I can understand that you think me a sad coward, and I know that I am very unworthy of your love," he said; "but I am trying to scheme for the best."

"I believe it. I do not reproach you in the smallest degree," Agnes answered quickly. "You should neither say nor imagine such things."

"At any rate, I will pledge my word that at the very earliest practicable opportunity my father shall be informed of everything, whether he approves or disapproves, whether he turns me out of his house or consents to receive you into it."

"And with that promise I will be satisfied, Harry."

The young man fully meant to carry out his engagement, and half looked to find his father in a sufficiently softened mood to render the confession safe in the first hours of reunion; but his hopes were doomed to a long disappointment.

If the flight of the months had brought joy and placid contentment to Harry Bradwell, the exact reverse was the case with Sir Raymond. On entering the familiar library to pay his tribute of respect and affection in the very instant of arrival, Harry was startled and grieved to see the miserable change that so short a space had wrought in his father's appearance. Haggard unhappiness was stamped upon every line of the baronet's countenance. He was thinner, and stooped more; there were more threads of silver in his beard, and there was a fiercer, more hopeless gloom in his eyes.

"Well, Harry, my boy, so 'tis 'Home, sweet home,' with you once again," he said with a forced gratulation in his voice—a gratulation that sounded as hollow and unreal as might the laughter of a ghost.

"Yes, I am back at Hunstone at last," Harry answered. "Have you been unwell, sir? You did not mention your health very frequently in your letters, I remember."

"Didn't I? Perhaps there was no need. I am well enough, thank you, Harry. Pressure of many cares makes me look a bit worn, I suppose. I want a holiday in Norway, if I could only afford the time and the hard cash."

"I am sorry, sir—" Harry was beginning; but Sir Raymond interrupted him and dexterously changed the subject.

"Your sister and her husband are prospering, and immersed in pleasure and business, I presume?" he said. "I hear but little from them except through you."

He did not explain that a temporary intermission of correspondence had followed an unsuccessful application on his part for a very considerable loan.

"Yes, Dr. Marshbury's practice is steadily increasing, and Bertha and he mix in society a great deal," Harry answered. An unwonted increase of colour on his cheeks testified to his self-consciousness under the enquiry. He was thinking how infrequent a visitor he had been of late at his brother-in-law's residence, and what had been the reason. It was fortunate that Sir Raymond had no clue to the facts.

"Ah, it was a first-rate match for Bertha; I hope my son will do as well one of these days."

This was a perilous topic, and it was Harry's turn now to sheer off from the rocks.

"Nothing of very special importance has happened in Hunstone, I suppose, sir?" he said huskily. "Our village is not like London. There, the city is being transformed, and in one shape or another re-made, every day almost. Here, things run in a groove, and I have sometimes thought that one might imagine a Brakeshire hamlet to be the identical spot where Rip Van Winkle dropped off into his century's nap."

"And yet he found a difference or two when he awoke, if I've read the narrative aright. Still, I will admit that Hunstone is pretty sedate and steady-going. We are not revolutionists as a rule—in the northern half of the county, anyhow."

"On the contrary, sir—Conservatives to a man."

"No, no; I only wish that we were—in a social sense at least. But there are scoundrels who never care what amount of ignominy they bring on the name they own. And the strange thing is that by some incomprehensible freak fortune seems to favour them. They grow rich while their betters go downhill. To me it is a crying shame."

Sir Raymond's voice rose, and his speech became more of a monologue than an address to his son. It was with a pang and a sinking spirit that the young man listened to this outburst. It was a proof that the family feud was as far from amicable adjustment as ever, that, if anything, the baronet was even more embittered in his anger against the farmer-brother.

And it was so. Sir Raymond felt a sense of keen personal injury in his brother's prosperity as contrasted with his own repeated losses and threatened embarrassments. He hated Francis the more for every good bargain of which he chanced to hear in the Sellworth, or other neighbouring market; as his words showed, he had even begun to extend his quarrel to circumstances, and to criticise with severity those particular arrangements of the universe which made such events possible.

Harry took refuge in a truism, not appearing to place any very definite construction on his father's remarks.

"Probably there will always be mystery in human affairs, sir," he said; "I fancy that not to worry about life's ups and downs is much the wisest policy."

But his attempt to throw oil on the troubled billows was futile; the tempest only raged the higher.

"You do not know of what you are speaking," thundered Sir Raymond. "It isn't merely that he—Mr. Francis Bradwell—succeeds too often where I fail, but it is the constant disgrace of a kinship which cannot be denied, if it may be ignored; it is that which annoys me almost past endurance. Every clodhopper in the countryside is acquainted with my family history, and sees the blot upon the escutcheon. It is easy for you to talk, you never have appeared to comprehend sufficiently the wrong which has been done. Captain Middleford, now, thinks precisely as I do."

The reference to Captain Middleford enabled Harry to pass by the implied censure.

"Is Captain Middleford still here, sir?" he asked.

The baronet was saved the necessity of a reply, for at that moment the door opened and the gentleman in question entered the room.

CHAPTER VI.

DAME FORTUNE, as is exceedingly well known, has her favourites. Upon some she showers the supposed good things of life in lavish abundance. She appears to ransack her treasure-house for gifts of wealth and position, friends and fame, and to be never tired of heaping them upon the lap of those whom with fickle choice she delights to honour; others year by year live under her frown. They are but distant pensioners upon her bounty, and, like poor relations, have to sit at a minor table and to discuss—with not a little grumbling and bickering—inferior dishes. But after all there is more of compensation in her arrangements than the surface seems to show. The millionaire is sometimes a fool, the peer would like a little ready cash, and the lion of the social season longs for one heart to honestly admire and trust him. There are conditions in which even the poor relation would hesitate to exchange seats with his be-jewelled and radiant cousin behind the centre-piece.

It is the contemplation of the character and status of Captain Middleford that has given rise to these reflections. That ornament of Her Majesty's Service was neither rich nor enviably famous. Even his birth was more humble than he chose to admit, and his friends were not usually those who knew him the best. Yet in person and in address, as well as in certain original and weighty qualities of mind, he had the advantage of many contemporaries.

"The captain," as he was familiarly called in Hunstone, was a tall, finely-built man of, perhaps, fifty. He had a dark, weather-beaten face, bronzed by an Indian sun and much travel; bold aquiline features, piercing grey eyes, somewhat shifty in expression if the observer were very exacting; thick, curly, iron-grey locks, and a faultlessly-groomed "imperial."

The captain's tout ensemble was undeniably striking and handsome. And the fascination of his manners and conversation was scarcely second, when he elected to put forth his whole powers, to that of his personal appearance. He had a native talent for impressing strangers with his own individuality, and with a belief in his bona fides on any subject which he might please to take in hand. In addition, he had the air of easy authority which comes insensibly from the habit of command.

On Sir Raymond Bradwell, Captain Middleford had come to exercise a well-nigh magnetic influence, and an influence as malign as it was subtle and all-pervading. The baronet consulted him in everything, and treated his advice as the utterance of a most satisfactory and reliable oracle. Apartments at the manor had long since been placed unreservedly at his disposal, and where the accommodation was so comfortable, and, beyond all things, cheap, it was no wonder that the adventurer was content to firmly establish himself.

In the village he was now regarded in the light of a resident, except by two or three. There were sceptics, and individuals convinced of the abounding depravity of the human heart, in Hunstone as in larger places, and these shrugged their shoulders, and winked at one another, and murmured ambiguous prophecies. They had heard rumours which led them to believe that the captain was inveigling his host into serious financial difficulties, and they gave Sir Raymond credit for shrewdness enough to by-and-by find this out and discard his untrustworthy guide.

One of these wider awake neighbours ventured to bring the matter to Harry's notice before the young man had been home a week. It was Keith, the old Scotch bookseller and postmaster, whose age and acknowledged probity gave him a tacit license to say pretty much as he liked.

"And indeed I'm glad to see ye in Hunstone once again, Master Harry; it looks like old times, that it does," he said, giving his patron's palm a tight, northern grip across the full extent of package-strewn counter. "An' ye're lookin' well, too; I wish I could say the like o' your father—o' Sir Raymond."

"Ah, I'm afraid the years are beginning to tell on him. He's not so young as his son, you must remember, Mr. Keith."

"Tisn't only the years; why, take a glimpse of me else. How should I be?"

"Time doesn't test everybody alike."

"Nay, but it's trouble, Master Harry. It's worry that has driven the deepest furrow across your father's brow, and," sinking his voice to a whisper, "if you want to know the cause, make enquiry of Captain Middleford."

"Of Captain Middleford!" echoed Harry slowly, some faint intangible suspicions of his own returning to him with new force.

"Aye, I've said," answered the excited little tradesman, with a nod of ominous emphasis.

"You are surely not going to leave me in suspense thus," Harry pleaded; "let me know your exact meaning, Mr. Keith, please. I will carefully respect your confidence."

Pressed closely, the bookseller revealed his scanty store of information, and his very considerable supply of awkward interpretations and forebodings.

Harry listened eagerly, and now stood as though lost in thought.

"You'll not mention my name to anybody," Keith added. "I'm too auld to be fashed wi' more than my ain concerns."

"Decidedly I will not," Harry replied. "I am deeply grateful to you, Mr. Keith, for your hints, and shall certainly not repay you by such treachery as that would be."

All the way up the long village-street Harry was revolving this disagreeable intelligence in his mind, and he worked himself by degrees into a state of wrath that would almost have compared with his father's anger against his uncle. Keith's story tallied only too well with numerous trivial incidents which had already forced themselves upon Harry's attention, and with the doubts which his parent's gloom and mysterious reticence had brought to him. The business on which he, Harry, had been summoned so authoritatively to Hunstone at that date mainly concerned the cutting down of some timber, for which operation his consent was necessary. He could understand now for what purpose the money was wanted. He could guess also into whose pockets it would ultimately find its way.

"And Captain Middleford no doubt imagines that the game is entirely in his hands. He shall find out his mistake. I'll check-mate him if there is still a chance," Harry soliloquised. Then the question arose whether it would be advisable to boldly attack the enemy without loss of time. If the intriguer found that suspicions of his true character had penetrated into the manor precincts, it seemed possible that he might at once relieve the house of his presence. Alas! Harry had but a vague idea of the lengths to which Captain Middleford had carried his duplicity, or of the extent to which Sir Raymond's credit was already involved. With a young man's ardour he panted for the struggle, and pitifully miscalculated the odds against him.

As a perverse fate would have it, while this problem was yet undecided, he met the captain face to face, and was startled into the immediate action which, up to that moment, had trembled in the balances.

"Are you engaged for a few minutes, Captain Middleford?" he asked, after a very formal and chilly greeting had passed.

"No, I am quite at your disposal, Mr. Bradwell," the officer answered, curiously scanning Harry's countenance, as if to discover whether the undisguised hostility of his tone was based on anything more than mere feeling.

"Then suppose we turn along the avenue yonder; we shall have the opportunity for a quiet talk under the trees."

"I am perfectly willing."

"It is about my father and yourself that I wish to speak," Harry said; "my father has been speculating very wildly and incautiously of late, as it seems to me, and has lost heavily. I have reason to believe that for this you are largely responsible."

The listener was provokingly calm. He twirled the ends of his grizzled moustache, and met Harry's gaze without flinching.

"Indeed, you must have strange informants," he answered, "and you will permit me to express my surprise that you do not credit your father with the power and will to exercise his own judgment."

"You are continually leading him astray."

"That is a grave accusation, Mr. Bradwell, even despite the compliment implied in your thinking that I could influence Sir Raymond's decisions. But you are the victim of some very peculiar hallucination, and are using language of which you will by-and-by repent."

"Never!"

The captain steadily finished his sentence.

"Hence I will readily forgive you," he said.

Harry's anger burst all bounds. His opponent was adding insult to injury.

"You are a villain!" he replied. "You live by devising schemes to defraud and ruin honest men, and you imagine that in my father you have found another dupe, and one who will repay an extensive operation. But if you do succeed you shall suffer for it—aye, if it is my own hand that wreaks the vengeance."

An ugly expression stole over the captain's countenance. He took a very short and summary way of showing his contempt. With a deep satirical obeisance he left his foe.

"It is open war, then?" Harry murmured, shaking his fist involuntarily after the retreating figure.

The gesture was seen and the words were overheard by an astonished spectator, in whose mind they were soon to stand out in hues of blood, and to bear a terrible interpretation.

(To be continued.—Commenced in No. 149.)

Disenchanted.

You meet my gaze with swift surprise,
That shows the fear you dare not speak;
The ready tears are in your eyes,
The sudden crimson on your cheek.
Too late! it cannot move me now,
Nor lull to rest the wakened mind;
Deceit is stamped on lip and brow;
Love saw it not—but Love is blind.

I thought—vain fool!—that simple trust
Might well an answering trust obtain;
That true and strong affection must
Some future day a guerdon gain;
And when I sued, you whispered "Yes,"
With drooping head and timid air,
And I believed you—who could guess
That heart so false had face so fair?

Well, let it pass—it matters not;
'Tis shame to manhood to be grieved.
And mine is but the common lot,
To love, and trust, and be deceived.
Far better than the chance that rolled
The clouds aside, the mists away,
And showed that what I thought was gold,
Was, after all, but common clay.

By Perugino's City.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

JUST a white sun-scorched road and children playing.

Italy owns many such sun-bleached roads, and as for the children—well, beggary, and rags, and dirt, and the frolic of children may be found on any day, at any moment, by town or village or rural byway.

But amid such surroundings? Scarcely. The place was historic. Lake Trasymene lay shining, silent and placid under the summer sky, fields were richly planted round about the gleaming water, wheat and maize waved green and graceful, as the gentle breeze of the evening came cool and fresh across the lake which lay in a circle—nay, in the soft overlapping, as one might say, of many circles—of hills green and grey which enfolded the peaceful valley, the fields, and the hushed waters. Forests clothed some hills; a monastic town, the white Assisi, shone like a beacon of light, with its long, outstretching, terraced corridor on the spur of its one particular hill, struck by the sunlight and the vague distance into a perfection of outline which seemed to ignore the power and the wear of ages.

What did the ragged playing children know of the mighty clash of Roman and Carthaginian sword and shield? What did the fair summer night reek of the din of war, or of the shrieks and groans of wounded men? What mattered it whether Rome rose or Carthage fell? Did they care any more for the second history which spoke only of peace? for the words of the holy man who would have all men be brothers? whose rapt spirit saw even perceptible brotherhood in birds and flowers, in sun and stars?

If history touched them at all it was in the modern reflex of it which brought strangers from the old world and the new to see the famous pictures of the great Perugino. Did not the coming of these people bring trade to the city—bring stray soldi to children who were wise enough to play in the dusty roads about the places where there was a sight to be seen, or ruin to be shown?

The merchant spirit is the spirit of the age, even a baby can dance for a soldo!

Seven of them there were—seven bits of picturesque raggedy and dirt, but with faces like the faces of the angels the old painters set upon their canvases. Bare feet, brown by nature, but whitened with the white dust of the road; eyes dark, like wells of laughter, and actions which no words can match for emphasis and grace, certainly which no copying can ever reproduce.

A white marble doorway stood flush against the roadway, behind the doorway was a kind of building. Not a house certainly, for it rose barely any distance above the lintel of the doorway, also of windows there were none. Neither did it extend far inwards; there was a mystery about it; why so grand a portal for a building which could own no dwellers? Some Latin words above the closed doorway solved the mystery. It was a tomb, the family burial-place of an ancient race.

Everywhere in Italy one meets these bizarre unions. Before the home of the antique dead strangers of modern fashion, richly-dressed sight-seers from a young nation across the Atlantic, were stepping from a dusty carriage, just one of the public conveyances that modern needs have called into existence, and that ply for hire in the streets of the near-by city of Perugia.

It was a duty to see this tomb. Baedeker told them to go down into the marble chambers, to look at the urns, to wonder. They might when they got home talk of cremation; there are advantages; generations may rest together in one room.

The coachman had seized one of the ragged children.

"Go! Call Pucci. Tell him to bring the key and the tapers quickly."

The child flew.

Then the rest of the children went and looked at the strangers. Presently a girl came sauntering along from her work in the fields. She likewise was barefoot, and her head of brilliant gold, like an aureoled saint, shone uncovered in the evening cool. She wore an old pink cotton skirt, and her loose bodice of faded purple stuff was unfastened at the throat; round her neck she had a string of bright beads, and in her ears were earrings.

All the children clustered about her. Evidently they were telling her to look at the strangers. Suddenly one, a boy with a cropped head and garments decidedly elementary, darted from her, executed an impish dance in the road, and ran to the carriage, crying:

"Un soldo, signore—un soldo!"

"Come back!" called the girl; "come back. You promised me yesterday you would not beg. Where is your word, Tito?"

She had energy, this girl, and she shook the wild Tito.

"Kept true," he answered sturdily. "I have not begged. Do I not dance well? They will give me a soldo for my dance."

"Pah! Your dance! I know where you might get some roses. The signore like roses always."

"In your garden," said one child.

"Over the wall, there? Can I climb that? you think I am a man—two men?" So dashed the impudent Tito.

"You steal from the cavaliere's garden—no, I do not mean that," decided the girl. "Come with me; you may sell what I give you, if you can find any lady to buy."

The girl went on her way with her hoe over her shoulder, Tito and two smaller ones ran after her.

The strangers tried to get the rest to come up to the carriage and talk, but they were like young wild creatures; they could shout a "soldo!" with the lustiest, but to speak to a stranger was an impossibility. They ran away, hid down a turning, darted forth and laughed; they had no fear, they were simply little savages at play.

But old Pucci came along with his big key and his tapers, and the heavy door was opened, and a spacious entrance and descending staircase of marble showed the way to the old tomb.

The strangers entered, and the children clustered within and about the doorway—every day they did the same.

By the time the strangers were back from the silent room below the children were also back with hands full of fresh roses.

"Where did you get them?" asked an American lady quickly.

"From your own garden? Have you a garden?"

An infinity of nods answered, but never a word.

"Nanna gave them," called one of the smallest from a distance.

"Nanna—who is Nanna?"

"The girl who was with them but just now, signora. She has two gardens," the coachman ended with a low laugh.

"Two gardens?"

The man shrugged his shoulders.

"That is so. Has she not Maso's garden as well as her own?"

"She and Maso are going to be married when it is San Giovanni." This was from the boy who had made the impish dance. "Will the signora give a soldo for the roses?"

His face was a picture of laughter and of the beggar's pitifulness striving for mastery.

"Not if you look like that. I don't love beggars! Why, the girl is to be married in less than a week, then—is it so?"

"Signora, yes."

"I wish I had spoken to her."

Surely a bride is no such wonder; but ladies do talk in this impulsive way at times.

"She is very poor—eh?"

Again came the shrug of the shoulders.

"I do not know, signora. She works—she will not work in the fields when she has Maso's soup to make, and his clothes to mend. He is over there at work," and the coachman jerked his head townwards.

"At work—how?"

"On the new house behind the hotel. Does not the signora hear the hammering all day long? It will be a grand house. Maso lays the bricks."

"Oh!"

The matter seemed ended. Every child had a soldo and the ladies got into their carriage. The door was being shut. Old Pucci with his big key stood cap in hand bowing his thanks for the fee in his pocket. All at once he gave a more profound bow, and his look was not to the ladies, but towards another carriage that drove swiftly past. Pompeo the coachman doffed his hat and bowed too, the children stood and stared, and Tito jumped and made a somersault.

Two ladies were in the passing carriage; one was pale and sad, the other was sad too, but with a great calmness and quiet strength in her face. A lovely, clear-browed face, with eyes shining and alight.

Two fair girls, one might almost at the moment have said two fair English girls—maybe the thought was a just one. A golden-haired boy of, say, three or four years of age stood on the floor of the carriage between the two ladies; he had had the whole of their attention until the wayside bows had called for smiles and nods of recognition. The child was dressed in a white sailor dress, English fashion; the ladies wore—well, one looked at their sweet sad faces, and one did not think of clothes.

The strangers looked at each other; there seemed something unusual, something almost like worship in the earnestness and profoundness of the reverence shown to the passers-by. They looked their question.

"La Marchesa," said Pompeo.

"Our Marchesa," said old Pucci.

"Who?"

"La Marchesa Rallegra," and Pompeo mounted his coachbox.

"Everyone knows her—is she not good to all?"

"Good!" struck in the old man. "Good! She is an angel—

Madonna herself could do no more. Ah, signora, she was rich once—a mother and a wife. Then a day rose and the fever came, and she stood alone. But God is good—another day broke, and a little angel was given to her to bid her live. She lives now for him," and the old man threw out his arms dramatically, lifting his face to the sky, "and for the people. We are her husband and her children."

Was this a rhapsody, or was it truth?

Dry, plain truth.

There is an old palace, and there is a modern villa among the hills where a guardian spirit lives. What a brave man would have done, what strength and succour might have been generously dealt by a strong and helpful man, are all now done by a gentle and noble lady.

Beyond the circle of the hills about her house she is not known; the world would perhaps ask her name and know it not; yet it may be that her deeds are worthier far than the old wars and fightings the valley once saw, as worthy surely as the saintly ascetic life that stands midway between antiquity and modernism, and that has made one hill stand out for ever white with the shine of sanctity.

Days ran on. San Giovanni's sun had risen, scorching summer was flaming over hill, and valley, and lake. Can we say, too, that the cottage home outside the old city of Perugia was glad with the joy of a bridal?

Ah no!

Nanna had gathered the roses for the children, and she had set down her hoe, and then she had gone on to meet Maso. He would be late at work, but still she would meet him at the very foot of his high scaffolding.

Ah me! ah me!

Maso was indeed at the foot of the high ladder, but he did not stand a bright, radiant man, he was still and white.

That very moment he had fallen—she saw him fall.

They carried him home; they passed even the carriage with the strangers in; they passed the children still playing in the white road, tossing their lately-won soldi in the air.

They missed the marchesa; Nanna's wild cry was for her.

By the morning she had come—come in at once from her villa to help.

Nanna could not weep, she only sat and looked; if any help could come, surely it would come when that gentle lady spoke, when her soft hand touched the pale brow of the unconscious Maso.

But the sun sank. How many days did he rise and set? No one thought. Only at last San Giovanni had come, and it seemed as if it would be a day for death instead of the day of marriage.

The old priest stood by. He would have made the two man and wife; now he was calmly saying the grave words which the Church orders for a dying man. His monotonous, chanting voice was the only sound in the room.

There had been gesticulations and violent weeping—not on the part of Nanna, but all was hushed by the awe of that little-comprehended last service.

Nanna's eyes, like those of a wild creature, were fixed on Maso; by her side stood the fair, calm marchesa. On her sweet face was a sharper sadness. Did not she remember? But her hand was firm and cool, and she held Nanna's hot hand within it. There was nothing for her to do.

So it went on. Slowly, wearily, surely. In a few moments the priest's monotone would cease, and silent, motionless Maso would be travelling under the blessing of the Church.

A quiver broke the awful hush.

Then the air rang with a long, piercing shriek from Nanna.

She took that quivering for the trembling of new life—returning life.

She was right. Perhaps it was but a dumb, agonised instinct which drove that wild shriek from her. Nevertheless, it spoke the truth. The strong, vivid life within her was only making its untutored answer to the weak life that lay trembling before her.

There is nothing more to say. The story of Nanna's life was not spoilt, her hopes and Maso's hopes got their fulfilment, and they live and work, and are glad under the sunny skies of their home.

The people are very ignorant. They do not know who worked the cure, whether it was the doctor, or the old priest, or the good marchesa.

"I know," said Nanna. "The marchesa kept me still—Maso rested. She—"

Nanna here kisses a little silver cross she wears. Her religion is very vague. It stirs the most when she thinks of her marchesa.

The Editor's Note Book.

I THINK it is in "Vanity Fair" that Mr. Thackeray remarks how, in the face of the saddest domestic calamities, the routine of life goes steadily and unswervingly on, how new clothes have to be bought, dinner to be ordered, and all the petty details of the house to be considered, even while the blinds are still drawn in the room where lies the corpse of the best beloved of the family. The passage is brought to my mind when I read of Mr. Gladstone and his Government going through the solemn formalities of electing a Speaker and of bringing in a new Reform Bill, for which none but professional politicians even pretend to care, ignoring the while this miserable Egyptian business, which really involves some of the most tremendous issues which even this country has ever had to face.

THE declarations of the late Czar and his Ministers, that Russia had no intention of going to Merv, have turned out as delusive as all the experts told us they would. The troops of the Czar are practically in possession of the city, and the inevitable day, when the question of supremacy must be fought out between England and Russia in Afghanistan, is rapidly approaching.

SIR CHARLES DILKE's speech in answer to Mr. Stanhope's first question on the subject was, as far as it went, satisfactory. But it is earnestly to be desired that Lord George Hamilton's hope that the Prime Minister will make up his mind what he means to do in regard to the Russian advance, and will state his views in language intelligible both in England and Russia, may be realised.

THE Royal Commission on the housing of the working classes has a tough piece of work before it, seeing that it has all England for a field in which to labour. Perhaps it would have been better to have begun more modestly, and to have confined the enquiry, in the first instance, to populous places. But this is the sort of gift-horse in whose mouth it would be most ungracious to look—even if one thinks that it would have also been better if the names of a few more men (and, perhaps, women) with some really practical knowledge of the subject were to be found on the list of members of the Commission.

I AM glad to find that none of the charitable institutions of this country are any longer in want of funds. At least I cannot but suppose that this desirable consummation has been arrived at, when I read that a committee of distinguished personages have organised a meeting, to be held in the Jerusalem Chamber, for the purpose of raising money to assist in the erection in Paris of a statue to Admiral Coligny, "the celebrated Huguenot leader."

TWO questions, both of considerable importance, arise out of the explosion at Victoria Station. The first, and most serious, of course, is whether or not the disaster was the result of a Fenian outrage; the second, whether, in this case, the explosion occurred at the time intended by the person who arranged the infernal machine, whatever it was. If, as seems probable, the first question is to receive an affirmative answer, and if the second assumption is also well founded, some little comfort may possibly be drawn from the conclusion that wanton destruction of property rather than of life or limb is what the terrorists are aiming at.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD no doubt means well by his proposal to abolish what are known as "off-licenses," but the letter by which he prefaced the introduction of his Bill certainly does not prove his case. The "off license," it should be explained, means that license to sell single bottles of wine or spirits which is held by many grocers.

MR. KENNARD states boldly—but, so far as I can see, without an atom of proof to back him—that the fact that "the license has proved most dangerous to thousands, especially to women, in various ranks of life," is notorious, and that it affords them the "opportunity of taking unnoticed, either by their family or the public, what they would be ashamed to take openly at home or in any of the ordinary licensed premises."

THAT a good many people do indulge in secret drinking of alcoholic beverages—as a good many other people indulge in private opium, chloral, or morphia—is an undoubted fact, but that such persons would allow any delicacy of feeling to stand in the way of the gratification of their cherished vice, no man of experience or observation can admit for a moment. "Qui a bu, boira." He (or she) who has been drunken will be drunken still, and if he (or she) is obliged to go to the public-house for the desired stimulant, no consideration of modesty, and no fear of public opinion, will stand in the way.

BESIDES, as an excellent leader in the Daily Telegraph of the 27th of February pointed out, the facilities offered by the grocers for the purchase of the domestic bottle of wine or gin save many a young girl from being sent on errands to the neighbouring public-house, with which, however respectably it may be conducted, it is certainly desirable that she should not form too intimate an acquaintance.

WHATEVER views we may entertain on the Deceased Wife's Sister question, there can be, I should imagine, but one opinion as to the behaviour of the Rev. Mr. Fort in the matter of Mr. Josiah Hobson. Mr. Hobson, fifty years ago, married his deceased wife's sister, and such marriages were subsequently made valid by the passing of Lord Lyndhurst's Act. Mr. Fort has taken upon himself to refuse the Holy Communion to Mr. Hobson, thus displaying a view of Christianity which it may be hoped is almost unique.

SUCH people as Mr. Fort may possibly be excused on the score of ignorance of the law, but what is to be said of the Bishop of St. Albans, who backed up the reverend gentleman in his wrongdoing? Surely a bishop—who, it must never be forgotten, is ex officio a legislator—ought to know more of his rights and duties than this.

MR. ANDERSON'S Bill for the suppression of pigeon-shooting was talked out of the House last week, owing, to a large extent, to the exuberant verbosity of one of its supporters. The question itself is one of small importance, except in so far as it illustrates the modern tendency to parental or, as Colonel Tottenham called it, "grand-maternal," legislation.

THE debate on the Bill, if debate it can be called, was, however, remarkable for the extreme imbecility of the arguments, if they may be dignified by the name, which were brought forward by honourable gentlemen on both sides. Thus, Mr. Stuart-Wortley, against the Bill, remarked that if it were passed it would put a stop to one of the few sports which are accessible to the poor, while it would leave untouched those of the rich; Colonel Tottenham, following on the same side, declared that the giving of prizes by gun clubs encourages arts and manufactures; and Sir F. A. Millbank—himself a champion killer of driven grouse—stated that pigeon matches are principally promoted by publicans for the sake of betting.

How wildly beside the question all this insincere and worthless talk was will be seen, when one stops to consider that the only point really raised by Mr. Anderson's Bill is whether or not there is sufficient cruelty in shooting pigeons from a trap to call for legislative interference.

IT is reported that, when the case of Fortescue v. Garmoye comes on for hearing, the tactics of the defence will be to allow judgment to go by default, with a view of having the damages assessed in the Sheriff's Court. This plan would probably considerably diminish Lord Garmoye's pecuniary punishment and prevent Miss Fortescue's story from being fully heard, but it would be at the same time so very shabby a trick that I hope there is no truth in the rumour.

THE usual farce of closing the London Theatres and Music Halls on the north side of the Thames was gone through as usual on Ash Wednesday, to the satisfaction of nobody in particular, and to the harm of a great many people. If Ash Wednesday were a general fast, with a reason for its observance, like Good Friday, and if all public entertainers were tarred with the same brush, there would be, at least, uniformity to plead in favour of the present practice.

AS it is, the Lord Chamberlain and the Middlesex magistrates arbitrarily fine a great number of people within their district, whose fellows can earn their night's salary at any theatre or music-hall out of it. How serious a matter this is, may be judged from the fact that the prohibition of the two performances which, under ordinary circumstances, would have taken place at Drury Lane on Wednesday of last week, cost the company and staff of the theatre the highly respectable sum of six hundred pounds, or thereabouts.

AND surely, if shops and public-houses may be opened and Parliament may sit on Ash Wednesday, there can be no earthly reason why people connected with theatres should be made to suffer in this way.

THE correspondence which has been going on in the Standard in reference to the value of gymnastics for girls will very likely carry dismay to the heart of many an anxious mother, but consolation may be found in remembering that here, as well as in most other cases, safety lies in a discreet middle course. Gymnastics are excellent in their way, but can be overdone like everything else. If parents are in doubt as to the amount of muscular education which their children require, they will find that a consultation with their family doctor will be of far more value than the study of any amount of newspaper controversy.

Cookery.

A LITTLE SUPPER.

It not unfrequently happens that in an establishment where there is but a limited staff of servants, and where the resources of the kitchen are also limited, a nice supper for a few friends is required. To cook and serve enough hot dishes for the party seems out of the question, and yet an objection to have cold dishes also is often felt. But there really is no reason, if the bill of fare is well arranged, why this plan should not be adopted. No doubt if the hot dishes are savoury, and the cold dishes dry and insipid—as, for instance, is cold roast chicken—they would not go well together, but if the dishes are well selected, such an arrangement should have a successful result.

The best plan when hot and cold dishes are given is to have the former handed round as entrées, and the latter placed on and served from the table. A very pretty and, at the same time, economical supper can thus be arranged. The chickens en bechamel are a delicious dish, and, when decorated tastefully, or as directed in the recipe, have a handsome effect. This dish can be placed at the top of the table. The mutton-patties at the bottom. On one side the collared sole; on the other the salmon salad. The sweet dishes, carefully arranged as to colour and kind, will fill up the table.

However simple the entertainment, when all the dishes are not placed on the table, it will be well to have menu cards, so that the guests may have no difficulty in deciding on what they will take. Some people who entertain in a quiet way think that menu cards give an air of pretension to the meal, but as they are now so generally seen, and are besides so useful, this idea may be dismissed.

All the dishes of which our bill of fare is composed are inexpensive and simple, such as could readily be prepared in any kitchen; of course, in an entertainment of any kind some expense must be incurred, but this may be reduced greatly by careful marketing, and by observing the directions given from time to time in HOUSEHOLD WORDS for economical yet good cookery.

BILL OF FARE.

Chickens en Bechamel.	Mutton Patties.
Collared Soles.	Salmon Salad.
Grenadines of Beef.	Croquettes of Veal.
Strawberry Soufflé.	Coffee Cream.
Cherry Jelly.	Vanilla Meringues.
	Cheese Fondue.

CHICKENS EN BECHAMEL.

Choose white plump birds of moderate size. Boil them gently either in the liquor in which bacon has been boiled, or in water with a little bacon, two or three onions, and a bay-leaf. The object is to heighten the flavour of the chickens, and if the liquor is not salt enough add a little more.

When the chickens are done take off the skin, let them stand until cold, then cut them into joints. Take off the pinions of the wings, cut the meat from the breast in thick handsome slices, bone the legs, place all the pieces as closely together, and as neatly as possible, on a dish. Pour over the whole, so as to mask it entirely, a sauce made as follows: Put two minced onions in a quart of milk, which boil until it is reduced to a pint and a half. Strain out the onion, pressing to get all the juice. Boil the milk, put in two ounces of fine flour mixed in half a gill of cold milk, stir it over a slow fire until it simmers, and is as thick as rich cream; add salt and cayenne pepper. Put in two ounces of butter, and, when it is melted, stir in half an ounce of Nelson's Gelatine dissolved in a gill of water. Pour this sauce over the chickens whilst it is hot, then let the dish stand until cold. If preferred, each piece of chicken can be dipped in the hot sauce, and then placed on the dish; for this method, however, nearly double the quantity of sauce will be required. For decoration, round the edge of the dish put a lightly arranged border of watercress, carefully picked and dried after washing. Roll thin slices of ham neatly, and place at equal distances among the cress. Cut beetroot into pretty shapes with pastry cutters, and arrange it tastefully also among the cress.

MUTTON PATTIES.

Mince a quarter of a pound of underdone mutton, taking care to have it free from skin and fat. Mix with it a tablespoonful of rich gravy—that which is found under the cake of dripping from a joint is particularly suitable for this purpose—add a few drops of essence of anchovy, a pinch of cayenne pepper, and a small teaspoonful of minced parsley. If necessary add salt. Line four patty-pans with puff paste, divide the mutton into equal portions, and put it into the pans, cover each with a lid of paste, and bake in a quick oven for half an hour. Of course, for a large party the quantities given will have to be increased according to the numbers.

COLLARED SOLES.

Cut two pounds of lean beefsteak or veal cutlet into dice, put it on in two quarts of cold water, and as soon as it boils, take off the scum as it rises. Let it simmer gently for half an hour; then add four onions, a turnip, carrot, small bundle of sweet herbs, blade of mace, half-a-dozen white peppercorns, and when it has again boiled for an hour, strain it through a napkin. Let it stand until cold, remove all the fat, boil it up, and to a quart of the liquor put an ounce of Nelson's Gelatine, previously soaked in cold water. Add salt and a pinch of cayenne pepper, and when the jelly is cool stir in the whites and shells of two eggs well beaten. Let the jelly boil briskly for two minutes, then strain through a jelly-bag and use as directed. Take the fillets of a pair of large thick soles, cut them into neat square pieces, leaving the trimmings for other dishes, and lay them in vinegar with a little salt for an hour. As they must be kept very white the best French vinegar should be used. Boil the fillets gently in salted water, with a little vinegar, till done; take them up and dry them in a cloth. Have ready some picked parsley and hard-boiled eggs cut in quarters; arrange these neatly at the bottom of a plain mould so as to form a pretty pattern. Pour in very gently enough jelly to cover the first layer, let it stand until beginning to set, then put another layer of fish, eggs, and parsley, then more jelly, and so on until the mould is full. When done set the mould on ice, or allow it to stand some hours in a cold place to get well set. Turn it out, ornament lightly with parsley and cut lemon.

SALMON SALAD.

Have a steak cut not more than half an inch thick, put it into a stewpan with a little dissolved butter, sprinkle with pepper and salt, cover the pan, and cook very slowly until done, which will probably be in twenty minutes. When cold break the fish into flakes and cover with a sauce made as follows: Mix the yolks of two raw eggs with a teaspoonful of mustard, a saltspoonful of salt, and a teaspoonful of essence of anchovies, add by degrees two teaspoonfuls of French vinegar and the same quantity of chili vinegar. Measure a gill of the finest salad-oil, and mix with the other ingredients drop by drop until the sauce is very thick; a little more vinegar may be added at the last if liked.

The salad for this dish should be in moderate proportion to the fish and be very carefully prepared. Each kind of vegetable should be separately treated: the small salad be well washed in a colander, drained and lightly shaken in a cloth until thoroughly dry, and the lettuce leaf by leaf be freed from grit and insects, and then be dried like the cress. Care must be taken that the salad does not lose its crispness. In addition to cress, endive, and lettuce, slices of cucumber and tomato should be used in such a way as to give an ornamental effect. Shred the lettuce finely, pick the endive into neat shreds, using only the best parts of a small head; put a border of them with cress tastefully round the dish, and finally the cucumber and tomato. Put the dressed salmon in the centre of the dish, and sprinkle lightly over it a small portion of the salad.

GRENADINES OF BEEF.

Cut two pounds of the undercut of either the sirloin or the rump of beef into neat cutlets, about the third of an inch thick, lard them with thin strips of bacon, and put them into a stewpan with a small piece of butter, lightly sprinkling the upper side with pepper and salt. Let them cook very slowly, without approaching frying-point, for fifteen minutes, then turn them on the other side, which lightly pepper and salt, and allow the grenadines to cook for another fifteen minutes. Have ready half a pint of rich, well-flavoured, thick gravy of a good brown colour; place the grenadines on a dish, pouring the gravy slowly over them. The dish may be made to look very pretty by a little garnish of sprigs of cauliflower, or any vegetable in season, and after these are boiled and drained from the water, they must be tossed in a stewpan with a little butter.

CROQUETTES.

Put one ounce of fine flour into a stewpan with half a gill of cold water, stir this over a slow fire very rapidly until it forms a paste, then add one ounce of butter and stir until well mixed. Mix in a small teaspoonful of essence of shrimps or anchovies, with a pinch of salt and pepper. Take the stewpan off the fire, and stir the yolk of an egg briskly into the sauce; thoroughly mix it with half a pound of pounded veal, and spread it out on a plate until it is cool. Care is required in making the sauce; if it is too thin it is difficult to mould the croquettes, and ice will be required to set the mixture. Flour your hands, take a small piece of the croquette mixture, roll into a ball, or into the shape of a cork, then pass it through finely sifted and dried breadcrumbs. Repeat the process until all the mixture is used. Put the croquettes as you do them into a wire frying-basket, which shake very gently when all are placed in it, in order to free them from superfluous crumbs. Have ready a stewpan half full of boiling-fat, dip the basket in, gently moving it about, taking care the croquettes are covered with fat. In about a minute they will become a delicate brown, and will then be done. Turn them on a paper to absorb any superfluous fat, serve them on a napkin or ornamental dish-paper. No more croquettes than will lie on the bottom of the basket without touching each other should be fried at once.

STRAWBERRY SOUFFLÉ.

Spread strawberry-jam about half an inch thick at the bottom of a tart-dish, put over it a layer of sponge finger-biscuits. Make a custard as follows: Pour on the yolks of four eggs a pint of boiling cream or milk, stir it over a slow fire until it becomes thick, taking care it does not curdle; sweeten lightly, and add a few drops of almond-flavouring. Put the custard when cold over the jam, and on the top of it the whites of the eggs whisked to a very strong froth. Sift some fine sugar over the soufflé, and put it in the oven until it assumes a pretty golden colour. Serve cold.

COFFEE CREAM.

Soak an ounce of Nelson's Gelatine in a gill of water for some hours, or all night if convenient, dissolve it in a pint of hot milk, add a quarter of a pound of lump sugar, and when nearly cold stir in three gills of cream and a large tablespoonful of "Café Vierge," to be obtained of Messrs. Ridgway and all good grocers. Mix well together, and when the cream is on the point of setting, put it in moulds which have well cooled either on ice or by soaking in cold water. These precautions ensure the creams turning out without difficulty.

If preferred, half of the cream can be flavoured with coffee essence—that above recommended being the best—and the other half with extract of vanilla, curaçao, or maraschino.

CHERRY JELLY.

This jelly can be made exactly in the same way as ordinary wine jelly, without lemon; Grant's Morella Cherry Brandy being added as flavouring after it is cleared. In a small household, where all the appliances are not at hand, or the cook has not had experience in jelly-making, it is recommended to use Nelson's Cherry Jelly, which is exceedingly brilliant, of fine flavour, and merely requires the addition of hot water to prepare it for the table.

VANILLA MERINGUES.

Whip the whites of six eggs very firm, mix with them three-quarters of a pound of the finest icing sugar, and half a teaspoonful of essence of vanilla. As quickly as possible fill a tablespoonful with the mixture, which turn upon a strip of paper placed on a baking-board; repeat this, working rapidly, until all the meringues are made, then sift fine sugar over them, and put them without loss of time in the oven, the heat of which must only be sufficient to dry the meringues and give them a delicate brown tint. When the meringues are coloured and feel firm to the touch, take them off the papers, and with great care scoop out from the inside as much of the soft sugar mixture as you can without injuring the case. When this is done, again place the meringues, the hollow side uppermost, on fresh strips of paper, and let them remain in the same moderate heat until perfectly crisp. When cold fill one case with whipped cream, place another over it, and if necessary to keep it in position, use a very little white of egg. The meringues must not be filled with cream until just before serving, as of course the moisture may dissolve them.

A nice inexpensive cream for filling meringues may be made as follows: Boil two ounces of sugar with a pint of milk and half an ounce of Nelson's Gelatine, previously soaked; strain it, let it get cold, and flavour it with vanilla. When the cream appears likely to set, add by degrees the juice of half a lemon, and whisk it until it becomes frothy and thick. Put it aside and use as required.

CHEESE FONDUE.

Boil a pint of milk, pour it over a French roll, beat up and mix with it half a pound of good cheese grated, and the yolks of four eggs well beaten. When about to bake it, beat the whites of the eggs to a strong froth, and stir them in lightly. Put the fondue into a tart-dish if you have no silver one suitable, and bake in a quick oven. It will take about twenty minutes.

A Mississippi Race.

IT is now many years ago that I took my passage one afternoon upon the good steamer Habakkuk E. Dodge, bound from St. Louis to New Orleans. I describe her as "good" because she was so described in the "sheddle" in the hall of the Granite House, St. Louis. But so far as my subsequent experience went she turned out to be anything but good, although the skipper, a rank Kentuckian, declared that he'd "fixed the voyage between St. Louis and New Orleans in five hours less time than any other boat, he had, and that's a fact."

As I stepped on board I saw another steamer lying alongside the quay, which had steam up, and was advertised to start with us; and the pilot, with whom I was already friends, guessed there'd be a race.

This was not comforting, for I had read in books of travel and adventure of midnight races between the high pressure boats of the Mississippi, and the chief associations in my mind with these events were the bursting of boilers, blowing up, conflagrations, and horrible collisions with snags.

However, I had taken my ticket, my baggage was aboard, and the presence of two or three hundred other passengers solaced me with the idea that, after all, these were but travellers' yarns, or people would not travel so frequently by the steamers. Little was I acquainted with the recklessness of the American people, whose monopoly of "big things," in catastrophes as in all else, makes them living exponents of the proverb that "familiarity breeds contempt."

We started at midnight, and I was relieved to see that the St. Louis, the opposition steamer, was still at her moorings, although her smoke-stacks were in full operation and her bell and whistle were going furiously. To re-tread old ground in the shape of describing a Mississippi steamboat voyage does not come within the scope of this paper; suffice it, therefore, to say that we reached Memphis, which is about a third of the way, without mishap, and without having even sighted the smoke of the St. Louis.

Off Blues Point, however, some miles from Memphis, there was a visible excitement in the neighbourhood of the glass steering-house, and I, who was the only passenger awake, went up to enquire the reason.

"Look thar, sir, astern," said the skipper, pointing with the thumb of his right hand over his shoulder without turning his head. "That thar's the St. Louis; we oughter be ten miles ahead of her, but them derned niggers were so powerful slow in gettin' aboard them molasses at Memphis."

I looked and beheld, amid the dense blackness of the night, what seemed to be some unearthly fiery creature rounding the point we had passed some five minutes previously—the two side-lights representing the eyes, the glare of her furnace a horrible mouth, and the distinctly audible beats of the huge paddles simulating her angry pantings to come up with us.

"Keppins is spry, and that's a fact," said the skipper, lighting a huge cigar; "and I reckon he won't spare an inch of timber to send the St. Louis along. But the old Hab, she's got legs, too, and ef Keppins beats us, as he oughter do, considerin' his boat's new and this ere has been runnin' five years, it'll be an accident, I'm thinkin'."

"Accident!" I thought with a shudder, "that means to say that this reckless fellow is going to send us along at full speed until we either blow up or catch fire;" the latter seeming to be the most probable to me, when I thought that we were but a huge mass of dry woodwork heaped like spare fuel about a seething fiery furnace.

However, here I was, so I quieted my fears as best I could, and even took sufficient interest in the race to take a quiet bet with the skipper that we would win.

Our furnace roared, our stacks poured forth volumes of smoke and sparks, our huge paddles thrashed the waters until we shook and throbbed as if the boat herself was audibly expressing her interest in the race.

"See, sir, he's firing up," said the skipper. "Let her have it, boys," he roared down the tube communicating with the engine-room; "four more revolutions a minute, and five dollars a head if we whip her."

Our craft seemed to bound over the sullen black waters; the irregular, fantastic outlines of the trees on the banks sped by us like affrighted phantoms. Still, the fiery eyes and mouth of the St. Louis grew bigger and bigger, and the sound of her pantings more and more distinct.

Our skipper was almost beside himself. Cigar after cigar he smoked and threw away; he pulled his broad hat over his brows and flopped it back again; he plunged his hands into his pockets and withdrew them with a jerk as if they had been stung, all the while muttering execrations and charitable wishes, any single one of which, if it had taken effect, would certainly have sent the St. Louis and all on board her to the bottom.

Suddenly, as the nose of the enemy was within a steamer's length of our stern in a parallel line about three hundred yards away, there was a sharp click at our feet, followed by a rattling of chains.

"Steering-gear's snapped, sir," roared out a voice from somewhere amid the black recesses of our stern.

What the skipper said upon reception of this news I need not repeat; but he subsequently roared down the communication-tube in a voice of frenzy, "Stop her!"

Our paddles stopped, but our way on was considerable, and we drifted ahead for some yards ere it was patent that the Habakkuk E. Dodge was out of the race.

"Whipped yer this time," was wafted over the waters to us from the St. Louis, which was now directly ahead of us. Our skipper had not framed his stinging retort, when a sheet of flame leapt into the air from where the St. Louis was, followed by an unearthly roar, then for a second or two there was a dead silence, then came a confused cry of agony from many directions.

"Lower away the boats!" yelled our skipper; and although this was done smartly enough, their progress from our boat to the scene of the disaster was considerably delayed by the frantic exertions of our passengers to get into them, for the fearful roar and the blaze of light had awakened them, and nothing but absolute exertion of force could make them believe for some minutes that the accident had not happened to us.

How to Work With the Microscope.

PART II.

THERE is still one piece of the apparatus furnished with the microscope before referred to which requires a few words of description, and this is the "live-box." This useful and important article is intended to aid in the examination of the various minute beings which live in water, and which, but for some such contrivance, could scarcely be induced to remain in focus even for a second or two at a time. It will be found in the form of a circular brass cell, about three-quarters of an inch in diameter, which is fastened in the centre of a slip of the same metal, of the dimensions of an ordinary slide, and which is provided with a glass cover, capable of removal by raising and not by unscrewing it.

This live-box is used in the following manner. Get your microscope in working order, obtain the approximate focus required, and have the condenser ready to hand. Remove the lid of the cell, and place a single drop of water upon the bottom. Then fasten the lid down tolerably tightly upon it, place the box upon the stage after the fashion of an ordinary slide, and then proceed as in the examination of an opaque object. The drop of water should never be a large one, or the inhabitants will be able to swim with so much facility that it will be far from easy to persuade them to remain in focus while under inspection.

A WONDERFUL amount of work may be done by the aid of this simple piece of apparatus, for the name of the microscopical beings inhabiting water is legion, and their examination will always be found an unfailing source of interest and amusement, more especially as they may be seen pursuing the ordinary avocations of their life, chasing, capturing, and preying upon one another, and so on. Any water, almost, will do for the purpose; even that supplied by the best regulated water companies will sometimes be found to contain "living organisms." But a puddle, a ditch, a pond, or a stream will furnish a far more bounteous supply, and will keep the microscopist busily employed as long as his supply of water lasts. Some of the more minute forms may be more easily examined by the simple expedient of damping an ordinary glass slide with the water containing them. The plan, however, has one or two counterbalancing disadvantages, chief among which is the fact that the water upon the slide is sure to evaporate very rapidly, its living contents, of course, consequently meeting with an untimely end.

Now as to the important question of light, which may be either natural or artificial. The former, of course, is best, as it is for most pursuits, but it is by no means indispensable. If you can work by daylight, however, so much the better. Choose a window facing the north or west, so as to avoid any unnecessary glare of sunshine, and arrange your table so that every available ray of light may be at your service. If the day be a little cloudy, that is rather an advantage than otherwise, for, strange to say, there is no light more trying than that which proceeds from a perfectly clear and cloudless sky. On the other hand, of course, work with the microscope is out of the question on very dark days, or at times when the light is constantly changing owing to the passage of heavy clouds across the sun. On such occasions it is far better not to attempt to work at all, but to await a more suitable opportunity; the result will only be failure and a strain upon the eyes.

THERE are many, however, whose circumstances permit them to follow their favourite occupation by artificial light only, and among these are some of our most successful and enthusiastic workers. The best form in which this light can be furnished is undoubtedly that of a good paraffin-lamp, which must be carefully trimmed in order that the flame may burn quite steadily, and without the occasional flicker which is annoying enough at any time, and especially so while one is occupied with so delicate a matter as work with a microscope. The lamp need not be an expensive one, those to be purchased everywhere at from two shillings to half-a-crown answering every purpose. But it must be properly trimmed. Gas should always be avoided, even in the form of an argand burner, for it is never satisfactory in any way.

WHILE in actual use the lamp should never be placed more than six or seven inches distant from the microscope, and the light must not be too powerful, or the eyes will be so dazzled that work will be impossible. The mirror, it must be remembered, is concave, so that the rays are concentrated before being reflected into the tube. The proper amount of light may be easily judged by adjusting the mirror in question in such a manner as to reflect the rays upwards into the object-glass, and then looking down the tube before placing a slide upon the stage. If the light is clear and brilliant, but not trying to the eye, you have managed things correctly.

A SHADE of some sort will, of course, be necessary to shield the eyes from the direct rays of the lamp. This is a very important point. Nor should any other light, if possible, be allowed in the same room. You will be able to work twice as long and in far greater comfort, if the upper part of the instrument can be kept in semi-darkness. In daylight, of course, this is not necessary, but artificial light is so much more trying, that the adoption of this plan will be found to afford a wonderful relief.

MANY workers seem to find great difficulty in abstracting their attention from the objects seen by the unoccupied eye, which should never be closed. There are two remedies for this trouble. The first consists in working only with a binocular microscope, which naturally involves considerable expense. The second, which is practicable to everyone, is merely to procure a sheet of dark-coloured card-board, and cut out a kind of shade, which can be fixed round the centre of the tube so as entirely to shut off the view of the table, etc., by the un-employed eye. A third plan consists merely in persistent attention to the object under examination, when after a time, objects seen by the unoccupied eye will cease to convey any impression to the brain. This, I think, is merely a matter of practice, and is sure to come sooner or later, in proportion to the degree of concentration of the attention attained by the worker; just in the same way as, when writing a letter, for instance, we see the objects for some distance around us, and are yet quite unconscious that we do so.

BEFORE beginning work, see that all your glasses are thoroughly clean. Those in the tube will seldom require attention, but the object-glasses, unless carefully seen to, are very apt to harbour specks of dust upon the lenses, which greatly obscure the view of any slide seen through them. And it is extremely irritating when one has got the microscope nicely into working order, and is just settling down for an hour or two of steady work, to find that one of the lenses is dusty, and that the objective must consequently be taken off, cleaned, and replaced before any further progress can be made.

So, make a regular rule of seeing to the condition of the glasses before beginning work, and carefully clean any that may require it. In doing this, however, the very greatest care is necessary. Never brush off the dust with a handkerchief, or any other object which happens to come ready to hand, for the glass of which the lenses are composed is so extremely soft that it is scratched by the merest trifle, and were a fragment of any hard substance included amongst the dust, you would probably spoil your objective. For cleansing purposes there is no better material than the softest wash-leather, a piece of which should always be kept in the drawer for this very object. In default of this a camel's-hair pencil makes a very efficient substitute, and has the merit of working well round the edges without difficulty.

WHILE working with the microscope, adjust it in such a position that you can use it while sitting comfortably at the table without the necessity of either straining your neck or crouching in your endeavours to look through the tube. The instrument is so made that it can be used equally well in a perpendicular or in a horizontal position, so that tall and short people may use it with equal comfort. If you are very short, however, it is better to employ a low table, as unless the instrument is placed at above a certain angle it is not very easy to manage the light.

WHEN you have done with it, put your microscope away at once, either in its box, or beneath a glass case. If the latter, have a soft fluffy mat upon which to stand it (the case), in order to prevent the admission of dust from below. If you leave the instrument standing about, the chances are, that sooner or later, you will find it knocked off the table and every lens broken, the "cat" being the probable delinquent. Moreover, if the air is at all damp, the brass is sure to become rusty, rendering the instrument unsightly to the eye and extremely disagreeable to the touch, and entailing some little trouble before it can be cleaned. Should you have occasion to lift it bodily from the table, do so by grasping the square of mahogany to which it is clamped; never raise it by means of the tube, for fear of dragging some part out of its due adjustment to the remainder.

It may not be out of place here to offer a hint or two with regard to the examination of objects under glasses of different powers. I have before stated that the object-glasses of low power (the one-inch, and half-inch, more especially) are the most useful for general purposes, but I would here suggest that these be used for the examination of every object before proceeding to those of higher magnifying properties. One great advantage of this plan is that you can get even the most minute object into focus without difficulty, for you will have no trouble in doing so with the lower powers, and can leave it in situ upon the stage while you are shifting your object-glass. Another advantage is that you distinguish delicate points of structure, etc., by degrees. If you begin at once with the higher powers you must miss many of these, for they are so greatly enlarged that their character is often not perceived. So, begin always with a lower power, and from that work up to the high ones.

THERE are certain pieces of auxiliary apparatus furnished with the higher priced microscopes which are intended to aid the advanced student in his work, such as the polariscope, etc. For the description of these, however, it is impossible to find space in the present article, which is intended for beginners, and not for those who are attacking the higher branches of the study. For beginners only have the foregoing remarks been intended, and we trust that the few hints which we have been able to offer may be of use to them in their studies.

Some Facts About Hair.

IN the early ages of the world's history kings wore their hair long, in imitation of Samson and the golden Sun-God Mithias. From this we find that the first men shorn were slaves and labourers; the free-men wore their hair uncut, as the crown of a perfect manhood and manliness.

There have been many instances of extraordinary growth of the hair in a single member of a family, but there is an entire long-haired family. Reference is made to the seven Sutherland sisters (Americans, of course), whose marvellous hirsute crops surpass anything of the kind ever presented to the public. Sarah N. Sutherland, the eldest, has long, massive, and jet-black hair falling below the waist; Miss Victoria, whose hair is the longest worn by any woman in the world, and the longest on record, shows a growth reaching to a length of seven and a half feet; Miss Isabella's hair, which is of exceeding fineness, is more than six feet long; Miss Grace is proud of her endowment of hirsute wealth, which reaches a length of almost six feet; Miss Naomi's hair, which almost touches the ground when she stands erect, is the most massive and beautiful ever seen upon woman's head. It is fully six inches through, and when spread out covers her completely like a cloak; it is just such hair as the fair Godiva, who rode garmentless as to all else through Coventry, was gifted with. Miss Dora's hair is abundant, and five feet long. Miss Mary is the youngest; her hair has already attained a wonderful growth, and is rapidly tending towards such length and massiveness as will make it the most wonderful capillary decoration the world ever saw. But their long hair is not the only attraction offered by the seven sisters. They are a highly endowed, thoroughly educated, refined, and accomplished family, being gifted vocally and otherwise with extraordinary musical talent, which has been so completely educated that this feature alone recommends itself as worthy the attention of educated people. In their manners and actions they give full evidence of their high breeding and thorough education. To give the reader an idea of the remarkable length of the seven sisters' hair, it may be stated that Miss Victoria alone has thirty miles of hair on her head, and if the seven bulked their capillary possessions and each hair were placed end to end, the whole quantity would reach a distance of one hundred and sixty miles. Their heads are their fortunes in more senses than one. In Kansas City a hairdresser offered one thousand five hundred dollars for Miss Victoria's hair, and in St. Louis a jeweller paid twenty-five dollars for a single hair, by which he suspended a ten-carat diamond in his show-window. They are very careful in guarding their glorious head adornments, as frequent attempts have been made to cut their hair by villainously inclined people, who, no doubt, attempted the robbery with a view to selling their spoils.

In Japan much may be read from the arrangement of a woman's hair. The age and sex of a baby may be known by the tuft in the back of the neck, or the ring around the crown, or the bunch left in front while all the rest is shaved. A girl of eight or nine has her hair made into a bow on the back and wound round with red crape, while the front is shaved bare and bangs dangle at the sides. A young lady combs hers high in front and arranges it as a butterfly on the back of her head, plumed with gold or silver cord and gay hair-pins of gilt balls. Some very stylish young ladies prefer to have their back-hair resemble a half-open fan instead of a butterfly. A married woman must keep the waterfall style, while a widow who is willing to think of matrimony, wears her hair tied and twisted around a long shell hair-pin placed horizontally across the back of the head. But when a widow resolves never to change her name again, she cuts off her hair short on her neck and combs it back without any parting.

The difficulty of keeping a secret for ever has seldom been more quaintly illustrated than by the accident by which a sturdy heart of oak has been compelled to yield up its charge after keeping it for two centuries and a half.

A lock of hair once bestowed by some generous maid upon a too secretive lover has just been discovered in an oak-tree three feet six inches in diameter, which was sawn up into planks. One of these planks found its way to a carpenter's shop, where it attracted attention by an old-looking branch-like knot traversing its substance. This knot, excised from the tree out of sheer curiosity by one of the workmen, proved to be a peg of yew, containing a lock of bright red hair.

Further investigation demonstrated that a hole had been bored into the trunk of the tree with an auger, and that the plug, freighted with love's gift, had been driven into the aperture thus opened for it. In course of time the wound inflicted upon the tree had healed over the plug so effectually that the portion of the trunk under which the ruddy lock lay concealed exhibited no fewer than two hundred and fifty "rings," each one representing a year's growth of the brave old oak, chosen A.D. 1632, as the hiding-place of a sweetheart's ringlet.

Frequenters of picture-galleries must have observed that all portraits of French noblemen during the mediæval times, and up to the year 1530, represent men with abundant and flowing locks, but that from that year there is an abrupt change; the hair of Frenchmen becoming from that date as short as that of a modern gaol-bird. The reason of that was as follows: His Majesty Francis I. happening to spend the Christmas of 1529 at Fontainebleau, organised a series of routs and revels in honour of the New Year. On the 6th of January, it used to be customary for the mummers to elect a king, and engage in a mimic war against a rival party, who would attempt to depose the mock monarch. Francis, hearing that the lord of a neighbouring castle had been elected "king" by his friends, disguised himself and went with a party of twenty courtiers to offer battle to the revellers. The challenge was accepted. A fort was erected in the great hall of the castle, which Francis endeavoured to carry by storm. It was usual to fight with eggs in guise of shot, and with bags of flour in place of maces; but after a while the strife waxed hot, and somebody threw a lighted brand, which fell upon the disguised king's head, and felled him senseless to the ground. The wound was a very serious one. For some time Francis had to remain in bed, and when he again made his appearance amidst his Court, his hair was found to be cropped quite close; while his beard, on the contrary, which he had always up to that time shaved off, had been suffered to grow luxuriantly. Imitation being the sincerest flattery, the courtiers hurried off to put themselves into the hairdresser's hands. Gradually their example was generally followed, and hair became short and beards lengthened. From France the new fashion passed into England and other countries, and lasted for nearly a hundred years.

Early Days of John Ruskin.

"I HAD Walter Scott's novels," says Mr. Ruskin, "and the 'Iliad'—Pope's translation—for my reading when I was a child. On week days; on Sundays their effect was tempered by 'Robinson Crusoe' and the 'Pilgrim's Progress'; my mother having it deeply in her heart to make an evangelical clergyman of me. Fortunately, I had an aunt more evangelical than my mother; and my aunt gave me cold mutton for Sunday's dinner, which—as I much prefer it hot—greatly diminished the influence of the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' and the end of the matter was, that I got all the noble imaginative teaching of Defoe and Bunyan, and yet—I am not an evangelical clergyman. I had, however, still better teaching than theirs, and that compulsorily and every day of the week. Walter Scott and Pope's 'Homer' were reading of my own election, but my mother forced me, by steady daily toil, to learn long chapters of the Bible by heart; as well as to read it every syllable through, aloud, hard names and all, from Genesis to the Apocalypse, about once a year; and to that discipline—patient, accurate, and resolute—I owe, not only a knowledge of the book, which I find occasionally serviceable, but much of my general power of taking pains, and the best part of my taste in literature. For toys," he says, "I had a bunch of keys to play with, as long as I was capable of pleasure in what glittered and jingled; as I grew older I had a cart, and a ball; and when I was five or six years old, two boxes of well-cut bricks. With these modest, but, I still think, entirely sufficient possessions, and being always summarily whipped if I cried, did not do as I was bid, or tumbled on the stairs, I soon attained serene and secure methods of life and motion; and could pass my days contentedly in tracing the squares and comparing the colours of my carpet—examining the knots in the wood of the floor, or counting the bricks in the opposite houses. But the carpet, and what patterns I could find in bed-covers, dresses, or wall-papers to be examined, were my chief resources, and my attention to the particulars in these was soon so accurate, that when at three-and-a-half I was taken to have my portrait painted by Mr. Northcote, I had not been ten minutes alone with him before I asked him why there were holes in his carpet."

Household Gardening.

GREENHOUSE AND WINDOW PLANTS.

LAST week we referred to plants in glass structures, and gave instructions for repotting small healthy examples that required additional space for development; larger and older plants similarly need attention, but somewhat different treatment, which may be appropriately described, because it can be successfully practised at the present time.

OVERPOTTING.

Not a few persons appear to think that every time a plant is repotted it must necessarily have a larger pot than the one in which it may be established. This is a great mistake. Young free-growing plants with their roots crowded in very small pots and struggling for more room by attempting to pass through the drainage, must, of course, have larger pots to enable the Geraniums, Fuchsias, Ferns, or whatever they may be to attain the desired size for flowering and occupying greenhouse or window-space effectually; but plants already large enough may be repotted and invigorated without increasing the size of the pots at all, may, indeed, often with great advantage be placed in smaller pots than those which they at present occupy. Overpotting is a great and, moreover, a too common evil, involving a waste of space and soil, while the plants so treated languish instead of flourish.

GERANIUMS IN SPRING.

We employ the popular name of the most popular of all greenhouse and window plants, in order to be better understood than if we referred to the plants under their botanically accurate name of Pelargoniums. The plants under notice now are those with round leaves, some with a dark zone in them, others variegated with white or yellow, but all producing in their season trusses of rather small, and more or less round, scarlet, pink, and white flowers; not to that type with crisped and more or less deeply cut leaves, and large two or more coloured flowers. These latter are called Show Pelargoniums, the others immediately in question are technically known as Zonals, or popularly, Zonal Geraniums.

CHARACTER OF THE PLANTS.

Numbers of these plants flowered last year, and rendered rooms, window-boxes, greenhouses, and flower-beds bright and cheerful in the summer. The plants that flowered in pots remain in the same pots still. They may be large plants now, and not required to occupy more space; still, it is hoped they will grow healthily and flower freely in the ensuing summer. They will certainly do so if rightly managed, while at the same time their size need not be materially increased.

Some of the plants may have been cut down in the autumn and the cuttings inserted, as was advised at the time. Such plants will be dwarf now, with numerous short branches, and these only need support to render them healthy and floriferous.

NEGLECTED PLANTS.

Other plants were not cut down, as there are always a few thousands of persons who greedily read advice that may be tendered on subjects in which they are interested, but who hesitate to act with the necessary promptitude to turn the teaching to profitable account. It is thus with not a few owners of cherished window-plants. They refrain from pruning lest they should spoil them, preferring to let them extend until they are too tall to be attractive, and consist of a few long thin stems with a tuft of leaves on the top, and few or none on the lower portions of the plants.

There are thousands of such neglected plants in rooms and greenhouses at the present moment, and unless any of them may be needed specially tall and thin for some particular purpose or position, they should be cut down now. Unhesitatingly the too tall growths may be shortened to any extent desired, provided the stems are not severed below the wood that was made last summer. There can be no difficulty in determining the last summer's growth from that of the season before, and the last-made portion may be cut off anywhere according to the judgment and taste of the operator. The pruning should be done with a knife as sharp as a razor, and if the tops removed are made into cuttings five or six inches long and inserted in small pots of sandy soil, they will emit roots, and in a short time make healthy plants.

Old plants cut down now should not be potted at the same time. It is better to allow them to push fresh growths from the shortened stems, and then, when those are about an inch or so long, may have fresh soil given them in the manner that will be described.

REPOTTING OLD PLANTS.

Plants that were cut down in the autumn, or plants that were not shortened, and which are desired to be tall, and consequently will not be pruned to any extent now, may with advantage be given fresh soil at once, but not necessarily larger pots.

If a Geranium is cut down in the autumn, or if it is left unpruned and loses a number of its leaves in the winter, as is certain to be the case, a number of the roots, all the small fibrous portions, almost invariably die.

Let a plant be turned out of its pot now, and if nearly all the roots are seen to be brown and dry, like a mass of hair or cobwebs, at once boldly crush the soil until it falls from the roots, then with a knife trim off the dried portions of these, and place the plant either in the same pot, or in a smaller, never in a larger, using fresh soil—two-thirds fresh loam, one-third leaf-soil; a little wood, not coal, ashes; and a sprinkling of sand, forming a suitable compost.

The pots used must be perfectly clean, dry, and well drained, and the soil pleasantly moist, not disagreeably wet, when handled. The pots cannot be too small, provided there is just room for inserting the fingers between the roots and sides of the pots for pressing down the soil. Placing such partially divested plants in large unwieldy pots as are often used is almost tantamount to placing them in their graves, and it should always be remembered that the nearer the roots are to the sides of the pots the better will the plants flourish.

SURFACE DRESSING PLANTS.

Some Geraniums that have been steadily growing through the winter will have white fleshy roots when turned out of the pots. These plants must not be disrooted like the others with dead fibrous roots, but may have about a third part of the old soil removed from the surface, not materially disturbing the roots that are seen to be fresh, then filling up the pots with fresh soil and pressing it down firmly. If the soil in the pots both of these surface-dressed plants and of the others that have been disrooted and repotted be kept regularly moist, fresh roots will quickly form and partake of the viands supplied, the certain result being a healthy growth, and in due time a profusion of fine flowers; that is, if the plants are well tended and have a light position, sun and air being absolutely essential to the well-being of these deservedly admired greenhouse and window plants.

LAST YEAR'S FUCHSIAS.

These most elegant of window-plants may be grown and flowered with the greatest satisfaction year after year if they are rightly treated, and this treatment is so simple that it is not easy for any intelligent person to fail in carrying it out.

In the autumn after the plants have ceased flowering, the supply of water, as was advised at the time, ought to have been reduced. In time the leaves would turn yellow and fall, just as they fall from apple-trees in the garden or oak-trees in the woods.

Thus defoliated, Fuchsias may be wintered in any dark or light place, and the cooler it is the better, provided frost cannot enter, the soil in the meantime being kept almost quite dry, yet not as dry as dust. In that condition the plants rest for two or three months, but at this period of the year, they awake from their slumber and commence pushing their buds.

On plants in a dark place these buds will be white; in a light place they will be green. Those in the dark must be brought to the light, but not at once into the full sun, a gradation from darkness to light always being desirable.

Thoroughly water the dry soil, and at the same time, with a pair of scissors or a sharp knife, trim off most of the last year's shoots, cutting them off close to the strongest buds that may be seen starting, even if these buds are close to the main stem; it is not easy, indeed, to err in pruning too severely.

With the soil kept moist the growths will extend rapidly, and, when they are from a quarter to half an inch long, turn the plants out of the pots, shake all the old soil from the roots, and place in fresh, and, if possible, smaller pots, in the same manner as advised for Geraniums; sprinkle the Fuchsias daily in bright weather, apply water to the roots judiciously, keeping the soil moist, without soddening it, and fresh root-action will be prompt, and induce healthy vigorous growth.

When the pots are filled with active roots, larger pots can be given if required, and failing these, the plants can be kept healthy by the aid of top-dressings of rich compost, or frequent applications of weak liquid manure. Such stimulants will, however, not be needed for some time, pure water at present being all that is needed, and those who exercise the soundest judgment in its application will succeed the best.

A "Spirit-Stirring" Adventure.

THE compiler of a book, published a good many years ago, called "Zoological Notes and Anecdotes," quoted an account of a giraffe hunt, from the "Portraits of the Game and Wild Animals of South Africa," by Sir Cornwallis Harris, and designated it as a "spirit-stirring adventure." What sort of spirit it stirred in us, our readers will not find it difficult to conjecture.

Sir Cornwallis Harris had for weeks sought in vain to get a shot at a giraffe. One day he saw what he took to be a large branchless stump of some withered tree in the distance; but presently it moved along above the tops of the thicket, and he was soon able to distinguish a stately giraffe gliding among the trees, "its graceful head nodding like a lofty pine." He set spurs to his horse, and soon found himself "half choked with excitement" close upon the heels of the giraffe, who went "sailing before him," with great velocity, "like some tall ship upon the ocean's bosom." The half-choked sportsman dismounts to fire, and "the mottled carcass presenting a fair and inviting mark," he has "the satisfaction of hearing two balls tell roundly" upon the back of his towering victim. They are not sufficient; so he remounts and again pursues. He and his horse tumble into a hole, by which his rifle is broken; he scrambles up again, however, and binding his rifle-barrel to the stock with his handkerchief, once more gives chase. Meanwhile the poor, weary, and innocent giraffe had stood still to allow of his approach. The hunter is now in a state of wild excitement at finding that the lock of his rifle will not act; in vain he looks round for a stone, and seeks in every pocket for a knife with which either to strike the copper cap, or hamstring the colossal but harmless animal, who stood waiting for his doom. The reader will rejoice to hear that the giraffe escaped. A few days afterwards, however, Sir Cornwallis Harris suddenly came upon a herd of thirty giraffes, and his blood "coursed like quicksilver through his veins" as he galloped after them. Coming up with the fugitives he singled out their "lordly chief," and, "applying the muzzle of the rifle towards his dappled shoulder, drew both triggers."

The conclusion of the affair is given in these words:

"Mute, dignified, and majestic, stood the unfortunate victim, occasionally stooping his elastic neck towards his persecutor, the tears trickling from the lashes of his dark humid eye, as broadside after broadside was poured into his brawny front.

"His drooping head sinks gradually low,
And through his side the last drops ebbing slow,
From the red gash," etc.

Presently a convulsive shivering seized his limbs, his coat stood on end, his lofty frame began to totter, and, at the seventeenth discharge from the deadly grooved bore, "like a fallen minaret, bowing his graceful head from the skies, his proud form was prostrate in the dust." "Never shall I forget the intoxicating excitement of the moment! At last, then, the summit of my ambition was attained, and the towering giraffe laid low. Tossing my turbanless cap into the air, alone in the wild wood, I hurrahed with bursting exultation, and unsaddling my steed, sank, exhausted with delight, beside the noble prize I had won."

All this is very pretty and imposing, especially the poetry. Whether the poetry and the bursting exultation go quite well together, is a point the curious reader will perhaps consider.

Odds and Ends.

AN amusing story comes from Simla, which shows that the strenuous opposition of the majority of Anglo-Indians to the passing of the Ilbert Bill is not without a cause. Treachery and cunning seem to be inseparable from the native character, and marvellous is the ingenuity with which on all occasions the Hindoos succeed in cheating their European employers. It is a well-known fact that the greatest care has to be taken in the holding of competitive examinations, as it is the amiable custom of the native printers to steal copies of the questions and sell them beforehand to the candidates. On a recent occasion one of the examiners determined that he would prevent this; and accordingly he went to the trouble and expense of having his questions lithographed. He sat and watched the preparation of the stone; he saw all the impressions struck off, counted them himself, took the printer out of the room with him, and locked the door. And yet copies were sold at a rupee each that night to the students. The lithographer wore a white suit, and before he left the room he sat for one moment on the stone.

HORNE TOOKE, whose father was poulterer to the Royal Family, whilst at Westminster and Eton Schools, was of course accustomed to associate occasionally with the sons of people of distinction, and being aware of the ridicule too generally attached to a humble origin, he found means to spare himself from all mortification of this kind by calling in either his wit or invention to his aid. Once, while a few idle boys, who had formed themselves into a circle, were interrogating each other about the rank and condition of their respective parents, one said he was the son of Sir Robert A.; the next, that his father was the Earl of B.; and the third, that his grandmother was the Duchess of C.; when it came to young Horne's turn, he observed that he could not boast of any titles in his family, and, on being more closely pressed, added, with a well-affected reluctance, that his father was an eminent Turkey merchant. This reply was both conclusive and satisfactory, for at the period alluded to England enjoyed a large share of the Levant trade, and a Turkey merchant was but another name for opulence.

IN the attack on the strong fortress of St. Fernando de Omaco, in the year 1780, an English sailor, who had scrambled singly over the wall, had, for better annoyance of the enemy on all sides, armed himself with a cutlass in each hand. Thus equipped he fell in with a Spanish officer just roused from sleep, and who, in the hurry and confusion, had forgotten his sword. The circumstance restrained the fury of the British tar, who, disdaining to attack an unarmed foe, but unwilling to relinquish so happy an opportunity of displaying his courage in single combat, presented one of the cutlasses to him, saying: "I scorn any advantage; you are now upon an equal footing with me." The astonishment of the officer at such an act of generosity, and the facility with which a friendly parley took place, when he expected nothing else from the uncouth and hostile appearance of his foe than being cut into pieces instantly, and without mercy, could only be rivalled by the admiration which his relation of the story excited in his countrymen.

ONCE, at a little dinner-party in America, one of the guests, the younger brother of an English nobleman, expressed with commendable freedom his opinion of America and its people. "I do not altogether like the country," said the young gentleman, "for one reason, because you have no gentry here." "What do you mean by gentry?" asked another of the company. "Well, you know," replied the Englishman, "well—oh, gentry are those who never do any work themselves, and whose fathers before them never did any." "Ah!" exclaimed his interlocutor, "then we have plenty of gentry in America. But we don't call them gentry; we call them tramps." A laugh went round the table, and the young Englishman turned his conversation into another channel.

FROM the beginning of the world to the time of Hierocles, in the early Christian days, mankind had perpetrated only about twenty-one jokes. During nearly five thousand years the world had only these twenty-one funny sayings to laugh at. A new joke was made on an average every two hundred and fifty years. From the time of Hierocles to the present day the number of jocose sayings has increased from twenty-one to pretty nearly twenty-one millions—an enormous proportion of this vast aggregate, however, consisting of some modification or combination of the original twenty-one.

SHERIDAN was once dining with Peter Moore, when a servant, in passing between Sheridan and the fire, knocked down the plate-warmer with a tremendous clatter. Sheridan started and trembled. Moore, provoked at this, scolded the servant, adding: "I suppose you have broken all the plates?" "No, sir," replied the servant; "not one." "Not one!" exclaimed Sheridan; "then, hang it, you have made all the noise for nothing!"

A GENTLEMAN was constantly in the habit of calling his servants before their faces "necessary evils." He quarrelled with one of them, who left him in a rage, said he was sick of service, and vowed that he would never enter it again. A few days after, his master meeting him in livery, said: "Pooh, you are gone into service again after all." "Ah, sir! I have found that masters are necessary evils."

"I DON'T take much stock in proverbs," said Brown to Jones. "For instance, look at the oft-quoted one, 'A friend in need is a friend indeed.' Now, most of my experience with friends in need has been that they wanted to borrow. Give me a friend who is not in need."

"WHAT a pity it is," said a lady to Garrick, "that you are not taller!" "I should be happy indeed, madam," replied Garrick, "to be higher in your estimation."

AN obituary notice contains the touching intelligence that the deceased "had accumulated a little money and ten children."

BROWN: "My dear fellow—two umbrellas! What on earth's that for?" Jones: "Why, in case I leave one anywhere."

A MILITARY WARNING, FOUND AT WINCHESTER.

"IN Memory of Thomas Thetcher, a grenadier in the North Regiment of Hants Militia, who died of a violent fever, contracted by drinking small beer when hot, the 12th of May, 1764, aged twenty-six years. In grateful remembrance of whose universal good will towards his comrades, this stone is placed here at their expense, as a small testimony of their regard and concern."

"Here sleeps in peace a Hampshire Grenadier.
Who caught his death by drinking cold small beer.
Soldiers, be wise from his untimely fall,
And when ye're hot drink strong or none at all."

This memorial being decayed was restored by the officers of the garrison A.D. 1781.

"An honest soldier never is forgot,
Whether he die by musket or by pot."

This stone was placed by the North Hants Militia, when disembodied at Winchester on 26th April, 1802, in consequence of the original stone being destroyed."

A PLUMBER was sent for to the house of a wealthy stockbroker to execute some repairs. He was taken by the butler into the dining-room, and was beginning his work when the lady of the house entered. "John," said she, with a suspicious glance towards the plumber, "remove the silver from the sideboard, and lock it up at once." But the man of lead was in no wise disconcerted. "Tom," said he to his apprentice, who accompanied him, "Take my watch and chain and these coppers home to my missus at once. There seems to be dishonest people about this house."

"Look to de right," said a French peepshow-man, whose box was perched upon the balustrade of London Bridge, "and I will show you de Grand Monarque of France on a horsey-back, vid all de nobility around him, and look to de left and I will show you de King of de English valking on foot, vid all de mob hollaring after him." A sailor, a true lover of his king and country, who was standing by, gave the box a push, adding: "Look you over de bridge, and I will show you your box in de water."

THE Chinese nation almost entirely clothes itself in cotton, in one form or another, warmth in winter being obtained by means of wadded garments, which are piled on until the wearer assumes something like the aspect of a stuffed doll. Hence the severity of the weather is not infrequently expressed in terms of clothing—as, for instance, "a two-coat-day," or "a three-coat-day."

AN English bishop was always very glad to see one of the clerical workers in his diocese, but the latter being rather eccentric in his dress, he was obliged now and then to administer a gentle reprimand. "Mr. X., are those white trousers quite clerical?" he once asked. "Oh, my lord, they've washed white!" answered Mr. X. "Then, sir, I suppose," said the bishop, "your tie has washed black!"

VERY thin and miserable-looking passenger in an omnibus, after half an hour's torture to every passenger: "I think it would be only fair if people travelling by 'bus were charged by weight." Stout and jolly-looking ditto: "You may be thankful it isn't so, as no conductor would think it worth his while to pick you up."

AN ingenious individual has hit upon a scheme whereby he expects to make a fortune. He will advertise largely: "For half-a-crown I will disclose a plan whereby halfpenny postage-stamps can be made to do the work of penny ones." His plan is perfectly simple, and cannot fail. Use two of them.

A POSTESS had begun a poem in uncompromising blank verse on the degeneracy of man: "Man was a noble being once; but he—". And here she was compelled to leave it. A degenerate one came in and took the liberty of helping her forward a little: "Would probably have remained so; but she—."

THAT was a fine piece of irony of Pugin's when he had got out the designs for a magnificent cathedral, to cost thirty thousand pounds, and the committee of the building fund wanted him to reduce the price to ten thousand: "Say thirty shillings more, gentleman," he wrote, "and have a nice spire!"

"How did you come to get married?" asked a man of a very homely friend. "Well, you see," he replied, "after I'd vainly tried to win several girls that I wanted, I finally turned my attention to one that wanted me, and then it didn't take long to arrange matters."

AN elderly person entering the hotel, asked a waiter what he could have for dinner. "Roastbeef, lamb, mutton and ham," replied the waiter. "Well," said the old gentleman, "I've never tasted it, but you may bring me in some and I'll see what it is like."

A SPIRIT-MERCHANT applied to a customer for a letter of recommendation of a certain brand of whisky he had recently sold him. The customer wrote: "I have tried all sorts of insect poison, and find none equal your old cabinet whisky."

AN eminent Jew stockbroker was lately asked why people preferred venison to mutton, which was much cheaper and better. "Vy, I will tell you," was the reply; "in dish vorld de peoples alwaysh prefersh vat ish dear to vat is sheep."

"MY dear Miss A.—This ring, which I would ask you to accept of me, is emblematic of my love for you; it has no end." "Thank you very much, Mr. B.; it curiously resembles my love for you: it has no beginning."

"I WISH I had lived in anger," said a little fellow whose mother had just been punishing him. "What do you mean by that nonsense?" she said sharply. "Because teacher said people should never be punished in anger."

A WIDOW, intending to succeed her husband in the management of an hotel, advertised that "The hotel will be kept by the widow of the former landlord, Mr. Brown, who died last summer on a new and improved plan."

A CLEVER witticism is attributed to the late Prince Imperial. When asked why people always said "brave as a sword," and never "brave as a cannon," he replied: "Because a cannon always recoils when it is fired."

EVERY machinist is expected to have at least one vice.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

QUESTION.

LAWYER JONES will be glad if anyone will tell him who wrote the following lines, and where they are to be found:

This box contains a man of wit;
A man of sense, a man not fit;
A man of strength, a man of place;
A man devoid of every grace;
A man of rank, a man of none;
A man who'd rather be at home;
A man of luck, a man of taste;
A man who would his country waste;
These men, when sworn, a jury make,
To clear up many a mistake.

ANSWERS.

A. J. L. M.—We do not know anything about the advertisement.

COUSIN JONATHAN.—1. A number of ingenious explanations of the origin of the sign used to represent the American dollar have been given. One writer says it comes from the letters U.S., which, after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, were prefixed to the Federal currency, and which afterwards, in the hurry of writing, were run into one another, the U being made first and the S over it. Another idea is that it is derived from a contraction of the Spanish word for dollars, and yet another that the stars and stripes afford an obvious explanation. 2. There is a very useful book entitled "Hardy Perennials," by John Wood, published by Upcott Gill, which treats of old-fashioned flowers. It contains a large number of capital illustrations, and cannot fail to give you every necessary cultural hint on each of, as you well call them, "the dear old plants."

DARBY AND JOAN.—The tin wedding day is less frequently kept than the silver and golden wedding, but may be made a very interesting and amusing celebration of the matrimonial decade. The following is an account of how these things are managed in New York: "Cards" are sent out made of tin, on which is printed a suitable inscription, and, by the way, for the benefit of all printers, I will say this should be done with a rubber stereotype, because type-metal will indent the tin. The inscription gives the year of the marriage and the current year, and, leaving out of view the material, is much like any 'At Home' card. Each guest is expected to bring a present, which must be partly or wholly of tin, and may be a tin drinking-cup worth twopence, or a costly piece of lace in an old tin mustard-box. Dealers in tin-ware prepare articles assimilated in shape to wearing apparel, laundry utensils, or furniture, utterly useless, of course, and only intended to cause merriment. Fancy a broad-brimmed hat or a flat-iron made of tin, or a writing-desk made of the same material. At a tin wedding I recently attended, a guest brought a tin pail filled with lemonade, and a silver ladle to serve the beverage. Another brought a fog-horn, such as the fishing schooners use on the high seas in thick weather, to give warning of their presence and avoid collision with other vessels. Its note is an exceedingly low C, so low that after one solo on it, the hearer would be glad to see it so low in the sea that none would ever see it again. The tin wedding is an excellent occasion for the renewal of the kitchen tins, while it affords much merriment by the ludicrous offerings which are sometimes made."

ENQUIRER.—"The Third of February, 1852," refers to the famous debate held in the House of Lords on that evening, when the Peers advocated what Lord Tennyson considered a pusillanimous and time-serving policy in regard to the then ruler of France.

ETHEL NEWCOME.—1. If the redness be round the edges of your eyelids, it is probably due to over-reading, especially by poor light or by gaslight. Always have the light coming from behind or above you when you are reading or doing fine work. You might wear "London Smoke" spectacles if you have to do much reading at night. Apply the following lotion two or three times a day; bathe the eyes with it, or else use an eye-cup as supplied by chemists. At night you may anoint your eyelids with simple ointment. The lotion is two grains of alum dissolved in one ounce of water; a chemist will make this up for you. 2. We regret that we have not space to print the poem. 3. Your handwriting is legible and good, though at present too child-like.

FRIEND IN TROUBLE.—We are not aware that the "Funeral Reform Association" advocates cremation. The secretary of the association is the Rev. F. Lawrence, vicar of Weston, York, who will give you any information. Send stamps certainly.

HIBERNIA.—Queenstown was formerly called the Cove of Cork; the name was changed in 1850 out of compliment to Queen Victoria when she visited Ireland with her husband in that year. Some wag said that the Royal couple "went to Cork to see a cove that was there."

JOAN D.—"Cantab" kindly writes that the lines,

Lightly beats the heart that never Felt the pangs that wait on love, etc.,

are taken from "Sweetly O'er My Senses Stealing," sung by Miss Paton in the opera of "Native Land," at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden.

J. G. C.—"The King Shall Have His Own Again" is an old Royalist song, dating from 1647. A modern edition has been edited by Sir George Macfarren, price 1s. If not out of print, can be had from Robinson, 95, St. Martin's Lane, Charing Cross.

MOLLYPOLLIAN.—1. The myth of "Der Erl-könig" belongs to German and Scandinavian poetical mythology. Goethe's celebrated poem has rendered this malicious spirit universally known. 2. Here are some easy subjects, which might possibly suit your essay, "Society": 1. Mourning Reform; 2. Rational Dress; 3. Good Manners; 4. The Wives of Men of Genius; 5. An Old Epitaph, "What I spent I had. What I gave I have. What I saved I lost"; 6. On the Influence of a Belief in Good Luck.

S. NORWOOD.—We shall publish the information you require very shortly, probably next week, or, at any rate, in time to be of service to yourself and other readers.

TREKLEIG.—As at present arranged, no.

TRIX TEMPEST.—Castanets can be had from Messrs. H. Potter and Co., 30, Charing Cross. They are made of hard wood, shaped somewhat like the bowl of a spoon, or of a scallop-shell. The two are hinged together by a cord, which passes over the thumb and first finger, the remaining fingers striking the two halves together, either in single strokes or in trills. Castanets are also made attached to a handle, so that by shaking the whole the desired effect is produced. Amateurs find the unmounted castanets most difficult to manage, and the string wears out, requiring renewal. Those with the handle are easily learned, and cost 5s. a pair. Those without are 3s. You would require a pair for each hand.

TWEEDLE-DE-DEE.—Cheese Canapées are neatly-cut pieces of fried bread sprinkled with cheese; here is a recipe: Cut the crumb of a stale French roll into slices half an inch thick, which put into the frying-basket, and immerse in a saucepan half full of boiling fat for half a minute, when they should be brown and crisp, but not hard. Thoroughly drain the fried bread, and cover each piece thickly with grated cheese. Sprinkle with pepper and salt, and put the canapées in the Dutch-oven before a clear fire until the cheese is melted; serve immediately.

VERITAS.—In the Times of February 17th there is a long letter to the Editor from Mr. J. C. Robinson, who is a great authority on art matters. The letter is entitled "The Conservation of Sir Joshua Reynolds's Pictures," and treats fully of the best methods of cleaning oil-paintings, relining, etc. We can give you no more trustworthy or useful hints and directions than are to be found in Mr. Robinson's letter.

WHEREFORE?—The parody of verses from "In Memoriam" appeared in Punch at the time when all the world was looking for a solution of the mysterious announcement placarded everywhere—"Ozokerit":

Wild rumours through the air did flit,
Wild rumours shaped to mystic hints,
When bright through breadth of public prints
Flamed the great word Ozokerit.

And much the peoples marvelled when
That mystic thing should come to view;
And what is it, and whereunto?
Rung frequent in the mouths of men.

WILHELM.—The opera of "Moro, or the Painter of Antwerp," was published by Cramer at 10s. 6d. nett about the beginning of 1882. It was performed by the Carl Rosa Company in January, 1882, and was a dead failure here, as it had been before in Trieste. It is never likely to be popular, for it is not at all a good opera, nor is it written in Balfe's usual style. Here is what the critic of the Musical Times says of it: "Not only has Balfe translated his style into Italian, but he has boldly pressed themes from the modern Italian composers into his service, and produced a 'musical mixture' which defies artistic criticism."

Paul's Love Token.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I.

"COME, M. Paul, you have just returned from Paris; tell me if any of the smart ladies there had a cap equal to mine?" And she placed the dainty head-dress on the top of her sunny locks, looking laughingly up into the grave face of her staunch friend, in a way that dazzled his eyes and confused his brain.

"Not one of them," he answered with a slow smile, whilst the compliment he had thought of halted on the tip of his tongue.

"They were prettier, I presume?" with a challenging glance which ought to have brought it to the fore.

"Don't know about that," digging his spade deeper in the earth; "richer, perhaps, with all their jewels, but—"

"Oh, of course, you can't think anything of mine, with a rose that cost only half-a-franc," and, snatching it from her head, she threw it disdainfully into her work-basket. "It's a pity when people come back from seeing the world only to be discontented with all they find at home."

Paul Gilbert said nothing, but went on digging till all the rich brown earth was turned up to meet the evening dew.

Ninette Duvergnay watched him admiringly, though she would have bitten her tongue out rather than confess it. He was so strong, so resolute! What he did, he did with all his might; what he said, he meant; what he promised, he carried out; and what he thought, nobody could guess. His figure was tall and muscular, his face picturesque, though scarcely handsome, with dark hair growing low on a broad forehead, and covering the lower part of his face with a thick brown beard. His eyes were brown, like his beard, with a dog-like expression of fidelity in their honest depths, but capable of flashing like a vivid flame when excited by passion.

"There, mademoiselle, it is finished," as he stooped to wipe the earth off the edge of the spade, before replacing it in its accustomed corner. "Is there anything else to be done?"

She looked round with a nod of approval.

"The beans are picked, the creepers tied up, the potato-ground dug, the caterpillars taken off the roses. Nothing more, thank you, M. Paul. You have been very good," with the air of an Empress thanking a faithful servant.

"Ah, I forgot the water!" and, shouldering a pail, he walked off between the rows of cabbages to the little stream outside. "There it is!" And he set it down with a clang at her feet, on the stone step of the vine-covered porch.

She started back with an impatient exclamation. "You needn't have wetted my shoes!"

He drew out his pocket-handkerchief. "Will you wipe them? I am so terribly clumsy."

"I'll do it for you," said a cheerful voice behind them, and Raoul Favarger, a young fellow with merry blue eyes, and a good-looking face, who had strolled into the garden unperceived, possessed himself of Paul's pocket-handkerchief, and kneeling down on the flags, wiped the little shoes with the greatest care.

"I thought you were over at Mons," said Ninette, for reasons of her own pretending to be engrossed by the new comer.

"So I was, but I tore back as fast as my legs could bring me. What for, do you suppose?" leaning against the trellis-work, his light hair shining in the moonlight.

"To be sure of having a good night's rest before to-morrow," looking demurely down at her work-basket.

"Something much more important."

"Good-night, mademoiselle," said Paul abruptly.

Accustomed to find himself in the way as soon as Favarger appeared, this evening it struck him with unusual bitterness. When his work was over on his own little farm, he was welcome to slave himself to death on Madame Duvergnay's small patch of ground, to prevent a girl's dimpled hands from being soiled; but when the work was done, the reward was for the man who did nothing. Paul loved the work, but he desired a reward. The love was chivalrous, the longing only natural.

"Good-evening," and Ninette smiled. "We shall meet at the fête to-morrow."

The two men exchanged careless nods, and Paul went away, leaving Raoul in possession.

"Ninette, you lazy girl, you haven't done a bit of work this evening," said a shrill voice from the interior of the cottage.

"It is all done—every bit of it. Thanks to M. Paul," she added sotto voce.

"Lucky dog, he always has the best of it."

"He has all the work," said Ninette remorsefully; "I don't think that's the best."

"No, the pay is best—and I mean to have the first dance to-morrow."

"What have you done to earn it?" looking up at him doubtfully from under her long lashes.

"Rushed home like a madman from Mons."

"And he worked hard all the evening!"

"Let him, he likes it; work comes as naturally to him as idleness to you and me. We have a soul above it; he has not a wish beyond it."

"How do you know?" she asked sharply, roused by perversity into taking his part.

"If he had, do you think he would go home and leave me here?" he said with his bold, bright eyes fixed on her face. "If I had twice the farm that he has, I would let the whole place go to ruin for the sake of one word with you."

"And when the word was spoken how sorry you would be!"

"Not I, so long as I had got what I wanted."

"Fancy coming back to your desolate farm, how bad you would feel, M. Raoul!"

"Not if I had you with me."

"Thank you, sir," dropping a curtsy. "You think I should help you to milk the cows, to cut the hay, and to sow the corn."

"You should help me," with a light laugh, "but only by looking on."

"And the work would do itself whilst we were talking nonsense on a stile."

"Paul Gilbert couldn't talk nonsense to save his life."

"He has too much sense."

"Does that make him as solemn as a priest at a funeral? I would rather be without it."

"How very lucky!"

"Do you take me for an idiot?" drawing himself up with a frown.

"I don't take you at all," with a charming smile. "Good-night, grannie is calling me."

"Come to the gate with me," he entreated, and she tripped down the path by his side, with her work-basket over her arm.

Raoul leant his arm on the gate, as soon as he had passed through it, and seemed in no hurry to be off.

"The first dance," he whispered. "I came on purpose to ask for it."

"I always give that to M. Paul," a slight blush stealing up her cheek.

"Then it is high time to give it to some one else; he has had it long enough."

"Quite long enough, if mademoiselle grudges it," said a deep voice from the other side of the hedge, as Paul Gilbert, who happened to be smoking his pipe in the lane, passed on.

Raoul raised his head, angry at the interruption. Ninette started, and, without a word, fled back to the cottage. He followed her to the porch.

"Mademoiselle, it may be the last we shall ever have together."

"Why?" looking back over her shoulder.

"The next day the lots are drawn, and the luck may go against me—that detestable conscription!" he muttered beneath his breath.

"But it shan't. I have set my heart on my friends escaping."

"Set your heart on me, and bring me luck. Give me the dance, and there will be no going off into exile for me."

"Nor for M. Paul?" wistfully.

"Bother M. Paul! Who cares?"

"I do," and she whisked into the house, blushing at her own confession, whilst Raoul was kept outside by the fear of the grandmother.

CHAPTER II.

It was the day of the annual fête at St. Eustache, in honour of the saint who had given his name to the little village, and as yet neither Atheism nor Communism had penetrated amongst its simple-hearted peasantry; the procession which followed the sacred banner into the old grey church was not insulted, and the subsequent dinner was eaten without the now time-honoured accompaniments of dynamite and petroleum. It was many years ago, when the conscription was in full force, and the hearts of most of the women were saddened by thoughts of the morrow, when the lots were to be drawn. Those who drew high numbers were exempt from service till the next call; but there always seemed to be more low numbers than high, and very few of the men who went up came back to settle down again to the old peaceful life at the plough.

It was a splendid day, the scorching sun beat down upon the valley, making the river glow like a flame, whilst the roses hung their heads, longing for dewy eve.

In the afternoon, when Nature was panting, and every cow had found its way to the nearest bit of water, the whole village gathered in a level meadow, fringed on one side by the stream, on the other by a coppice. The elders threw themselves down on the grass under the shade of the trees, and played at cards or dominoes, whilst the young people strolled about, waiting for the Mons band to give the signal for dancing.

Ninette Duvergny, arrayed in her best cotton gown, looped up over a red petticoat, with the lace cap adorned with the red rose stuck coquettishly at the top of her yellow curls, leant against the stem of a lime, waiting for someone who, though willing enough to do so, would not come. She looked like an impersonation of the summer brightness, with her smiling lips, her laughing eyes; her soft white skin unmarred by a furrow of care. And more than one pair of eyes rested admiringly on her slight figure, and wanted to linger, but were warned off by the frown of her companion.

Raoul Favarger had chosen to comport himself during the day as if he had been Ninette's affianced husband. His moustaches actually bristled with anger if any man attempted to pay her a compliment. In St. Eustache, lovers were very jealous of the girls they considered as their own property, so Raoul's conduct, judged from false premises, was tolerated as only natural.

Ninette, trying to pique Paul Gilbert into jealousy, talked and laughed with the younger man all through that summer's day. Perhaps she succeeded, for Paul never came near her; but if so, she was not content with that kind of success, and when the band struck up the familiar tune of "The Baker," she looked round with wistful eyes, seeking his tall form amongst the crowd.

"You needn't look far for your partner," said Favarger with a smile.

"But I cannot see him."

"Because you will look for him amongst the old women, when he is close by your side."

"I wish he were," with an involuntary sigh.

"Do you really want any one else?" his eyes opening wide with surprise.

"Not at all. Two are better company than three."

"But I could go and leave my place to another."

"Suppose you do."

"Suppose I don't, which is far nicer."

"Do you know, M. Favarger," suddenly rousing herself, "I have scarcely spoken to any one but you this whole day long."

"Am I likely to forget it?" his bright eyes fixed on hers. "I wish it were a foretaste of the future."

"Don't, for we have nothing left to talk about."

"When my tongue is worn out I shall still have my eyes."

"Not when it's dark."

"And when it is dark, my heart," his voice dropping to a whisper.

"Are you sure it is yours?"

"I am sure that it isn't."

"Then you won't have that."

"But I may have another."

"How will you get it?"

"By patience and perseverance."

"You haven't an ounce of either."

"How can you say so after last week?"

"How can I say anything else? Your paths are choked with weeds, your roses eaten up by caterpillars, slugs have taken possession of your cabbages!"

"And why?" he broke in eagerly. "If I am careless you are the cause. Come, or the dance will be over."

She looked east and west, north and south, but there was no sign of Paul, so she gave her hand to Raoul with a sigh, and, woman-like, felt inclined to be cross with him because Gilbert kept away.

When the sun was sinking behind the hills, leaving its crimson mantle still flung across the sky, Ninette was sitting on the bank of the stream, nearly hidden in a bed of rushes. Raoul was lounging stretched at full length upon the sloping ground, his elbows resting on the grass, his blue eyes fixed upon her face.

"Before the sun rises again I shall have started for Mons; before it sets I shall know whether I am to go or stay."

"You must not go."

Her heart was troubled with doubts and fears, and in the midst of her idle chatter the dread of the morrow hung, like the sword of Damocles, over her head. To-morrow she might lose the best friend that girl ever had, and to-day she had meant to make up to him for all her past ingratitude in a thousand little ways. Only Raoul had stuck to her through the long hours, and Paul had seemed to be happy without her.

It seemed so absurd to be jealous of a rival like Marie Chauchard, the deformed little girl at the post-office; but Paul had danced with her again and again, till her sad eyes sparkled with delight, and her pale cheeks flushed with happiness. It was just like him to be so kind to the unfortunate, but was it only pity that made him look down so tenderly into Marie's face?

Ninette shook her head impatiently and told herself that she was not the sort of girl to pine for a man who did not care for her—as if the neglect of a day cancelled the care of years—and turned with a sigh to the other man, who certainly seemed faithful enough at present.

"Should you mind it much if I went, Ninette?" and Raoul moved a little closer.

"Mind! of course I should. What should I do without you to tease?"

"Die! You couldn't exist. Give me that rose to bring me good luck."

"Bring it back to morrow, and tell me both my friends are safe;" taking it from the bosom of her dress.

"Both!" in angry discontent; "won't one be enough?"

"Depends upon the one!" scrambling to her feet.

"If the one were me?"

She laughed and shook her head.

"There must be another, or the fun would be spoilt."

"You wicked coquette! You only want to play us off—one against another."

"Precisely, monsieur."

"My turn to-night!" catching hold of her hand.

"Wait till to-morrow! Bring me good news, and I'll adore you. Ah, M. Paul, how you startled me!"

His face was very stern, as he lifted his slouched hat.

"Pardon, I did not wish to interrupt; I was looking for Mdlle. Marie's dog."

Away he went, trampling the rushes under his feet, and the girl, looking after him with wistful eyes, wished the search had been for her. It would have been so pleasant to be found!

When she woke the next morning, and popped her head out of the window, which was close beside her little bed, she knew that Paul had thought of her before starting. The pail, which had been empty when she went to bed, was full, the basket of food for the chickens was empty.

The tears came into her eyes as she recognised his true worth. Through all the years of her young life, he had been like a tower of strength beside her. She remembered a dreadful time, when her grandmother, over-persuaded by the practical wisdom of her eldest son, Simon Duvergny, had almost consented to let her be brought up in that prosperous tradesman's family at Mons. Paul Gilbert found the child sobbing her heart out in the orchard, and lifting her in his arms, swore that if she could find no other home in her native village amongst the people who loved her, she should find one in his little farm, where she should be brought up as his sister.

It was always so, his kindness was as constant to her as the sun through all the bright summer. He worked for her when his own day's labour was over; he had watched over her like father, brother, and friend rolled into one; and yet she delighted in teasing him—treating him to gusts of ill-temper, knowing that he was too chivalrous to resent it—laughing at him, and stabbing him with cutting words, feeling that he was too proud to show how much they hurt.

Oh, if he would only come back when the long day was ended, she would take his rough hand and kiss it, and ask him humbly to forgive her!

But repentance generally comes too late to uproot one weed on earth, though it may plant a flower in the garden of heaven.

CHAPTER III.

AMIDST a laughing, mocking crowd, the peasants and farmers from the surrounding district went up the stone steps of the Mairie at Mons to draw their lots from the lottery of Fate. Some walked in with a jaunty air, as if the laurel-wreath of glory were already dangling before their eyes, whilst others, and they were decidedly in the majority, looked as if they had left their hearts in their farm-yards or orchards, and had nothing but a limp framework of flesh and bone to offer for the service of the state.

Raoul Favarger was amongst the latter. Idle by nature, and desperately in love, it seemed to him little short of death to be uprooted from his familiar surroundings, and sent nobody knew where. He could not brace his mind to face the worst. Ninette's soft eyes and his own love of ease seemed to chain him to St. Eustache, and although he held his head high, for fear of the ever-ready ridicule of his countrymen, he went up the steps with a slow tread, as if he had been summoned to his execution.

Paul Gilbert was grave and collected. His mind was too strong to be shaken by the wind of circumstance, and his courage never failed, however black the look-out.

A pitying smile came over his face as Raoul dashed past him with a ticket in his hand.

No need to ask if he had won or lost. His face told its own story. His cheeks were white as death, his eyes fixed. He looked like a man who had been drinking for days, and yet nothing had passed his lips since the early cup of coffee in the morning.

"Courage, my friend!" murmured Paul as he laid his hand on the young fellow's arm. "There is always the return to look forward to."

Raoul shook off his rival's hand as if it burnt him, and muttered an oath—"to return when everything worth living for is lost!"

Then he rushed up the street like a madman, whilst Paul Gilbert went in to take his chance.

He drew a deep breath as he looked down at the number on his ticket. It was seven hundred and one. Only six hundred men at most had been drawn from that district, so he was perfectly safe. Free to go back and win his bride, whilst the impertinent boy who had tried to stand in his way was marching and counter-marching under the tricolour far away from St. Eustache!

It seemed like a dream, but his heart bounded within his breast with the joy of a known reality.

Meanwhile Ninette Duvergny had been all the day like a bird without a nest. Incessantly flitting to and fro, able to settle to nothing, she ran down to the gate a hundred times long before it was possible for anyone of the band which had started in the morning to return to the village.

"It is as bad as having a small earthquake in the house," grumbled Madame Duvergny, who, being frequently tied to her chair by rheumatism, objected to much movement as in bad taste. "Have you swallowed a dose of quicksilver, or taken a vow to destroy my nerves?"

"How could I sit still like a stock or a stone," exclaimed Ninette wrathfully, "when I don't know if all my friends are to be sent off to the war or not? This time next week there may not be a man's voice to be heard in the place, and that will be nice, won't it?"

"Very nice. I may chance to get some good out of my grand-child."

The girl caught up her knitting, and running out of the house, took refuge in a small arbour, overgrown with Travellers' Joy, close to the hedge which separated the garden from the lane. She tried to sing, but her voice was hoarse; she tried to knit, but she dropped her stitches; she endeavoured to while away the time in any fashion she could think of, but the hours dragged slowly by, as a cripple in a pair of heavy boots.

Presently her work fell down in her lap, and she lost herself in a dream—a pleasant dream, full of little kindnesses tendered by a friend.

The latch of the gate clicked, and she thought the friend was there. But it was only Raoul Favarger who stood in the gateway, his hair dishevelled, his neckerchief untied, his eyes red and inflamed. She ran to meet him, her eyes asking the question her lips did not dare to utter.

He showed her the ticket he held in his hand, and nodded sullenly. It was dirty and crumpled, but the figure nine was easily read, printed in black on a white ground. She caught it from him and threw it on the path.

"There let it lie," she cried passionately, "and come with me."

Murmuring gentle words of compassion, she drew him into the arbour and sat down on the seat beside him, the tears standing in her eyes as he grasped her hands in his.

"I'm done for, little one," he said hoarsely. "I've got to go, and you'll forget me."

"Never! I shall always think of you, and pray for you. Don't look like that, Raoul. It is not as if you were going to prison. You'll be a brave soldier, and we shall be so proud of you when you come back."

"When I come back!" his lips quivering.

"And Paul Gilbert?" she said timidly.

"Oh, he's right enough," with a muttered curse.

Her heart gave a bound; tears gushed from her eyes.

Raoul thought they were for him, and a tiny ray of comfort stole into his heart.

"You promised me something if my news were good; you ought to comfort me as they are so infernally bad."

Infernally bad, when Paul was safe!

Conscious of her secret joy, her heart was full of compunction. Touched by the poor fellow's despair, she let his lips rest for one moment on her blushing cheek, whilst she stroked his face in tenderest pity.

"My poor Raoul!" she said softly; "I would give anything to buy you off."

She did not hear a step in the lane, she did not see a dark head peering over the hedge and hastily withdrawn; but whilst she sat by Raoul's side comforting him to the best of her ability, she was wondering why Paul Gilbert tarried so long before he came to bring her the good news about himself.

It was some time before Favarger could summon resolution to tear himself away. As he passed through the gate he looked for his ticket, but it was nowhere to be seen.

"Never mind," he said carelessly; "if I bring myself, they are not likely to fidget about my ticket."

"And when do you join?"

"We are to report ourselves at headquarters before ten o'clock the day after to-morrow."

"Just time for your mother and sisters to stop crying and begin again."

He nodded, squeezed her hand as if he meant to dislocate every bone in it, and shut the gate behind him, then walked slowly homewards down the dusky lane.

In spite of her grandmother's repeated enquiries as to what she was doing out there, Ninette stayed in the garden till past nine, but Paul Gilbert never came. The stars peeped from amongst the patches of fleecy clouds; a missel-thrush, perched on the bough of a lilac bush, sang a song so like the nightingale's, that it seemed, like hers, to be asking for a lost mate. The joy in the girl's heart was damped by disappointment, and a vague misgiving crept over her as no eager step came hurrying up the path, and she listened to the bird's unanswered song.

"Surely he might have thought I should be glad to know," she said to herself as she turned away from the gate and went into the cottage.

The pail was empty, but she let it be. Day after day he had taken it to the brook, and she had not the heart to fill it for the first time for herself.

CHAPTER IV.

ALL the next day she looked for him, but he never came till tea was over, and she was sitting, with her knitting in her hand, under the white blossoms of the clematis. He opened the gate suddenly, and walked straight towards her, his face stern and pale, his bearing that of a man who had braced himself up to meet a crisis.

A sudden shyness stole over her, and the joyous congratulations she had prepared died away on her lips, and she only said:

"How late you are!"

"Late? Time enough to do all there is to be done." And he took off his coat. "I will finish my work first, and then come back and talk to you."

With a sense of disappointment, she watched his tall figure about the garden, whilst the stocking which she had begun to knit made but small progress. When the beds were raked, the vine secured against the white wall, the weeds pulled up, and the pail filled, he washed his hands at the pump, put away his tools, and put on his coat.

Then he came and stood before her, looking down, not at the pretty face upturned so eagerly to his, but at the small white blossoms which framed the sunny head.

"For twelve long years I have done the best I could for you, child, little as that has been. I have often been rude and disagreeable—that is my nature; but," with a slow smile, "I thought it was well for you to have a prickly hedge round you till you were old enough to know evil from good. Now it is no longer needed, so the hedge is cut down."

"What do you mean?" her breast heaving, her eyes wide-open with sudden fear.

She had never seen him like this before, and a panic seized her.

"To-morrow I start on a long journey. When I come back you will be married."

"Oh, no doubt I shall be married!" with an attempt at a scornful laugh. "Is it for an eternity that you are going, M. Paul?"

"The time is uncertain. You know I would not leave you if I were not sure you would be consoled."

He did not understand why she turned away her head so abruptly, and he must have been blind as a bat not to see how the hand was trembling which she stretched out to pick a spray of clematis. There was a sudden silence. The girl's heart felt ready to break, but she would have died rather than confess it.

He stepped back in great bitterness of spirit. After all that he had done for her, not a single word of regret or thanks.

"It is time to be off," he said coldly, "and I have much to see after to-night. Etienne Toupain will look after my bit of land, and if you want a word of advice he will give it you readily."

She bent her head, fearing to break down if she attempted to speak. Her eyes were full to the brim; if she could only keep them from running over till his back was turned!

He wondered that she could not spare him one kindly word after all these years of his watchful care. Surely the ingratitude of woman was boundless as the sea.

"Good-bye, Ninette," he said after a pause, during which his eyes dwelt on the small, sweet face he had known since childhood. "Give a thought to your old friend now and then; and if Favarger be not kind to you, tell him I will make him shake in his skin when I come back."

He held her hand in a close grip, then slowly released it, and walked away, stopping when he reached the gate to cast one long, lingering look at the little white cottage, with its air of homely comfort, at the roses in the garden which he had budded from those on his own farm, two or three years before, at the girl still standing where he had left her, under the shadowing branches of the clematis. He was giving it all up out of the generosity of his heart to his unsuspecting rival, and she, for whom he had sacrificed everything, scarcely cared to say good-bye. In more senses than one he saw that it was time to go.

When he was safe out of sight, Ninette ran into the house, and climbing up the steep staircase with unsteady steps, threw herself down upon her bed, and broke into a tempest of sobs. One word spoken in time might have kept him by her side for ever, to be the guardian of her life, but all the words in the language would not bring him back, now that she had once let him go.

She cried herself to sleep like a child, and never woke till long after Madame Duvergny's sabots had clattered about the brick floor. The window had been open all night, and on the sill lay a small packet, which she caught up eagerly, for outside of it was written, "A love-token from Paul Gilbert." She opened it hastily, her heart beating fast, but the only thing in it was a white ticket, with the number seven hundred and one printed on it in black figures. He might have sent her a rose instead of this paltry remembrance, which only served to remind her that he could have stayed in St. Eustache if he had so chosen. She tossed it into her work-basket, twisted up her bright hair into a glorious crown round the top of her head, and went downstairs to her daily duties.

All day long she thought of Paul, longing to have him back, if only for five minutes. It seemed to her now as if she must have been crazy to let him go without a word of thanks for all his endless kindness, and without a question as to where he was going, as if she had no concern in his doings.

The piece of lace which she had to finish progressed slowly, for tears are a sad impediment to work, and Madame Duvergny took her to task so often that Ninette ran away to the arbour, so as to be out of reach of her shrill voice. There was no friend to drop in and disturb her, so she worked on with unusual diligence, frightened by the failing light. The bobbins flew so fast that they became entangled, and the thread broke.

"Plague on it!" she exclaimed impatiently, when a cheery voice cried:

"Never mind."

And she looked up in amazement to see Raoul Favarger standing before her, his face radiant with joy.

"Never mind a dozen broken threads! Imagine, Ninette, I am no conscript, after all!"

"No conscript?" she echoed, as the pillow rolled down on the path.

"I went over to Mons with a face a yard long, but there I was told, to my satisfaction, that number nine had already appeared, and been enrolled. My name was down in black and white on the list; but I was free—conceive it, I was free!"

"I'm glad—so very glad. But how did it happen?" looking up in bewilderment into his excited countenance.

"I stopped to see them march by, poor fellows, and wish them good-luck, when who should I see in the second line, his head towering above all the rest, but Paul Gilbert!"

Ninette uttered an exclamation.

"Then the truth flashed across me. He is the noblest—the best of men. You asked him, and he did it for your sake."

"What do you mean?" with a gasp.

"You remember I dropped my ticket here. Well, he has taken it, and is serving under my name. It was your tears, dear one, which moved him!" trying to take her hand.

She threw off his hand, as if its touch stung her, and stepped back, her eyes flashing, her small form shaking with passion.

"And you let him go—to save yourself!"

"It was no sacrifice to him; he said so. He was tired of the place—he wanted a change, and nobody would miss him here!"

"Nobody—not even I, for instance?" in bitter scorn. "Oh, you good-for-nothing coward! Go, and never come here again! I hate the sight of you. Paul, Paul!" covering her face with her hands.

"Very well, mademoiselle," said Raoul, drawing himself up stiffly. "You lost one friend this morning. You lose your last to-night. Good-evening."

He went away, and the gate closed behind him with a sullen clang.

Sunk in a heap on the floor, her face bowed down in her lap, she was unconscious of everything else but the one bewildering, agonising fact that Paul had gone away for her sake. She saw it all now that it was too late; now that it was impossible to tell him that she loved him ten thousand times better than the other; that he made the sunshine of her life, and Raoul the shade; that even his scoldings were more welcome to her than the flatteries of the other. Too late to call him back—too late for anything but the gnawing anguish of regret.

Had she but done this or that; had she not trifled with a heart of gold, and amused herself for a day with one of tinsel; had she seemed sorry when he looked displeased; had she poured out one drop of the gratitude with which her heart was brimming; had she put aside all coquettish caprices, and shown herself the true woman she really was, then he might have been standing even now by her side, with her trembling hands clasped tight in his honest grasp, and she would not have had to call for him in vain through the long years to come.

One word too little, or one word too much, may change our life's fruit from sweet to bitter.

CHAPTER V.

"But it is absurd," said Raoul Favarger, his colour rising. "You turned the cold shoulder on Gilbert when he was here; you turn it on me as soon as he is gone. What is the meaning of it, Ninette? Do you wish to be left all alone like a hermit in his cell?"

"I am tired of nonsense."

"Then go into a convent at once, and patter your prayers from morning to night," picking a piece of the clematis and chewing it between his teeth.

"No; I'm not good enough for that."

"You can't stay on here for ever. The grandmother won't last many years longer, and you will be quite alone."

"I know," impatiently, "but I can't help it."

"You have the chance, but you won't take it."

"Do you know what would happen if I did?" fixing her sad eyes upon him impressively.

"Yes," with a light laugh; "there would not be a happier couple in St. Eustache."

"If we were always together we should grow tired of each other, so tired that we should hate each other. My temper would grow so bad that you would be thankful to get away from me to The Lion d'Or. And when he came back," her voice sinking, her eyes filling with tears, "wounded, perhaps, and crippled, my heart would go out to him, as it does now, and one day I should crawl down to the river, and stifle my useless longings in death."

"Ninette, you are dreaming!" his own voice growing hoarse, his face pale.

"No, it is a true picture of what our life would be. Marry some cheerful little thing, who would always have a smile ready for you. I should walk by your side, grave as a tragedy queen. Good-bye."

"Good-bye for the present," he said sadly, as he took her hand. "When the snow is on the ground and past footsteps are hidden, I shall try my luck again."

A year rolled by in wearisome monotony, and brought no change but failing health to Madame Duvergny. Ninette, who used to be as idle as any butterfly, had to work hard to make two ends meet, and little time was left for idle chatter. All the work in the garden had to be done by her, when the light was growing too dim to see her lace, and often when she crept upstairs to bed, with aching limbs, she used to sigh for the friend who was always ready to help her in the days gone by. Raoul Favarger dropped off like a rat from a falling house, and transferred his affections to the daughter of a prosperous farmer, who had something besides bright eyes as a dowry.

When he grew tired of his new plaything, he resumed his old habit of strolling into the Duvergny's garden, with his idle hands stuck in his pockets, and a pipe between his teeth. He would stand about watching the bobbins fly, but he never offered to turn a sod or even to fill a pail.

"What do you come for day after day?" said Ninette, angered by his indolence.

"So nice to watch a busy person, when you can be as idle as you like yourself."

"But idleness is a disgrace."

"If so I should have been turned out of the village long ago."

"Perhaps I had better turn you out of my garden?"

"Why, if I do no harm? Now if I took to doing your work, as Gilbert did, the whole village would talk, and my wife would box my ears."

The girl's face flamed.

"If you followed his example in anything it would be the better for you; but you are too selfish to stir a finger to save a friend from ruin, and the poorest excuse is better than none."

"Here, give me a spade, and I'll see to the potatoes."

"You'll do nothing of the kind. After what you have said, I would rather they rotted in the ground than that you should touch them. The gate is unlatched, and the only thing you can do is to go."

And Raoul went.

Nine years went slowly by, and robbed Ninette of everything belonging to her except her beauty. Her grandmother became very ill, and she had to put by her lace-work, on which her hopes of subsistence depended, in order to nurse her. Tenderly she fulfilled her task, but with a heavy heart. It was pitiful to see the brave-hearted girl struggling against her burden of misfortune. One hard winter succeeded another, the vine was killed, the potatoes were frost-bitten, her silver ear-rings were sold to make up for their loss, and when the spring-time came there were no seeds in the ground, and only withered stalks to show where the wealth of leaves had been.

The old woman died, calling down blessings on the head of her grandchild, and that grandchild's only wish was to be laid by her side under the snowdrops which she placed on her grave. Trials had softened her, and taught her that happiness only finds a lasting home in heaven. But there seemed to be no place left for her on earth, and it was hard to be resigned to a lot of utter desolation. The lace-pillow lay in the cupboard, which was void of everything in the shape of food, except a dry crust of bread. It was needful to work hard if she did not wish to starve, but the motive for exertion seemed to be gone when she had only herself to feed. She had just returned from an interview with Etienne Toupain, and he had willingly agreed to make all the necessary arrangements for the sale of the cottage, and advised that it should be done without delay, as the new comers would naturally like to have the garden before the seed-time had gone by.

"Any news of M. Paul?" she asked timidly.

"None, mademoiselle," said M. Toupain, scratching his head.

"And yet I thought we should have seen him back before this. Nine years is a long spell."

"Very long," she murmured beneath her breath as she turned away.

When she reached home she lingered in the garden in an unusual fit of idleness. The lace-pillow was waiting for her, but what was the good of slaving herself to death now that her poor grandmother was gone? She leant over the gate, her sad thoughts wandering to the past. How should she feel in domestic service after the happy independent life in the little cottage? How would she feel, at the beck and call of strangers?

"Good-evening, madame," said a voice which sent a thrill through her heart, and looking up she saw a soldier in a blue tunic and red trousers, a knapsack on his back, a smile of greeting on his bearded face.

"Paul!" she exclaimed breathlessly.

"Yes, Paul himself, come back to see if his friends have forgotten him. But you," his face changing in quick sympathy, "you have been in trouble. Has the dear grandmother gone to her rest?"

She nodded as she opened the gate to let him in. Speech seemed impossible, for a great lump had come in her throat.

He looked round the garden with a critical eye.

"Humph! the beginning of April, and no potatoes yet in the ground; that is a bad look-out for the summer."

"I sha'n't be here; the cottage is to be sold."

"Tis a pity that it should go to strangers," his glance lingering on the small patch of land where he had spent some of his happiest hours. "But I suppose your husband could not afford to keep up this little place as well as his own?"

"My husband?" raising her sad eyes to his, a small smile hovering round her lips.

"Yes—Raoul Favarger. I went away on purpose that you might have him."

"As if I would!"

"Good Heavens! You mean that it isn't true? You are Ninette Duvergny still!"

The sweat stood out on his forehead, and the bronzed cheek turned pale.

"Ninette Duvergny, without a friend or a home in the world!" she answered out of the bitterness of her heart. "It's a grand position, isn't it?"

"Oh, my child, is it a dream?" His voice grew husky, his rough hand actually trembled as he laid it on her shoulder. "Tell me, weren't you glad to have Raoul instead of me?"

"No, I hated the very sight of him."

"You liked him surely better than me?"

"Better than the best friend that girl ever had? Oh, why do you ask me?" and she hid her face in her hands, sobbing passionately.

Then a light broke over his face as he put his knapsack down, and, stretching out his strong arms, drew her gently to his honest breast.

"Child, I have been a fool for all these years. To think you were wanting me and I could not come!"

As the girl's tired head found its true resting-place at last on Paul Gilbert's heart, a plant of joy took root in the desolate garden, and after the clouds of sorrow "there was light in the evening-time."

A Fable.

JUST at the edge of the running brook the grey old pollard stood,
Nor bud nor leaf on the barren branch, nor life in the rotting wood,
Through winter frost and summer shine, a dreary and useless thing,
Cold to the laugh of the noonday sun, deaf to the voice of Spring.

For, bitterly thought the pollard, the comrades I knew are gone;
My acorns grown, my mistletoe dead, what boots it to struggle on?

A chaffinch lit on the pollard, with a feathery seed in his mouth
He had borne in from the affluent blooms of a creeper that loved the south.

He dropped the seedling in a rift, ere the bright wings spread for flight,
And it struck and throve in the warm hid dusk—till lo! in the April light,

A tiny leaflet of vivid green peeped from the mouldering bark;
It was fed by the shower and kissed by the sun—it was hailed by the hovering lark.

And fast and fair came bud and bloom; the tendrils twined and grew,
Till they clothed the grim old pollard in a beauty strange and new.

The half-dead heart within it, woke to its charm and grace,
As a smile at the touch of a soft young hand brightens an aged face.

Once more it loved the changing skies, once more the world seemed good,
As to the yearling oak it did, in its prime of hardihood.

A stranger passed the pollard, and looked at the lovely flower,
And tore it away from its clinging root, to pleasure an idle hour.

Again the old tree stood bare and blank—oh, it was worse to bear,
Since it lost what woke anew the sense, that Nature is rich and fair!

But because it had learnt the gift of joy, in sunshine and in rain,
And the gentle fall of the gracious dew, it would not be barren again.

It forced the sap to root and branch, and ere another May Looked down where once so grey and lone, it stood in its stern decay.

The bright oak leaves were crowning the sturdy stem once more,
Where the wild birds sang, and lit, and built, as they did in days of yore.

Book IV.

CHAPTER I. "CAN ONE HELP ONE'S FATE?"

It was very dreary at the Court. The closed and darkened rooms, the general sense of silence and desolation, all struck on Ivor Grant's own wretchedness as so many additional woes.

His mother was ill and broken, and in their brief interviews he saw, even more clearly than of yore, how heavily her secret sorrow was preying on her mind. When he could, for a time, put aside the crushing sense of his own great trouble, his thoughts always turned to this mystery at his own doors, and its association with the man whose base and ignoble nature he had fathomed to his cost.

Gradually, too, as day by day passed on, and the assurance of his own position and its attendant responsibilities came home to him, a resolve strengthened and took root in his mind, and he determined that now, as master of the Court, he should refuse its hospitality to the Count Savona, unless his mother could give some good and sufficient reason for admitting him there. The time moved slowly along, weighted with lawyers' missives and interviews, and the reading of deeds and settlements, until Ivor hated the very sight of the solemn faces and inevitable bag of documents. Meanwhile Sir Hector slept quietly with his ancestors in the old vaults of the Grants, and the new master was hailed, and congratulated, and called upon with the effusion that such circumstances always occasion. But to him it was only an ordeal to be struggled through—a sacrifice of will and inclination which he would gladly have avoided had it been possible.

"As soon as everything is settled and straight I shall go abroad for a month or two," he said one night to his mother. "I am wearied to death of all this. Why can't people let one alone?"

Mrs. Grant looked at him anxiously. It had made her heart ache many a time to note how changed he was, and she had not yet found courage to ask the cause. So this dull, ever-present sense of trouble brooded over both, and was recognised by both, yet neither dared question the other, as once they would have done.

"Abroad!" she echoed as Ivor gave utterance to that impatient speech. "But, my dear, you have been away from the Court so long! You surely won't rush off again just—just as you are master here?"

"Why not?" said Ivor wearily. "There is nothing for me to do here. Everything is in such perfect order that the veriest innovator ever born could find no reasonable excuse for upsetting existing arrangements. Sometimes I think," he added bitterly, "that I am not in the right groove. I'm tired of idleness. A good spell of hard work is what I need. 'Tis a pity I left the service; I might have exchanged."

"Ivor!"

The pained, sorrowful exclamation cut short his words. He looked at his mother and saw that her eyes were full of tears.

"Forgive me," he said gently; "I did not mean to pain you. I was always a dissatisfied sort of fellow, you know. A little change, a breath of foreign air, will do me good. I promise I'll settle down into a pattern landlord when I return."

"My dear boy," said Mrs. Grant sadly, "why are you so changed? Dissatisfied you never were—most easily contented, I think. Don't wrong yourself by saying so. But of late—"

She paused, noting with pain how the troubled look had deepened on his face, and what lines of care were round the handsome mouth.

"I—I am out of sorts, I think," he said. "Perhaps things have gone too easily with me; I don't know; and you can't expect me to be very cheerful when that dear, brave old fellow has only just left us, to learn his value, as in life we scarcely seemed to learn it. In a few months I shall be all right—just as I used to be."

But a sigh escaped him.

"Just as he used to be!" Ah, is it given to any of us to retrace our steps in life—to go back to what "has been?" To take up the tangled or broken threads and weave on the web of duty and existence, if naught had marred or crossed them? To forget the grief, amend the errors, atone for the wrongs, live down the memories?

We know it is not, though we try and deceive ourselves as Ivor tried now. Hour by hour, day by day, life drifts on as the dropped leaves drift on the current of a river—drifts on to storm, shipwreck, safety, as Heaven wills, but returns to its starting point never, never again.

And, therefore, Ivor Grant sighed even as he said those words, knowing that nothing could make him as he once had been—free-hearted, careless, content; nothing could fill up that aching void in his heart, or stifle the longing for that one sweet woman's presence which had become to him the only synonym for happiness.

"Of course, if you think it will do you good," said Mrs. Grant presently, "it is best to go away. But you are too much alone, my dear. You want society, companionship. Take some friend with you."

Ivor frowned slightly.

"Thanks, no," he said. "My own company suits me best. Besides," he added, "out of the heaps of men I know, and have known, I doubt if there is one whom I really look upon as a friend."

"Colonel Dunbar?" suggested Mrs. Grant.

Ivor flushed suddenly.

"He couldn't leave, and I shouldn't like to ask him. No; I shall go by myself. Don't think me very selfish," he added suddenly, "running away so soon again. I feel it's the best thing for me."

And looking at the pale, haggard face, and the eyes that had lost all their bright, bold beauty, Mrs. Grant knew that he was right, and that something more than his recent grief must have caused the change.

"Before I go," continued Ivor gently, "there is something I wish to speak to you about, mother. I find that my uncle was in the habit of making you a yearly allowance of five hundred pounds. But the lawyers say he has left no directions as to its continuance. I suppose you would like it to go on as before. Have you a banking-account of your own?"

"No—o," said his mother hesitatingly, and growing strangely white. "I—I keep the money myself."

"But is it not inconvenient?" asked Ivor in surprise.

He could not help wondering on what his mother spent so large a sum, seeing that she rarely bought any new dresses, went into no society, and, to his knowledge, gave very little to charity.

"I have not found it so," she said, with so self-evident an embarrassment that Ivor could not but notice it. "Your uncle asked no questions. He was always very generous."

"Do not fear I shall be less so," said Ivor hastily. "My curiosity was surely pardonable, but as I am going away I thought it best to tell you that your money would be safer paid into the bank, and drawn by cheque, than accumulating in your own hands, and a temptation to servants. But, of course, you must do as you please. The usual quarterly sum will be paid by the lawyers. We will say no more on the subject."

"I thought of asking Beryl Marsden to stay here while you are away," said Mrs. Grant timidly. "She is such a comfort to me."

Ivor turned his face aside.

"By all means, if you wish it," he answered. "I thought you would have had her here for Christmas. I never expected to see her at Vaux Abbey."

"I wanted her to come, but she refused," said his mother. "How was she? Did you see much of her?"

"As much as one generally sees of visitors at a country house," answered Ivor constrainedly.

"Does she still feel the loss of the children so terribly?" asked Mrs. Grant, pursuing this subject as if to drive away the memory of that other.

"Yes," said her son curtly. "She isn't one to forget easily—more's the pity."

"I don't think she's a happy woman," pursued Mrs. Grant unwisely. "I've always thought so. It was cruel of her husband to separate her from the boys. If they had been with her, under her own eye, things would have been different."

"Can one alter fate?" asked Ivor bitterly, as he rose from the chair and paced the room with rapid steps. "Some people are bound to be unfortunate and unhappy, to lose whatever they set their hearts on, to long and long, and never obtain."

"Do you think Beryl Marsden is one?"

"How can I tell?" he said with a little tuneless laugh. "You say she is not happy; you ought to know."

"She has never complained to me," said Mrs. Grant, looking at him with troubled eyes. "She is too proud and too brave for that. But sometimes—sometimes, Ivor, I find myself wishing she had never come here."

"Why?" he asked suddenly, pausing, and facing her with so white and stern a face that it struck terror to her heart.

"Because—oh, my dear, forgive me—she has changed you so. I must say it; I can't help saying it. Your friendship for her has cost you dear, I know."

"You are right, mother," he said with a sudden desperate resignation to the fact that his secret was his no longer. "But that's my own fault—not hers. I have been a fool, but I see my danger now, and, thank Heaven, it is not too late."

"Has it come to that?" said his mother sadly. "Oh, my boy, my boy, to think that you must suffer. Why did I ever have her here?"

"As I said before, can one help one's fate?" said Ivor wearily. "Heaven knows I never wanted to—love her, but I simply couldn't help myself. Yet she is so good, and brave, and true, that I don't think a man could be the worse for loving her. I can't pity myself, but I shall never forget her. There, don't let's talk about it," he added abruptly. "I must live it down as best I can. Only for the future I must avoid her, for both our sakes."

"She—she surely does not suspect?" said Mrs. Grant anxiously.

A hot flush crept up to Ivor's brow. Put into words his weakness looked culpable and unmanly. What weakness does not when framed into speech, and placed before our eyes as accusation instead of excuse?

"Don't ask me any more," he said huskily; "you have your secret, let me have mine. The time has gone by, mother, when I could sit at your feet and tell you all that was in my heart. Something has put me away from you, and alienated your sympathy. It seems only one of the ironies of Fate that your—friend—should also threaten to become Beryl Marsden's bitterest enemy, does it not?"

"What do you mean?" gasped Mrs. Grant, growing deadly white.

"I mean that that coward and spy, Savona, has discovered my folly, and threatened to trade on it—that is all," said Ivor bitterly. "As far as I am concerned he might do his worst, but for her sake I have had to buy his silence. You can hardly wonder though that I forbid his presence here. I am master now, and he shall know it. I have never asked the particulars of your mysterious intimacy with this man, mother, but I cannot suffer him any longer."

"Ivor," she cried, trembling visibly, "do you know how dangerous he is—what you provoke?"

"I neither know nor care," he answered with cold contempt. "He can levy blackmail on me as he pleases, but he shall not step under my roof again, or insult me with his presence—that I swear."

Mrs. Grant's face grew ghastly with sudden terror.

"Don't say that," she cried; "you don't know what you are bringing on your own head, or how dangerous he is."

"No, I don't," said Ivor with suppressed passion, "nor do I know the secret of his power over you, or the mystery that has alienated your love and sympathy from me since that ill-fated hour when it brought this man under our roof."

"Oh, hush, hush!" she cried wildly, and covered her face with trembling hands as she shrank back from that stern, accusing face. "Don't say that, Ivor, for you wrong me. If I have erred it has been only for you—only for you. Who else on all the earth have I to love and care for?"

"For me!" he echoed, and gazed at her in wonder. "I can't understand you, mother. There is no deeper humiliation you could offer than to show me that fault or folly of mine had placed you in this man's power. But I know that is not possible. I have no guilty secret on which he could trade, and all my errors have been such as I should not shrink from confessing to you, were it needful. If he is troubling you, threatening you, give me the power to rid you of his tyranny; even to shield the woman I love, I would not have my mother at the mercy of such a villain."

"Oh, hush, hush!" she cried between wild sobs that rent his heart, "you don't know what you say—you don't know what you say!"

"I think I do, and what I mean also," he answered with grave tenderness. "Come, mother, you have had the confession of my weakness to-night, return confidence for confidence. Surely you can trust me, and surely you know that it is more fitting I should fight your battles for you, than leave you to this scoundrel's mercy."

But the terrible sobs were his only answer. He could not still them, and he could not win from her even the very faintest hint of that mystery sapping her life, her happiness, her future.

The weakest woman is strong enough to guard a secret that threatens the peace and welfare of one she loves, and no man's heart ever yet fathomed the idolatry and unselfishness of a mother, any more perhaps than it can frame excuse for what is surely the sublimest folly of our erring human lives.

Grieved and distressed beyond measure Ivor leant against the marble chimney-piece waiting till his mother should have regained her usual composure; but a certain sense of injury and wrath grew stronger in his heart as he traced back his present situation with regard to the count, to that weakness which from first to last had been a puzzle to him.

But for that, Beryl Marsden and Savona would never have met, and the crafty spy would have had no opportunity for making the discovery he had made at Vaux Abbey. His mother had always seemed to him so firm and strong-willed a woman save in anything that appertained to himself, that he could not help recognising some serious and threatened danger in this mystery she guarded so closely. Understand it he could not, and so, when her sobs subsided and she regained her usual composure, he only sought to wean her from the memory of their discussion, afraid of agitating her still more by any recurrence to its painful subject.

She grew calm at last, and even began to speak of his proposed journey, and make suggestions and arrangements for it, but the usual perfect accord between mother and son was broken, something lurked in their hearts of which they could not speak, and, when they parted for the night, it was with the grave regret of misapprehension, and the first chill touch of distrust.

Mrs. Grant, wearied and spent as she was, sat up till long after midnight, writing sheet after sheet, some of which she burnt, or effaced, or tore into fragments after impatient perusal.

The firelight had almost died out, and only threw fitful gleams amidst the dusky shadows of the silent room. The noise of the pen on the paper was the only sound that broke the stillness, and the face bent over that paper was haggard and lined by the touch of some sorrow deeper than its wont, as with no eyes to watch its dreary change, the mask of pride and self-control was lifted from its features.

The night brooded in silence over the great galleries and tenantless rooms, and when her task was ended, the one watcher amidst that silence seemed overcome by sudden terror. The chill, the shadows, the loneliness, were like added horrors to the burden of her own misery. Her hands shook as she gathered the scattered sheets, and placed them in an envelope and sealed it. Then she took the candle and crossed the long, dusky room with feeble steps. Pausing before a rosewood escritoire, she proceeded to open one of its many drawers, and took from thence a paper covered with figures, which she studied intently.

"The sum will soon be made up now," she said in a suppressed whisper, which had in it more of fear than of relief. "A year—but one year more—and then freedom."

As the last word left her lips, a sudden dizziness and dimness seemed to numb both brain and sight. With one supreme effort at self-command she tried to thrust the paper back into its drawer, but strength failed her, for her outstretched hand sank nerveless to her side, and over the white face there came a change fearful and horrible to see.

A cry that was only a gasp, stifled and suppressed by the failure of life and energy, struggled to her lips, and then, strangled in its birth, died out on the empty air that refused to echo its feeble entreaty. And with that last effort of the mind that had so long ruled the body, she fell like a log across the oaken floor, and all the shadows of the dying firelight seemed to dance around her in fantastic mockery of a helplessness that was henceforth to be all she would know of life.

And there, unlocked, and at the mercy of every prying eye, lay the secret, to guard which that life had been sacrificed.

CHAPTER II. "WHEN IT DOES——"

THERE is horror and consternation at the Court when the next morning brings with it the discovery of that still and stricken form.

There is life and breath still, but that is all. The local physician pronounces it what all have guessed—"a paralytic seizure," and suggests other advice, and an eminent member of the faculty comes down from London and looks at the drawn, disfigured face and the helplessness of the limbs, and endorses the opinion of his colleague, and states that nothing can be done at present; Nature must work for herself if the constitution of the patient will allow of it. But he looks grave, and Ivor sees plainly enough that he has no hope.

Hours pass by. There is no change. There will be none now, save that last change which overtakes all humanity soon or late. For this Ivor sits watching, hopelessly, stupefiedly, as the dreary hours go on, on, on, to make up the sum of the dreary day.

The strange hoarse breathing is the only sign of life; the clenched fingers still enclose that sheet of paper whose close columns had spoken to her of a freedom which, after all, was to come from another and more powerful source than ever she had dreamt of; and feet tread softly in the darkened room, and voices are hushed as though that strange, still semblance of life could hear or suffer from their sound, and her son sits beside her like a statue of despair until the long dread day is over, and through the uncurtained window the stars look in to join his watch.

Out beyond, in the quiet moonlight, lie the fields and woods at rest. Half-despairingly, half-sadly, he wonders whenever again there will be rest or peace for him.

Again his eyes turn to the stricken figure, the ghastly semblance of the proud, stately woman who had so loved and idolised himself. Remembering the painful, sudden change in her, and dating back that change to the ill-omened visit of the man who had become so hateful, he felt his whole soul rise in wrath and bitterness against the coward who had traded on a woman's weakness for some base purpose of his own.

"As I live I will find it out!" he muttered. "He will have a man to deal with from this hour. Let him look to himself then!"

As the wrathful vow was registered in his mind there came a faint movement in the helpless form beside him. A change like a fluttering shadow stole over the distorted face, the heavy breathing ceased. The pale, cold stars seemed to reflect themselves on that paleness of the features that slowly froze into calm immobility.

No need to watch now—no need for the burdened heart to mourn its fatal secret. The cold, relaxing hand that Ivor clasps opens—not with answering pressure or comprehension, but only to leave in his the mystic numbers that were the last thing her eyes had gazed upon with any sort of consciousness.

"A gentleman in the library to see you, Sir Ivor."

It is the twilight of the next day, and Ivor Grant starts from a train of long and painful thought, and looks stupidly at the man who has delivered this message.

"To see me! What name?"

The footman offers a card.

As Ivor reads it the red blood flushes to his face. He rises with a fierce exclamation, that as suddenly prudence suppresses.

"Say I am coming," he mutters with painful effort. Then as the door closes he sinks slowly back on his chair. "I may as well face it out—it is time I forced him to speak," he says bitterly. "I can't half understand the mystery yet."

Impassive as Count Savona usually is, he can hardly repress a start of horror as he meets that changed face of Ivor Grant's. It is bloodless as marble, aged and haggard as if by years of suffering, yet so fearless in its proud composure that he cannot withhold an involuntary feeling of admiration as he meets the dauntless eyes.

"The sort of man to die game," he thinks, following up the thought by a bow and murmur of sympathy that Ivor involuntarily cuts short.

"You need offer no apology," he says, motioning him to take a chair. "Sooner or later an interview would have been necessary. As for condolences, I scarcely think they sound well from the lips that have hounded on a suffering woman to her death."

"What do you mean?" cried the count fiercely. "I—I beg your pardon," he added in a more temperate tone; "I should have remembered your recent grief, and excused any outbreak of this sort. Pray explain your strange words."

"To be brief," said Ivor, calming himself by a strong effort, "you have for several years past been trading on some secret of my mother's—a secret of which she gave me no faintest hint, and of which I am still in ignorance. How you became possessed of it rests between you and herself. I only know that your power has gradually undermined her health, broken her spirits, and occasioned her death. From a memorandum of hers, now in my possession, I find she has been in the habit of paying you large sums annually in order to buy your silence. You certainly seem to have a noble and manly method of making an income, Count Savona."

For a second the dark eyes flashed a look not good to see at the pale handsome face confronting them with so cool and cutting a contempt. But the count's plans were not matured sufficiently to allow of his losing his temper. He lowered the lids over that dangerous gleam, and said coolly:

"Your mother was a very foolish woman, and a very proud one. I am a man whose business it is to trade on such follies. She would not have purchased my silence, be very sure, unless it had been worth her while. The shame of the bargain lies with her, not with me!"

Again the hot blood surged to Ivor Grant's face, and beat dizzily against his temples.

"How dare you malign her!" he cried with sudden fury. "You cur, you hound! who make it your business to spy out every error and misfortune of the women you meet. Do you call yourself a man at all?"

"Most assuredly I do," answered the count coolly, "and a man who would make you answer for your words, Sir Ivor, were we in my own land now. You should at least be aware of what your mother's past was, before accusing me of defaming her name."

For a moment Ivor was silent. In the face of all his contempt, his indignation, his passionate anger, he yet remembered that his mother had held this man in terror so great, that her very life had paid its penalty. Remembering that, it seemed of very little use to insult or accuse one so worthless and apparently so invulnerable.

"Will you drop hints and come to facts?" he asked curtly. "Tell me what it is you know."

The count shrugged his shoulders contemptuously.

"I do not know from what you draw the deduction that I am quite a fool," he said. "The secret is your mother's—was, I should say. With her let it die. It can do you no good to learn it, and I am willing to forego its profit to me for—for sake of the friendship I bear you."

For a moment, as Ivor Grant met that mocking glance and evil smile, he felt as if the very manhood within him forced him to defy the insult of those words. He made a step forward, his hand clenched, his eyes gleaming dangerously. Perhaps the count thought he had gone too far. In any case he raised his own hand as if to warn him back.

"Stop," he said, speaking very low, "you had better not make an enemy of me. You forget Beryl Marsden."

The name was like magic. Ivor stepped back, and threw himself into a chair.

"Are you a man or a devil?" he cried bitterly.

"A little of both, perhaps," said the count with his slow, cruel smile. "I have been playing pitch-and-toss with Fortune for many years. Now is my time to seize the fickle jade. I wish to make you a reasonable proposition. Will you listen?"

Ivor bent his head. He dared not trust himself to speak.

"From what you have gleaned of your mother's affairs," continued Savona, with a rapid and somewhat uneasy glance at the paper in Ivor Grant's hand, "you must see that she deemed it worth her while to pay me a sum of three hundred and fifty pounds yearly. Her decease cuts short our bargain, that this sum was to be continued for ten years, until it reached the price I originally asked. Besides, the secret that was so valuable to her, may not be so to you. I don't say it is not, but I have another matter to settle with you, and can afford to waive bargain number one. As regards Mrs. Marsden, I would only ask if you are prepared to keep your promise made at Vaux. If it is worth your while to buy my silence, or face the natural indignation of an outraged husband."

There was a sharp and painful struggle in Ivor Grant's mind. The bitter humiliation of that moment had never been surpassed by anything he had undergone. His own natural inclination was to strike back the insult of those words on the mocking lips that had uttered them, and bid him do his worst; but Beryl's helplessness, Beryl's suffering, recurred to him. Why should he add to her misery for any momentary satisfaction of his own?

"Oh, my love, my love!" he groaned in his heart. "Fate could have given me no harder thing to do for you than this."

When he raised his head at last it was bloodless as the dead. His eyes, as he met those of his antagonist, blazed with so fierce an intensity of passion, that for an instant a chill of something like fear touched Count Savona's heart.

"The time may come," said Ivor hoarsely, "when I can answer your insults as they deserve. You know well your power when you compel me to stifle all that is manly and honest in my nature to shield a woman, behind whose helplessness you are coward enough to shelter yourself. I wish I could bid you do your worst, but as yet my turn has not come. When it does——"

The look, the suppressed passion of the tone, spoke all that was needful. Again that cold chill of fear pierced the impervious armour of his foe.

"You may do your worst," he said with an effort to appear unmoved, "when Fortune favours you as she has done me. I hardly think it is a likely contingency."

He rose.

"I need detain you no longer. My terms you will find written here, and also instructions for carrying them out. I am leaving England, but the address there will always find me."

"One moment," said Ivor hoarsely. "Before I agree to this arrangement, I require you to give me your promise in writing, and swear to it, that you keep your part of the compact. It is to shield a suffering and unhappy woman that I bind myself to so ignoble a barter, but I must see that you are bound by something more than words. You may judge for yourself how much I trust them."

"I will swear anything you like," said the count coolly. "You seem to forget, though, that it is my interest to keep your secret now."

Ivor paid no attention; he was writing something hastily at the table, and pushed it over to his antagonist as he concluded. The count glanced over the paper and signed it at once, but all the evil in his nature, and all the hatred of which that nature was capable, shone out in his face as he bound himself by the oath Ivor Grant dictated.

The young man folded up the paper and placed it in his breast, then pointed to the door.

"Now go," he said with a contempt that cut like a lash. "This is the last time you set foot over my threshold, though not—be sure of that—the last time we two meet."

And with that proud menace still ringing in his ears, the spy heard the doors of the Court close behind him. He smiled triumphantly.

"No matter," he said, looking back to the dark gables and pointed roof, and shaking his fist in impotent fury as he so gazed. "It is my day now. Who would have thought Fate would have befriended me so cleverly, or that that woman would have taken her secret with her to the grave? When I came here to-day, I feared the game was played out. But no, I hold some trumps yet. With care and caution I can make my pretty puppets dance to my tune for many a year to come."

And he turned and plunged into the shadows of the winding drive—shadows that fell into weird and fantastic shapes as they flitted among the tossing branches; shadows that had fallen across many a face and form that had trodden the long avenue; but never, never, in all their fantastic passage, had fallen across any face so evil as the one they looked on now.

A Family Feud.

(A STORY IN FIVE WEEKLY PARTS.)

CHAPTER VII.

As Harry Bradwell had prophesied, it had not been difficult to establish arrangements for a protected correspondence between himself and the girl he loved. He took Mr. Keith, to a limited extent, into his confidence, and letters came and went at frequent intervals and with perfect security through the hands of the little Scotchman.

And the epistles Harry received were very pleasant gossip ones; a brave, hopeful affection breathed in every syllable, and went far to sustain Harry's own resolution.

But a change was at hand in the ordering of Agnes Fenton's life. Hitherto her lot had been an easy and a sheltered one, with few cares and much quiet comfort. It was true that, before her meeting with Harry Bradwell, the placid routine of her days, tested by the standards of other girls of her age, might have seemed monotonous in the extreme. There was little excitement in it, and nothing of the feverish activity of modern fashion-worship. But Agnes had not been lonely. Occasionally a longing had possessed her for the counsel and the caresses of her dead mother, but even this yearning was subdued and sentimental, rather than close, and throbbing with the keen ache of actual bereavement. A man blind from his birth misses the sunlight less than his suddenly-smitten brother, and Agnes felt the loss of the parent she could but faintly recollect less acutely than she was apt to imagine. She had had her aunt to tend and help, pleasant household duties to absorb her attention, and one or two friends of her own sex in the Frome Road to share her recreations.

All this abruptly ended. The first intimation of the catastrophe which Harry received was a telegram running thus :

"Aunt is dead. She was only ill a few hours. The doctor says it was heart-disease. A great trouble."

"A great trouble!" Harry repeated. "I know it must be that, my darling girl. May a merciful Providence comfort and keep you!"

The young man determined to go to town at once and afford what assistance might lie in his power. He knew that by taking this step he might probably be brought into close connection with his estranged relative of Croyle Farm. It was very possible that Mr. or Mrs. Francis Bradwell might be already summoned to the darkened house, if not actually there. But it was not a time to stand on ceremony, or to weigh too carefully the perils and inconveniences of such a meeting. Agnes had a direct and imperative claim upon his sympathy and aid. If an awkward disclosure at Hunstone Manor came to be the result, he would solace himself with the thought that he had simply obeyed the call of duty; and he had personally no such respect for the traditions of the family feud as to object to shake hands with his uncle and discuss with him Agnes's future. So Harry hastily made the necessary preparations, and informed Sir Raymond that he had an errand in the metropolis that might perhaps detain him there for several days. Greatly to his relief, his father exhibited no special curiosity as to the nature of that errand. The baronet's mind was concentrated upon his own swiftly-increasing anxieties, and he had little interest to spare for what else might be passing around him. Indeed, had he confessed the truth, he was pleased at the idea of Harry's proposed absence again. He had begun to resent the watch which he was conscious his son was now keeping on the relations between Captain Middleford and himself.

"Very good, Harry," he said. "I hope it's no mischief that you are bent on brewing yonder, that's all—young men are not to be trusted."

"Nor old ones either," Harry mentally retorted, thinking of the captain. But he was, of course, too filially respectful to translate this sentiment into audible speech.

Arrived in the dusk of the early evening at No. 90, Frome Road, Harry hesitated a moment. He experienced a strange repugnance at the idea of ringing the familiar bell and sending the clanging unmusical echoes into every chamber of the house of death; but at last he mustered up his courage and brought the servant to the door by a quick peal. She was an impulsive, kindly-hearted girl, and she recognised the visitor at once.

"I am glad you've come, Mr. Bradwell," she said, addressing him with inoffensive freedom; "Miss Agnes is just wearying to see you, I am sure, though she wouldn't own it. Your coming will do her good. She frets as though Mrs. Holby had been her mother."

"Her aunt has stood in a mother's stead to Miss Fenton for many years; I do not wonder at Agnes's grief," Harry answered. "Where shall I find her?"

"In the parlour, sir; shall I announce——"

"No, no," Harry interrupted; "I will go in person, please," and, sans ceremony, he crossed the little hall and entered the designated apartment.

Agnes was quite alone, and the lines of her weary vigil were across her fair young brow and around her tear-dimmed eyes. With a start at the intruder's presumption she rose. Then "Harry!" she cried, and a moment later she was nestling like a forlorn, storm-driven bird, at his heart.

When the first paroxysm of emotion had died away she began her melancholy narrative.

"We could do nothing for aunt, that was the pity of it," she said; "and—and—the end came so rapidly."

"It must have shocked you terribly, dearest, I know."

"It did—it did! I shall never, never forget it."

"But you are not quite desolate after all, Agnes," the young man dared to whisper; "and she could leave you peacefully, knowing that." He longed to console her, if in ever so faint a degree, and it was with no egotism that he turned to the assurance of his own presence and love as the most sovereign balm, that he had to offer. She understood him, and was grateful for his tenderness.

Suddenly Agnes seemed to recollect a fresh cause for anxiety.

"I have sent to my uncle—your uncle, too," she said, "and I am expecting him, and perhaps aunt also, every hour. If they should meet you here!"

"That is precisely what I was looking forward to," Harry answered; "it will probably be more of a surprise to them than to me."

"Then you will not object?"

"Certainly not. I am willing to be friendly, and, as far I can,"—he was momentarily thinking of Captain Middleford—"to live in amity with everybody. If strife there is, Mr. Francis Bradwell will have to begin it; and even then, according to the old saw, it takes two to make a quarrel."

Agnes was reassured, and for the first time in the interview a smile flitted across her features.

"I am glad you are so good and generous, Harry," she said.

In due course this embarrassing interview took place, and it proved less formidable than in his secret heart Harry had expected. It was inevitable that a certain measure of constraint should figure in the early civilities and conversation on both sides. But this quickly wore away, and, almost before either was aware of it, uncle and nephew were chatting as pleasantly as if they had intimately known each other for years, and as if no family feud in the ranks of the Bradwells had ever existed.

The problem which occasioned of necessity the gravest discussion was that of Agnes Fenton's future. If Harry could have seen his way to an immediate marriage he would eagerly have proposed that solution. But with the fear of his father before his eyes, and the conviction—in spite of his sanguine youth—upon his heart that it might be years yet before the recompense of his devotion to law would justify him in taking a wife, he was compelled to refrain.

"I'll tell you what Agnes must do," said Mr. Francis Bradwell at last; "she must just come home with me to Croyle Farm. We've room enough for two such dainty lasses. We'll see then if we can't put some healthier country tints upon her cheeks. Why, I should grow thin and yellow myself, I know, if I were stifled up amongst these city chimneys for six months. Agnes will be very welcome to such hospitality as we can offer, and she'll not be many leagues removed from the manor, nephew."

As the farmer uttered the last sentence, by way of recommendation to his project, a queer gleam of humour was twinkling about his mouth and in the depths of his honest grey eyes. He looked Harry hard in the face. He could guess that to his listener there was a perplexity as well as a pleasure involved in the fact referred to, and Harry understood both the words and the glance. He shifted uneasily in his seat, comprehending somewhat of the perils of the new situation. But even had he wished to do so, it was not for him to raise objection against so reasonable and generous a scheme. Except in his own selfish cowardice he had no possible ground for any opposition. He remembered the old proverb that "Beggars cannot be choosers." If Agnes would be happy at Croyle Farm—of which he had small doubt—it would be advantageous as well as fitting for her to accept the kindly offer.

"I shall be able to see her when I am at home, of course," Harry answered valiantly, though with a perceptible drop in his tone, which was not lost upon his uncle; "and—and—I trust I may by-and-by—very shortly, indeed—be in a position to suggest what to me personally would be a still more agreeable settlement."

"A more permanent one—eh?" said Mr. Francis Bradwell, subduing a tendency to a laugh by the timely recollection of the place and the circumstances. "I hope so, too, for your sake, I am sure."

There was real warmth of feeling in the farmer's speech. Being a man of much native shrewdness, he had taken the measure of his young relative's character with tolerable accuracy, and had been very well pleased with the result.

Within a fortnight Agnes Fenton was domesticated at Croyle Farm.

CHAPTER VIII.

AMIDST the countless differences betwixt town and country life, there is one that frequently escapes the notice of the enterprising house-agent bent on successfully advertising his own particular locality. In the town a man or woman's business is usually individual and self-centred. Their affairs (unless they happen to be public folk, such as cabinet ministers or burglars) are of moment to themselves alone. In the country everybody's business is understood to be largely his neighbour's likewise; and it is the occasion of grave offence to object to the satisfying of a very painstaking and elaborate curiosity. Your true nineteenth-century hermit must needs reside in a great city. There he can meditate at leisure in his tub, and so long as he obstructs no thoroughfare, and does not fail to buy his peace punctually of the tax-gatherer, will be passed and repassed without so much as a thought being cast in his direction by other units—busier, but perhaps scarcely less lonely units. The great tide of human existence will ebb and flow about him day by day, year in, year out; and he can stand unmoved, and hear its roar, and watch its eddying currents, and scowl at its vanities, and scoff at its sorrows. He is isolated—undisturbed.

In the country the case is altered. Villagers believe in community of information, if not of goods, and the sayings and doings of a would-be recluse are discussed and investigated like any other puzzling phenomena. He must run the gauntlet of perpetual criticism, and be always armed against surprise. In a large town the advent of an extra stranger or two calls for neither comment nor enquiry. In a rural district the arrival of even a chance visitor sets tongues a-going and kindles a novel interest and excitement. It was so at Hunstone. Agnes Fenton had not been domiciled under her uncle's roof four-and-twenty hours before the rumour of her presence had travelled into the farthest confines of the hamlet; and in some inscrutable way her name came to be linked with that of Harry Bradwell.

Captain Middleford heard it, and first doubted and then rejoiced. The captain was not above the petty meanness of employing spies when he had any end to serve. In congenial company he had sometimes boasted of a silver key that would unlock most doors, howsoever guarded, and in this instance he bribed more than one servant at both the Manor and the farm. He discovered that beyond any question there was at least a modicum of truth in the village tales, that Harry paid surreptitious visits to his uncle's home, and that Agnes was repeatedly alone in his company.

"Hurrah!" cried the delighted intriguer in a burst of triumphant soliloquy. "I have you on the hip now, my fine young fellow, cunning as you think yourself. You dare to threaten me, indeed! You'll find that that is a game which a couple can play at."

He lost very little time in acquainting Harry with the extent of his knowledge. He stopped the young man in one of the Manor corridors, and made him a mock bow, with malicious and unfathomable hatred beneath its veil of irony.

"So, Mr. Bradwell, I hear you are engaged to be married, and to one who is almost a kinswoman. Let me congratulate you," he said; "but—but," sinking his voice to a satirical stage-whisper, "shall I venture to offer my felicitations to your father also?"

The colour first vanished from Harry's face, and then came back in a fast and furious tide. He had not looked for this exposure so soon, though fully conscious that he walked amongst pitfalls. He hesitated a little, and his fingers involuntarily clenched themselves. He would have liked to have taken this smirking, supercilious enemy by the throat.

The captain observed his discomfiture and revelled in it.

"But perhaps you would prefer that this were delayed for a space, until the preliminaries are more fully developed and the arrangements completed for the—ahem!—joyous surprise?" he continued.

Harry's anger burst through the restraints of prudence. Let the worst come to the worst, he would yet defy his antagonist. The indomitable Bradwell pride was in his nature as well as in his parent's, and it forbade him even to attempt to purchase the silence of such a villain.

"That must be at your own discretion, Captain Middleford," he replied. "I decline to discuss the subject with you in any shape. In fact, I decline to discuss any topic whatever with an individual I so thoroughly despise. I must ask you to let me pass."

"Fool!" muttered the captain under his breath as Harry strode away. "Fool! stiff-necked, obstinate, conceited idiot! But I'll humble your haughtiness yet, my fine laddie; I've a splendid weapon here, all ready forged, to my hand."

It is possible that Captain Middleford might have gone direct to his host with his budget of disagreeable intelligence, but for other and kindred concerns which at this instant were engrossing his attention. The adventurer had played his cards well, and had already a tighter grip upon the Hunstone Manor estate than anyone, except his dupe—and even he preferred to ignore the ugly truth, and as far as possible to live in a dreamer's paradise—suspected. The village postmaster's contempt for Sir Raymond's acumen and sagacity would have been intensified fourfold if he had guessed the complete extent of the baronet's embarrassments.

But Captain Middleford was not satisfied. His conscience had long ago been seared as with a red-hot iron, and no twinge of compunction visited him as he planned the final and irremediable ruin of his victim. He had on foot a crowning scheme which, if he could only induce Sir Raymond to embark the remnant of his fortunes therein, would achieve this end with speed and certainty. Then, with his pockets amply lined, the victorious scoundrel would betake himself to pastures new.

The prospectus of the Drincorra Mining Company certainly read well, and its promises had just that alluring mixture of fact and fiction which limes in moments of sudden impulse the incautious and unsophisticated speculator. Sir Raymond Bradwell would none knew better than Captain Middleford how surely he was to be identified with the first-mentioned unfortunate.

There were sundry important details, however, still to settle before submitting the trap for the formal examination of the prearranged dupe. One or two influential names were required to fill up vacant lines on the front page of the proof-sheet, and in case of an awkward extension of investigation it was advisable that the company's offices—very temporary ones—should exhibit all the signs of a large and bustling activity. For these reasons a visit of the Drincorra's chief projector to the metropolis was necessary. The captain left Hunstone for town within a couple of hours of his conversation with his host's son.

He was in an exceedingly jubilant mood. The broad smile upon his face appearing unexpectedly on 'Change would assuredly have sent up any shares in which he was understood to have an interest. He entertained no doubts of his success, and at a grand coup he would be wealthy again. Insensibly the coming triumph gleamed in his eyes, and cast a shadow of arrogance beforehand over his whole mien.

"I suppose I ought to bring Huke in so as to obtain some trifling share of the spoil," he murmured in the obscurity of his cab. "The fellow deserves that much by way of recompense; his money has pulled me through many a tight door, and—and—it'll help, probably, to put that other ridiculous notion out of his head."

Quickly the captain attracted the attention of his Jehu. "Drive to No. 15, Sussex Row, East," he said.

Sussex Row was a dingy, low-browed street in that terra incognita to fashionable folk, the East End of London; and No. 15 was as dingy and low-browed an edifice as even Sussex Row could exhibit. Captain Middleford alighted, paid his cabman, and walked into the half-open pawnbroker's door. An under-sized, ill-fed lad, in clothes plainly descended from an elder brother, appeared from the rear.

"Want Mr. Huke, sir?" he asked, and without waiting for a reply he gave a tug at a shrill little bell. A heavily-built, flashily-attired personage, with a decidedly Jewish cast of countenance, descended a side stair.

"Oh, oh, Captain Middleford! How do? This is quite an unusual pleasure. Come in, come in," he said, and with effusive politeness he seized his visitor's hand and well-nigh dragged him into the region of semi-twilight behind the store. Here a girl's form was visible to the accustomed eyes of the guest.

"You are as well and as blooming as ever, I hope, Miriam," said he; "but I can easily observe that there is no doubt about the latter fact." A flush and a quick upward glance showed that the compliment was properly appreciated; but Miriam volunteered no other answer.

"You have come on business, of course?" enquired the usurer.

"I have, and on business of importance, Mr. Huke."

Miriam interpreted this enquiry and reply, according to long wont, as a signal for her departure. She took her homely appliances of needlework and withdrew to an upper apartment. Her father watched her retreating figure with a look of peculiar fondness and admiration upon his swarthy features.

"That girl, though she is my daughter, is worth her weight in gold," he said in a strangely significant whisper.

"I can well believe it, Mr. Huke—maybe in two senses," answered the captain, with a forced attempt at a jest, which did not quite hide the annoyance and anxiety vibrating in his tones. "I have to be away in something considerably under the hour to catch an early train," he continued, as if desirous without delay to change the subject. "Do you mind looking at these papers?"

The money-lender took the proffered sheets, and for a minute or two there was silence in the room.

"You will reap a golden harvest again here, Captain Middleford, by a little strategy."

"I think so; and you, too, if you can supply capital for our start on pretty easy terms."

"Say, rather, on pretty risky terms."

"The risk is inevitable. But it will not alarm you. If you object I can apply elsewhere. Your silence is secure anyhow, for I've too many of your own secrets at my command to make treachery a paying game."

A black cloud stole over Huke's brow.

"Oh, I see, you have succeeded so well that you can afford to despise and toss aside now your old tools, captain. That is true British ingratitude. Well, well; fulfil your other promise, and you shall make what bargains you please."

"What promise do you refer to?"

"Marry my daughter, Captain Middleford, and make a lady of her. She will never disgrace you, and I'll never ask to come to dinner with my son-in-law. The contract was clear enough—keep it."

"This is absurd, and past all patience, Huke; I thought all along you were—joking." The quiver in the captain's voice proved that he lied.

"I! Joking! You know better. Didn't I find you loan after loan on those very terms? Haven't I lost the money?—and you pleaded for delay after delay. Do you dare to deny this, and refuse to marry Miriam?"

The captain feigned a passion in his turn. "I do," he said.

CHAPTER IX.

HARRY BRADWELL hurried away to his own room in no very enviable frame of mind. It was evident now that the catastrophe—if such it should prove—of open disclosure was very close at hand. It would not be possible to stave off an explicit avowal of his acts and his intentions for many more days, if even hours. He must prepare himself as best he could to meet the inevitable storm of his father's fierce upbraidings. He must be ready to take his departure, if so commanded, from the ancestral home. This had been the punishment of better men than he for an imagined mesalliance, and he entertained but a faint and wavering hope that by some chance he might escape. Luckily, the existence of the entail would prevent any permanent alienation of the Manor estate from the rightful heir. Whatever happened at the present juncture of affairs, he could still expect some day to bring his chosen bride home in triumph to the familiar mansion. But in the interval how heavily this might be encumbered! Again his thoughts busied themselves with Captain Middleford, his father's enemy (if only Sir Raymond could be brought to believe it) and his own. With difficulty he repressed a curse upon the man who had wrought so much evil already, and who was not yet content. To the captain's machinations he owed the immediate presence of this awkward dilemma. He readily guessed that, personally or by deputy, the captain had maintained a guard upon his every movement, and watched with deliberate desire to take him at a disadvantage. He had succeeded only too well.

But Harry did not stay long to mope between walls. He philosophically assured himself that it was useless to cry over spilt milk. He had the future to face, and if the captain were minded to play his game of personal revenge out to the bitter end, it struck Harry that it might yet be possible to discover some useful and effective counter-move. The idea occurred to him to anew consult Mr. Keith. The shrewd little bookseller might have gained access by this time to fresh sources of information, and in any case was a safe and valuable ally. The notion was no sooner conceived than Harry proceeded to carry it into effect.

On his way through the courtyard he encountered his father. Sir Raymond was dressed for a journey, and his favourite dog-cart stood waiting.

"You won't care for a ride to Sellworth with me, Harry, I suppose?" the baronet perfunctorily asked. "You young fellows like to hold the reins yourselves if you go into strange neighbourhoods. I dare say you imagine it's derogatory to masculine dignity to sit quiescent beside an elder."

"I have never said so, sir; nor, so far as I know, thought so," Harry answered.

"Ah well, it's natural; it's natural! I see you don't accept my invitation. By-the-bye, I'll thank you to tell Roberts that I shall not be back, probably, till late."

"I will tell him, sir."

The next minute the gate opened, and the baronet, his equipage, and his groom, vanished around the corner.

A spasm of relief spread itself from Harry's heart. Clearly his father had not yet been made acquainted with the enormity of the son's offence. Youth is sanguine, and eager to accept the lull in any storm as the harbinger of possible peace. But common-sense soon showed him that the delay was but a slender foundation for the hope of an avoided quarrel. Half-a-dozen words would doubtless have sufficed to have changed Sir Raymond's smile into a scowl, and his good-humoured words into the utterance of bitterest anger. Those words might soon be spoken.

Mr. Keith was in his shop, an establishment too important a factor in the village economy to be long neglected by any proprietor. He could see at once that Harry was greatly preoccupied, and putting this fact side by side with the tales which had recently reached his ears respecting the doings at Croyle Farm, he drew his own conclusions. Like those of the canny Scotchman generally, they were exceedingly close to the mark of actual circumstances. Harry discussed the weather and the state of trade in as matter-of-fact tones as he could muster until a waiting telegraph-messenger had gone off to the vicarage with a bulletin from Switzerland. Then he warily approached the business of his errand.

"Have you discovered anything else concerning Captain Middleford and my father, Mr. Keith?" he asked.

"Very little—nothing to the captain's credit."

"Probably you are of what is now strongly my own opinion—that that would be almost impossible."

"Decidedly I think so."

"I want to get up a case against him if I can, and any fresh help you can give will be most gratefully received. I shall do my best to awaken my father to the captain's true character."

"You will have a hard task. Sir Raymond is obstinate, and will resent such a questioning of his judgment. But maybe you've little or no choice."

It was a bold bid for confidence, and it succeeded. Harry smiled wearily.

"I see you have a clue already to the situation," he said. "Let me show you more clearly how it stands. I can trust you, I know." And he ran rapidly over the outline of his two quarrels with the adventurer, revealing just so much of the tender romance of his love-story as was necessary to afford coherence to his narrative.

"The fellow is a villain," said his listener; "everything I hear of him from every quarter tends to prove it. He will play you the worst trick that lies in his power, and it seems to me he has a very awkward opportunity, if he has found out as much as you fear."

"I am sure that he has."

"Whew!"

"That is what makes me so anxious to win the move, if I can only manage it," Harry cried hoarsely, his excitement rising to a painful pitch and contrasting curiously and dramatically with the unruffled outward serenity of his listener. "I have even harboured thoughts of violence occasionally," he added.

"That mauna be resorted to," said the postmaster firmly, using once more the idiom which was almost his only sign of strong inward emotion: "that'll cure no evil."

"The temptation is great."

"Maybe, maybe. Just say it nay. Weel, weel, I'll think the matter over, and to-morrow I'll gie ye my advice, and on a bit paper all I've learnt of the captain's doings and am prepared—if required, ye ken—to swear to."

"Thank you very much, Mr. Keith."

Fate made that promise of no avail.

Harry wandered away into the Hunstone woods, and wrestled with his problem amidst the singing of birds and the gunt of silvery sunshine. But to-day no voice of Nature seemed to offer help, or had the least power to bring consolation. The question arose whether he should go across to Croyle Farm and consult Agnes Fenton on this new phase of the old difficulty. This he decided in the negative. It would vex and worry the girl to no good purpose. Harry held the simple old-fashioned creed that it is the man's duty to bear the burdens of life unflinchingly, and where in anyway possible, uncomplainingly. He would endeavour to practise that which under other circumstances he would have preached. Harry Bradwell had a vein of chivalry, as well as much valour, in his nature. He would spare Agnes any trouble that was not absolutely unavoidable. Here, as he considered, was a test of his regard; and he stood it triumphantly. It was possible that Agnes might have viewed the case from a different standpoint.

The young man ultimately went back to the Manor, and, after a late and lonely luncheon, shut himself away from interruption in the seclusion of a private upper apartment. The characteristic caution of the aged Scotchman in selecting the "bit paper," whereon every word could be weighed and suitably adjusted, as the medium of his volunteered evidence, had fired Harry with the spirit of emulation. He would marshal his facts and his deductions in black and white likewise. He found ink and a writing-desk, and set sternly to work to fashion a formidable and telling indictment. Whatever might be Harry's own fate, if the captain escaped a fall in his own turn it should not be the fault of either of his accusers.

Night fell, and the wan young moon riding overhead looked down on Sir Raymond Bradwell driving homewards with little thought of the tragedy even then being enacted beneath his ancestral roof. The baronet had gone to Sellworth on some pressing county business, and, by reason of this interposition of other cares, had gained a brief respite from his private anxieties and fears. This was over now, and the Hunstone magnate sat moody and silent beside his servant for mile after mile. Once or twice the man ventured a remark, but the answers were curt and impatient, and not of a character to induce further conversation. Sir Raymond towered aloft on his box-seat like a veritable statue of resentful despair.

And there was occasion for his gloom. Of late every speculation in which he had embarked had turned out badly. "These Drin-corra Mines seem to promise grandly; if they should after all go amiss I shall be ruined," he murmured once, in far too low a tone for his groom to hear. "But Middleford knows, and he says they are a capital investment. I mean to try them."

The house looked strangely dark as its master came in sight of its noble front.

"I expected Captain Middleford would have returned before me," he said; "but I suppose he has been delayed in town, else there would be a light in the drawing-room or library; and I dare say Harry, too, is out."

Sir Raymond hurried across the hall, and noted with surprise, and a presentiment of some disaster, that the library door stood ajar at the end of the long passage, and that papers lay on the floor within. He traversed the corridor, and then a cry of horror and amaze escaped him. There, at the foot of an oaken armchair, lay Captain Middleford's unconscious body. An awful crime had been committed.

Love.

My love is steadfast as its source is pure;
My love is glorious as its source is bright;
My love, as seeking not its own delight,
But rather her sweet safety to ensure,
Her gladness in life's turmoils to secure
Is fitted so, to meet the angels' sight,
Who hover round her fair head day and night.
Strong as the Heaven that guards her to endure,
Darling, my stream of fate may ebb and flow,
May flash in sunshine, or go down in gloom;
So nothing touch thy soft unruffled bloom,
Or mar the sweet serene I worship so.
Only give this, my one sufficient need,
Saying "such love as his was love indeed."

"When the Gorse is Out of Blossom."

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

EASTER had gone by rainy and cold, and the birth-time of the year had been a wretched time. Now the spring that poets love to talk about was over all the land; the season when even the pulses have a trick of leaping as if to join hands with their bygone youth was in supreme reign. The long light days were in; the sweet white evenings, when the declining sun leaves a pale, ethereal, high radiance in the air, lingered on and on, as if night were but a misty phantom to be easily exorcised out of ken by a steady front.

On such a pure white evening some girls and youths had been singing to the accompaniment of an old piano in a north-country farmhouse. The piano was, to put it mildly, the worse for wear, seeing that it had served the house-mother when she was a girl, and, besides that, its present home was in a windy lane and near by a tempestuous shore. Stern Atlantic gales swept up from a sandy coast, over rising fields of corn and cabbages; trees were few, and the strong stone farmhouse might have been a thing of lath and plaster, so fiercely did the sea-born winds tear and rush through its crevices.

No matter how it came about; in the course of the singing and the chattering, one girl, a southerner, cried:

"You should see the gorse at home!"

"Eh! should we? D'ye think we've no good gorse down here?"

The speaker was of the country, with speech to the point and with decision marking her altogether. Nevertheless, her sharp words were uttered in a strangely soft voice; one does now and again hear these soft musical voices. Most of the Sefton women had them, but the Sefton men either never were so gifted by Nature or else the daily shouting across the windy fields had rasped away all gentleness of tone from their throats.

"I don't say that, but you should see our Kentish gorse; all the year round we have it in a way."

This girl, Patty McEwen, was a cousin of the Seftons; her mother was a Sefton. She was in the north on a visit.

Jim Sefton answered her. "Do ye now, Patty, think we have any one good thing up here? Eh, but I know what rain is in February down your way! Slush, and sludge, and mist, and misery. How does your gorse look then?"

"Well," the girl ruminated. She had some love of teasing, and to drive Jim on to some cutting remarks in the vernacular was a dear sport of hers. "Well," she repeated, "damp, rather; such of it as may be so foolish as to have come out. Come it must, though, or the song makes nonsense."

"Eh! what's that? A song about gorse?" put in Phillis.

"Ye know as well's Patty. Just th' old rhyme, I take it, she'll be after." Jim was very broad, though to speak well and to be educated was a point with Farmer Sefton and his wife.

"I never took much to heeding rhymes," said Phillis, in her soft tones, but her strong way.

"And I always catch them up," cried Patty. "You know this, surely?" Her brown eyes laughed, and she looked at Phillis and past Jim to another young man, who was also a farmer's son, but no relation. "You've heard it."

"When the gorse is out of blossom,
Then is kissing out of fashion."

"That? Eh, I'll know that, of course. It'll just be the sing-song way of stating an observation upon human nature." The soft voice went steadily on, but the girl's fair face took a heightened colour.

"Queer," said Jim. "Then, I'm thinking we ought t' have precious little of that amusement oop here; we've little enough of t' gorse. Ha, ha!" This jolly laugh rang through the open window, and was heard as "Jim Sefton's laugh" right down the lane.

"The gorse," and Patty demurely nodded her gay head at her cousin. "You are coming back with me, and mind you don't say 't' gorse,'" mimicking him, "down in Kent, or the folks will be asking me for an interpreter."

"It's little of me Kent 'll be seeing!" retorted Jim. He was angry—with himself most of all, for having done the very thing he was fighting against. Patty to him was a delicate rare creature, a being of most sweet refinement; in fact, something which, to his harsh self-judgment, was as far above him as a lady is above a serf. She was his cousin, though, and there had been moments when his humility had been forgotten, and when he had seen himself as a sort of guardian over her. Such a hit as she had just given him annihilated that vision. Ass that he was!—that broad accent of his was simple carelessness, boorishness—he was in a rage with himself. He went on, however: "The ways o' Kent won't suit me—leastways I'll not be suitin' the foalks there! Ha, ha!" and he pushed his hands into his trousers-pockets, having in his anger passed the bounds of common civility.

Patty had flushed red for a second, then she drew up her small, slight figure. How dignified these little women can be when once it pleases them to assume dignity! She would vouchsafe no word of retort to this cousin of hers, though it was on the tip of her tongue to cry, "How rude you are!" She made a circle outside the offending Jim, and walked coolly round him to the far side of the piano.

"My property is all over the place," she said carelessly; "let us get it together a bit, Phillis; there will be no time to-morrow for hunting it all up. Dear! to think I am going home the day after! It is to be hoped the entertainment to-morrow will be extra good, as I am honouring it by staying for it!"

The entertainment was no more than a penny reading, which, being the last of the winter series, was intended to be a better thing than usual.

The strong west wind was blowing in from the sea when these same four started to walk over the fields to the village school-house on the following evening. Spluttering April showers, and flashing golden sunshine, had given the last day of the fitful month a kind of dashing bravery for its exit, but the bright white light laughed at rain and sunshine alike and held its own fair supremacy as they walked over the vast level fields. Grey night stole up from the east, but the clear spring light and the windy, scarlet clouds of sunset seemed to laugh the dimness to scorn.

Offence between Jim and Patty was over, of course, but my lady tossed her gay head—metaphorically, we mean—and seeing they soon fell in with friends, gave the benefit of her society to them rather than to her cousins. She was not a heroine at all, this Patty McEwen, but just a girl who had a glad life, and so far had never had any stern gravity forced upon her. Perhaps she was a bit superficial—certainly she had not the strength and repose about her which Phillis had—never mind! she had a true and tender heart, and if she was foolish sometimes now, that was no reason why in the future she should not be wise.

At the moment she showed her folly by leaving Jim—Phillis had a companion—and going to the friends. With them she laughed, and being a pretty, bright girl, was made much of by them.

Meanwhile Jim Sefton strode on by himself; like the people of the north he could hold an iron control over himself. Not that the moment in question held any point which needs so tragic an expression in reality, yet, as Jim during the last twenty-four hours had opened his eyes to a painful fact, he did vaguely feel himself the hero of a tragic fate. So strong and so big was he physically, so simple of heart at the same time, that last night, when Patty had talked so carelessly about going home, the giant Jim had fallen speechless, and had felt a big lump rise in his throat.

"Wae's me," he thought, "that I should have ever seen the lass!"

And here he was striding along almost by her side, so to speak, and he dared not speak to her! He watched her gay vagaries, and he heard her wild rattle, and—well, he would have given his very soul for her to laugh at him, or to lecture him, or to order him.

He would have loved to fight all those other fellows too—they whom she laughed with. What was their liking to him—his love? Poor Jim! Love was a hard tyrant to him that night.

He had to walk over, and to behave like a—“like a nonentity,” he said to himself, for he had to sing. Yes, Jim Sefton had a fine tenor voice. Nay, for a village concert to get Jim’s name down as performer meant glory, success—everything that a village concert wants.

Well, he did his best, and his best was very good indeed; but, as regarded Patty, his cousin, he never, as one might say, came to the front at all until the last moment before getting home. The friends had dropped off by twos and threes, and the Sefton party was left alone.

That means still the same four, because, though young Jack Thomson was no Sefton, he always did walk up to the farm-gate with them if Phillis made up one of the party. It gave him a mile walk back, but what is a mile or two to a young fellow when such as Phillis Sefton is by his side for the half of the distance?

These two were behind; Jim and Patty walked on more quickly in front. The wind had risen again and came sweeping like a giant over the fields of young crops as if it would tear every green blade out of the earth.

“It’ll be a rough night—that will it,” said Jim.

“Will be?” accented Patty. “Is, I should say.”

“This is naught?”

“Naught is a very rough customer, then.”

Whereat Jim felt as if he would like to shield her by putting his arm round her, while she hugged herself in her thick ulster and tripped on front of him.

“There is a gale on its way. Eh, but I’d like just the measure of learning to know the winds and their courses like those Yankee chaps! Yes, they’re mostly right, and this time they’ll be right again. This’ll be the beginning o’ the gale. My! won’t it touch us up by the morning.”

“Have you changed your mind, Jim, and are you coming?” Patty had to shout her question, the wind was so loud and gave such puffs and snorts. “You’re bound to come one day.”

“Eh! I’ll be coming one daay.” Jim fell into broad Lancashire, being taken aback by her graciousness.

“To-morrow?”

“No.” He jerked his head. “No, not just that. Kent will see me when—when—”

“When?” called Patty from the front.

“Can’t say,” he answered doubtfully.

“When?” And the girl, her love of teasing him excited by his manner, turned and faced him. Her hands were in the side-pockets of her ulster; her close cloth cap that matched it was well down on her small head, but the wind tossed her hair about. Loose brown locks flew around brow, and ears, and throat; still, her trim, alert, mischievous young self stood firm, and her merry eyes dashed railery at the unfortunate Jim.

Yes, “unfortunate.” In her facing him he lost courage. He actually trembled before the girl; he lost speech, and his fair weather-tanned face turned crimson.

“When?” she repeated.

“Eh, laass!” he sighed, dropping helplessly into the broadest provincialism, “that I’ll no—not,” he corrected himself, “be able to answer ye! There! the likes o’ me’ll not be of your sort. No; I’m best out of Kent.”

“Oh, very well!” flung she, and ran on.

No such storm as that which raged over the Lancashire coast that night had been known in the memory of man. The destruction was measureless. Lives were lost, trees were uprooted, roofs were flung bodily to a distance, sheaves and ricks had the thatch torn off them, gardens were swept bare.

Farm-hands were up all night. At the Haigh Farm, Sefton’s place, old Sefton and his sons worked like slaves to save things. No such mighty stacks of hay were in all the country round as theirs.

They saved all.

But the price—!

Ah! Jim Sefton was reaching up from the topmost rung of a ladder bracing the end of a stack, when a sweep of wind bore down upon him. There was no time for anyone to call to him, no time for thought; he was flung like a wisp of straw to the ground.

They took him up groaning.

No legs were broken, no arms were broken, but he moaned in anguish and lay like a log.

Another spring came.

For nearly a year had Jim Sefton lain on his back in the old farmhouse. Death was not coming to him, but a life that to his vigorous spirit was a living death seemed to be his portion for the term of his natural existence.

Then some one said: “Go to London.”

Well, the London surgeons cured him; and, then, being so far south, why should he not go on into Kent?

Jim had never lost his glorified dreams of his wild cousin.

But Patty, though he did not know it, was scarcely by that time to be called the “wild young cousin.” Jim’s accident had struck a terror into her heart. Things had been so arranged that her going home was not delayed by that terrible event; she was not wanted to nurse, and her father would have her home. So it was that she only once saw Jim, and that was when she went into his room to say “Good-bye” to him. He did not know her, and her aunt hurried her off. The good aunt was the soul of kindness, but she was in dire grief, and she was of the stern north.

Patty went sobbing.

And Patty had never forgotten.

How should she meet Jim?

He was in the house. She heard his voice, and all at once this foolish thought struck her—how should she meet him?

Common-sense said: “Meet him naturally—he will expect nothing new from you.”

She dallied about her room, then she ran into the garden for a rose; from there she saw the lifting of the hillocky common, gold with its masses of gorse.

From a gorse-bush in the old-fashioned garden she hastily pulled a bit of the yellow bloom, pricking her fingers, but—remembering.

Would Jim remember too?

She did not see Jim until her mother called to her to come to tea, and during that meal she astonished them all by being the Patty she had been a year ago. She laughed, and she teased, and she talked nonsense. Was that the girl who during the past year had grow quiet and staid? Ay—the very same.

Presently they were in the garden.

“Eh, and that’s your Kentish gorse!” exclaimed Jim Sefton. Months of lying on his back with nothing to do but read had changed Jim a good deal; for one thing his shyness had gone, and had carried off much of his provincialism.

“Eh, that is it!” Patty mischievously copied the north-country lilt.

“It is what I have come specially to see,” said Jim quietly.

“Will ye put on your hat and walk out with me—to show it me?”

“To-night?” doubted the girl. Her wildness fled suddenly. She looked towards the others; they were all sauntering about the garden in the sweet May evening. “You will not be tired?”

“Tired? No, lass, no! I’m right again now. As tough as ever. And I’d like to get a walk with ye. You’re willing?”

“All right.” Patty ran in for a hat.

After that night Jim Sefton used to say there was no such grand sight as a Kentish common when the gorse is well out. When he came in he had a bit stuck in his button-hole, and Patty’s spray had gone.

Patty was rosy, and her clear brown eyes shone with tears as she sat down to supper. She had such joy in her glad young heart as she had never deemed possible.

That year’s gorse had Patty’s story glorifying it for ever, and yet in the years to come she very likely would see little of the grand old common where she had taken Jim Sefton.

Her tears were not for that—they were tears of joy. What else but joy could she feel when she knew she was going back one day with Jim. Dear! would she not keep him well indoors on windy nights?

At which piece of promised tyranny big Jim laughed.

The Editor’s Note Book.

THE outrage at Victoria Station was one of at least four cowardly attempts of a like nature, and it is proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that the explosive material was brought from America by ruffians in the pay of the Fenian organisation in that country.

INVITATIONS to subscribe to the fund which is thus devoted to the purposes of destruction and murder are published daily in the American newspapers, and appear to meet with no reprobation, official or otherwise. We hear a great deal about our Transatlantic brethren, about blood being thicker than water, and all the rest of it, but it becomes rather a serious question whether the American Government, and by consequence the American people, are not directly responsible for all the damage which is done by the dynamiters.

OUR rulers seem to have lost the old English faculty of plain speaking and our press seems to be very little better. It is time that this should be changed, and that the plain truth should be told. These things reflect discredit and even disgrace on the people of America, and how, under the circumstances, any citizen of the United States can venture to come to this country and ask to be received as a friend without a feeling of shame, seems to me to be absolutely inconceivable.

WE were made to pay through the nose for contributory negligence in the "Alabama" case. Why should not the American people pay because their politicians dare not risk offending the Irish voters? That is what it comes to, plainly stated.

It always happens when a bye-election takes place that the defeated party, who have probably before the polling informed the electors that the eyes of Europe are upon them, turn round when the result is known, and affect to pooh-pooh it as a matter of little or no significance or importance.

UNDOUBTEDLY in most cases too much is made of these casual elections, which rarely depend upon the issues which are concerned at a general election, but I think it will require a very obstinate Radical indeed to profess indifference to what happened at Brighton. Mr. Marriott's challenge was directly addressed to Mr. Chamberlain and his friends, and the verdict of the Brighton constituency has been simply overwhelming.

To any observer gifted with the slightest impartiality there is something very funny in the severe things which have been said by Liberal speakers and writers, about Mr. Marriott having become a turncoat. From the members of a party which numbers amongst its leaders so distinguished a convert as the Earl of Derby, this angry accusation comes oddly. And, by-the-bye, surely Mr. Gladstone himself used to sit in the House of Commons as a Conservative.

MR. LABOUCHERE, in Truth, thinks that it would serve Brighton right if Mr. Gladstone were to take away a portion of its representation, and give it to some more deserving town in the north—one, I presume, which might be trusted to return a Radical. The Echo with its usual chivalry, now that the fight is over, sneers at Mr. Romer as a lawyer who has never done any service to the Liberal party. Certainly Mr. Marriott has succeeded in making a good many people very angry.

MR. BALFOUR raised a debate in the House of Commons, last week, on the now fashionable question of the housing of the working-classes; but, with the exception of Sir Charles Dilke, no one who took part in it had much to say that was within measurable distance of common-sense. It is greatly to be feared that the question may become nothing but a battle-ground for impracticable theorists, rabid political economists, and amiable persons with hopelessly impossible views. The first and the hardest task which the recently-appointed Royal Commission will have, will be to sweep out of the way all amiable, but obstructive, persons of this kind.

MEANWHILE the Vestry of St. Pancras is waking-up. It is true that I have not heard that much is being done in the slums of the parish, but I, in common with the other inhabitants of perfectly irreproachable streets in the neighbourhood of the Regent's Park, are being worried—without legal warrant as I am advised—by inspectors who, after much poking about and solemn shaking of heads, order the cleansing of cisterns which regularly undergo that operation as it is. At least, that is what the inspector did in my case, and I could not help thinking that his time would have been very much more usefully employed elsewhere.

THE accounts of General Graham's complete victory at El Teb make it clear that the steadiness and discipline of first-class European troops, properly armed and equipped, make them more than a match for almost any odds which a savage enemy, however courageous and devoted, can bring against them. It also proves to demonstration that if Mr. Gladstone had made up his mind a little sooner, all the lives which were sacrificed at Sinkat and in Baker Pasha's battle would have been saved. The reflective observer may remark that we have not heard much of that comfortable word "blood-guiltiness" of late.

Is the importation of foreign cattle a good thing or is it not? And if it ought not to be permitted under certain restrictions, what ought those restrictions to be? These would seem to be the questions which it ought not to be difficult for people who profess to be statesmen to settle. But, somehow or another, the matter has come to be one of purely party politics, and the simple issue which waits for settlement is lost to sight in the dust of confused and wholly unnecessary battle.

THE House of Lords has refused to sanction the Bill for a new direct railway from London to Brighton, and for a time the existing company may rest in peace. The opposition, however, is sure to revive sooner or later, to the pleasure and profit of lawyers if of nobody else. The service has greatly improved of late, but there are still many details which would well deserve careful attention from the general manager. Of one thing the Board of the Brighton and South Coast Railway may be sure—the only way to prevent these constant threats of competition, and to preserve their monopoly, is to do their work to the satisfaction of the public.

NOBODY likes to be told that he is a rogue, and it is not therefore surprising that the shipowners of this country should have met together to protest energetically against Mr. Chamberlain's Shipping Bill. It seems more than probable that Mr. Chamberlain, in his desire to reform some admitted evils, has gone rather too far in his interference with one of the most important interests in the country. All that the shipowners ask is that the Bill shall be referred to a Select Committee, and as there can be no reason for any feverish haste in the matter, this seems fair enough.

ONCE more the Habitual Criminal. Three thieves, who were convicted at the Surrey Sessions last week, were described in the evidence of the detectives as being "well-known thieves," and as belonging to "a band of depredators, known as the Black Gang of the Borough." The very existence of such an institution as the Black Gang of the Borough is a disgrace to our system of law and police, to say nothing of our civilisation.

So long as the French Chamber contains gentlemen like M. Barodet the old jokes about French ignorance of English titles are not likely to be forgotten. M. Barodet quoted the other day a passage from a speech from that illustrious statesman, "Lord Gladstone." That this was not a slip was proved by the fact that the speaker repeated the words in reply to a malicious question from M. Paul de Cassagnac.

No doubt the barriers on the Bedford Estate are a serious nuisance, but it is hardly fair to sould the Duke of Bedford—"these aristocrats," as a gentleman called him at a recent meeting of the St. Pancras Vestry. The bars cannot be removed without the consent of the lessees of the Duke's houses in the neighbourhood, unless Parliament can be induced to pass a Bill for their abolition. It is always a pity to hit the wrong man, and it is probable that the Metropolitan Board of Works is the authority which ought to be stirred up.

LADY JOHN MANNERS, in a magazine article, has been extremely severe on the appetites of the upper classes, and catalogues an array of meals which is perfectly gargantuan. As everybody knows, there is a certain amount of exaggeration in the article, but there is no doubt that most people—and not exclusively those who make up the upper ten—do really eat a great deal more than is good for them. But the discovery is not a new one, and the same complaint has frequently been made by moralists and social reformers in other countries.

BUT this is an age and a country of superlatives and hysterics, and the modern Briton likes to be told that he is infinitely better or infinitely worse than his predecessors—it does not very much matter which—and has an exasperating way, either of vaingloriously despising all foreigners, or of abasing himself in the dust while he compares their virtues with his own manifold imperfections.

No doubt Mr. Belt and Mr. Lawes are perfectly right in appealing against the judgment of the Divisional Court, if it fails to satisfy them. No doubt, also, Mr. Charles Russell and the other counsel engaged are only doing their duty to their clients in setting forth the old familiar facts and inferences, in the old familiar way, and with the old familiar prolixity. But I wonder when it will occur to the editors of our newspapers that all this has been printed at great length several times before, and that its republication is simply a waste of space.

I WONDER what a Balloon Society is. It might have been supposed that such an association would confine its attention to the science of aerostatics, but the gentlemen who meet under this name at the Royal Aquarium appear to occupy themselves mostly with the discussion of political questions. Their speeches may be excellent, but their title is certainly misleading.

THE Middlesex District Lodge of Good Templars has been drawing Lord Kimberley's attention to the "increase of intemperance in Her Majesty's Empire of India." It would be interesting to know where the Middlesex Good Templars got the facts on which they founded their memorial.

PEOPLE are sometimes very eccentric in their choice of heroes. Twenty years ago George Hall was sentenced to death for the murder of his wife—there was no doubt whatever about the case—the sentence being subsequently commuted to one of penal servitude for life. The authorities seem to have considered twenty years enough, and the man was released last week, to be received on his arrival in Birmingham "with remarkable demonstrations of welcome" from "thousands of people, amongst whom intense excitement prevailed," and who greeted him with "vociferous cheers." Perhaps twenty years was enough for Hall's crime, but it seems hardly a good precedent to make a popular idol out of a wife-murderer.

C. D.

One-Eyed Dick.

THE desperate struggle with an Australian bushranger, of which the following is a true account, occurred during the early period of the history of New South Wales, at a time when, almost without exception, all the servants in the colony were convicts, and when many of them had fled into the bush to become bushrangers, either because they were too lazy to work, or, what was unfortunately but too frequently the case, to avoid the harshness, ill-treatment, and repeated floggings of the cruel and tyrannical masters to whom they had been assigned.

"I was going down to Sydney, after two years in the bush, only varied by an overland journey to South Australia. My man had gone on before, and my intended companion had disappointed me, being suddenly prevented from travel. I set out accordingly alone; with a carbine at my back, two of my best kangaroo dogs for my escort, and riding such a horse as no man ever can own twice in his life. I had bought him as a two-year-old, at a very long price, and had spent a great deal more time in training him than we can generally afford in the bush to devote to horseflesh. I set out, as usual, at a foot pace, to do thirty-mile stages, which would bring me to Maitland in five or six days. On the very first day I was tempted foolishly to chase a stray emu, because I had promised a few feathers to some Sydney friends. The emu was caught; but Moonlight, my horse, putting his foot into a wombat-hole, gave me a fall over his head, by which the stock of my carbine was snapped asunder. So, for the rest of the journey, I was unarmed.

"Before reaching the Liverpool Plains, at a bush inn, where I passed the night, there was a great talk about a certain One-Eyed Dick, a bushranger, whom the mounted police had been seeking for the last three weeks. In chasing him, a few days before, they had shot his horse, but he had, nevertheless, contrived to get away into the scrub, and to find a hiding-place among the rocks. It was supposed by that time he had been driven to extremities, as no one would dare to help him, even if there had been anyone so inclined; and he could not venture so much as to light a fire to cook his food, lest the smoke or flame might betray his whereabouts to his pursuers. He was a murderous fellow, for whom no one had a good word; and it seemed to be agreed on all sides that, if he did not find means to get another horse to carry him out of the district, his life could not be worth many weeks' purchase. Being tired, and knowing full well that bush-travellers were given to adorn their tales, I paid but little attention to the gossip, and went drowsily to bed.

"Crossing the range on the following day, I had to follow a narrow track along the steep side of a hill which went down by spurs into the valley. Before I reached the open forest, as I was winding round a long peninsula of rocks, my dogs dashed after a kangaroo. In another minute I was hailed by a voice immediately overhead, shouting, with terrible oaths: 'Bail up, or I'll blow out your brains!'

"I looked up, and caught a glimpse of an extremely ugly face, and of the muzzle of a rusty musket. There was no time for consideration. The gentleman above evidently required my horse, and I regarded that horse as my choicest treasure. Therefore I pressed his sides, threw myself flat on his back, and away we went tumbling, rather than galloping, along the narrow pathway of uneven stones. The musket of course was discharged, and the slugs whistled round me, raking up the skin of my neck and shoulders; but I was unhurt, and we soon turned the jut of the peninsula from which the bushranger had fired. The narrow defile into the open forest being partly blocked up by a small tree that had fallen across it, enabled the gentleman of the bush, by taking a short cut, to meet me at this point, which he did, holding his musket clubbed, ready to deal a desperate blow as soon as he could get at me. He had certainly set his mind upon bestriding Moonlight.

"We got to the fallen tree nearly at the same time. Moonlight went at it and cleared it like a deer, but as he alighted on the other side he tripped and fell upon his head among the branches. I rolled over him, still holding firmly by the rein. It was, indeed, well for me that the bushranger, being out of breath, missed the blow he aimed at my devoted head. It was parried for me by the strong arm of an overhanging tree, which caused the musket to recoil with so much force as to fly out of the ruffian's hand, and to tumble down the hillside. My horse rose, and the man rushed to seize him, shouting threats and imprecations which I do not think it needful to repeat. I still maintained my hold upon reins and stirrup; my blood was up; and with all my force I cut my assailant across the face with my doubled stock-whip. Then he grappled with me, and we both fell. He was a bigger, broader man than I, but starvation had weakened him, and I was in better condition for a struggle. We rolled over and over, each trying to keep the other under. I had his left wrist grasped in my right hand; my left hand, missing his throat, tugged at his chin and beard. He clenched my neckerchief in his fist, and dug his knuckles into my throat, and would most certainly have strangled me had not the neckerchief, which was thin, given away. Then he attempted to get out his knife; but at the moment when he put down his right hand—being the undermost—I threw back my own hand and struck him a severe blow on his only eye. I do not know how long the struggle lasted after this, but I felt my strength beginning to fail. His knees were once or twice upon my chest, and although I threw him off, my hands were losing power rapidly.

"Until I felt that his endurance surpassed mine—until I began to despair—I had been silent, while my antagonist swore vehemently, but I summoned up at last my failing strength for one loud shout. In a little while the ruffian's cursing took the form of wild howls of rage and pain, his grasp relaxed, and I saw him desperately fighting at the jaws of my two fierce and faithful dogs. Supporting myself on my hands and knees, I, like a savage, urged them on in feeble whispers—they were my last hope and my strong hope. One dog had the robber by the throat, and the other had plunged his sharp muzzle into his side. Shrieking horribly, he writhed and fought with them. As soon as I could gather strength I arose, and with faltering steps reached my horse, who waited, trembling, for his master. I mounted, and without looking back, pushed over fifteen miles, until I arrived at a cattle-station. My dogs had not followed me, and it was an hour before they came in. Refusing the food that was offered to them they went to sleep before the fire.

"As long as I was in the colony I never mentioned the matter to any man, except the head of the police. One-Eyed Dick was never heard of more. The dingoes (native dogs) and eagle hawks soon provide decent burial for any dead body of man or beast left in the bush."

Spring Cleaning.

PART I. TO REMOVE STAINS FROM CLOTHES.

THERE is no more trying period of the year to the mother of a large family than the next month or six weeks. The spring cleaning looms in the distance, that annual disturbance which, while it lasts, makes life burdensome to people of limited incomes. "Small means" implies having small houses, with few sitting-rooms, and merely a sufficient number of bedrooms for constant occupation, so there are no spare rooms to which to retreat until the domestic deluge is over, and dry land reappears.

THE interval between that time and the present should be utilised for looking over wardrobes, having a review of frocks, jackets, pinafores, summer stockings, etc., etc. As a rule, last year's clothes, either for adults or juveniles, are certain to prove disappointments, as, dragged into the light of day, they look so much worse than they were expected to do; and it is always found that the children have grown inconveniently; that is to say, not enough to wear reversions from elder branches without alterations, yet too much to begin the new season with the frocks with which the old one concluded. Then the soils upon the old frocks are trying to deal with. The cost of the French cleaner is increasing every year, and will soon be prohibitive. The mother who could make two frocks out of one of her own dresses only for the soiled parts, which leave but enough of it clean for one, hesitates to send the breadths to the cleaner from dread of the bill.

THERE is no reason why people should not learn to clean their own dresses, curtains, ribbons, table-covers, etc. At first it is well to practise on materials of little value, but very soon experience will tide an intelligent woman over the worst of the difficulties.

THE first consideration is whether the entire article is to be cleaned—scoured as it used to be called—or whether merely some disfiguring stains are to be removed. If the former it is well first to attack the spots, and give them such special attention as they require. It is difficult to know, in the case of a dress, for instance, what has caused the stain. It may be grease, fruit, tar, ink, paint, tea, coffee, wine, or jam, or some mixture like sauces, or creams.

GREASE-SPOTS may generally be removed from even delicate material by the employment of benzine, or oil of turpentine, care being taken not to leave a mark, a boundary line round where the solvent spreads. Oxgall is particularly useful in extracting grease-stains from woollen goods. If the stain be very thickly crusted and old, it may be advantageous to soften the grease, previous to the application of benzine, by means of a warm iron laid on a piece of blotting-paper, which has been placed over the spot. In the removal of grease from clothing with benzine or turpentine, people generally go to work by wetting the cloth with the turpentine, and then rubbing it with a sponge or piece of cloth. In this way the fat is dissolved, but it is spread over a greater surface and is not removed; the benzine or turpentine evaporates, and the fat covers a greater surface than before. Place blotting-paper beneath the spot, and moisten with the benzine. Lay another piece on the top, and at once press with a heavy weight. The fat is then absorbed and entirely removed from the material. When the grease-spot is on cotton, or any washing material produced by machine-oil, nothing is more effectual than brown soap rubbed in, and the article left to soak in cold water for twelve hours, then washed out in cold spring water.

CARBONATE of magnesia will sometimes remove a greasy stain from a slight material, such as foulard, satin, etc. Calcined magnesia is dried in an oven and mixed with sufficient benzine to form a smooth paste. It can then be bottled, well stoppered, and kept ready for use. Spread it thickly over the stains, and rub well to and fro with the tip of the finger. The small rolls of earthy matter so formed are brushed off, and more magnesia is laid on and left until the benzine has evaporated entirely. Materials that will bear washing must then be cleaned with water; on silks, alcohol or benzine should be used instead. Textile materials in which wool has part are unsuitable for magnesia application, as it adheres to the threads and cannot be dislodged.

THESE remedies are applicable to spots only. Where grease-stains are on a large scale, and require to be dealt with by a professional, boiling in bleaching liquor and bleaching alternately are resorted to, each textile requiring different and more skilful treatment than it is possible for amateurs working at home to bestow.

FRUIT-JUICES, wines, jams, etc., leave stains which are difficult to deal with, and troublesome. First it is well to wash with water to remove sugary matter, then use diluted ammonia to neutralise the acid, after which exposure to the fumes of burning sulphur. The difficulty of the last application is its injury to colours, as it bleaches vegetable dyes, so it must only be resorted to as the last extremity. The agonies of mind suffered by hostesses who see their best table-cloths and serviettes stained with wine are not always altogether concealed from guests, nor postponed until opportunity serves for giving full vent to indignation. There is a tradition that depositing a spoonful of salt upon a port wine stain immediately after it has been given will neutralise the injury. This is altogether a delusion. Anything to keep the spot moist until remedies are applied would do as well. It is simpler and more effective to dip the part in boiling milk as soon as possible afterwards, and keep the milk boiling until the spot disappears. Fruit may or may not yield to the last remedy. As an alternative, first rub the spot on each side with hard soap, and then lay on a thick mixture of starch and cold water. Rub this mixture of starch well into the spot, and afterwards expose it to sun and air. If the stain prove obstinate repeat the process a few days afterwards. Ripe fruit makes the most troublesome stain; sometimes unripe fruit of the same kind acts as a remover.

TAR and pitch produce stains which are obstinate under soap, but yield readily to spirits of turpentine, coal-tar, naphtha, and benzine. If they are very old and hard it is as well to soften them by lightly rubbing them with a pledget of wool dipped in good olive-oil. The softened mass will then easily yield to the action of the other solvents.

INK-STAINS may be either writing-ink, marking-ink, or printers'-ink. The second is the most difficult to take out, if the ink used be of a good character. The chances are that the material gives way, and a hole is the result. Dissolve one ounce of cyanide of potassium in four ounces of water, moisten the stained part of the garment with this solution by rubbing in with a feather or small brush, but avoid letting the fingers be touched. As this is a poisonous mixture it should never be brought into a house where there are children. For printers'-ink put the stained part of the fabric into a quantity of benzine, dry, and rub bright with warm water and curd soap. Writing-ink is removed by salt of lemons, which is a mixture of tartar and citric acid, powdered fine and rubbed together. Fill a vessel with boiling water, a basin, or something which will hold sufficient water to retain the heat. Moisten the ink-spot, and stretch the material over the hot water so that the steam will pass through. Lay sufficient salt of lemons on to cover the spot, rub it in, and leave it until the water cools. Then wash out the powder in cold water. If the stain has not then quite disappeared, at the first washing afterwards it will probably be rubbed quite away.

PAINT, if of long standing, is difficult to move. Under the same head comes also varnish. For cotton goods, either white or coloured, oil of turpentine or benzine, applied with blotting-paper above and below, as for grease-spots. Wash afterwards with soap. For silk, benzine or ether, instead of oil of turpentine, and finish with soap. Silk must be rubbed as little as possible. Chloroform is an excellent remover of paint or other bad stains, but the restrictions upon its indiscriminate sale put it out of ordinary people's reach. If the paint-stains be of very long standing it is desirable to soften with olive-oil or fresh butter before applying the benzine. But care must be taken to confine the butter to the spot affected, not to allow it to spread.

COFFEE and milk stains are very difficult to remove from delicate fabrics, especially if of long standing. From woollen and mixed textiles, which are stout, and bear vigorous treatment, coffee can be taken with greater safety. Mix one part of glycerine, nine of water, and half a part of aqua ammonia. Rub it into the spot with a brush, leave it moist, and keep it so by renewal for twelve hours. Lay the stained part between two clean cloths, and press to take out the moisture, then rub with a very clean rag. If the stain still remains, steam it over a basin of boiling water. For silk, more glycerine and less ammonia; five parts of glycerine, five parts of water, one fourth part of ammonia. The last is the critical component, as it may extract the colour, so should be tried first on some immaterial part, and, if necessary, the ammonia left out. Apply it like the mixture for wool, but, instead of steaming, rub with breadcrumbs. If it be a silk with much dressing a little thin gum is required afterwards to give surface; or for a very dark colour, some beer, and pressure of a hot iron on the wrong side.

STAINS of street-mud on cloaks or on skirts are generally caused by some properties in the soil, as the mud of one town is quite harmless, while that of another is almost ineradicable. Rub gently with a soft sponge dipped in cold water, to which a little alcohol has been added, and then dry with a soft silk cloth. Waterproof cloth is difficult to clean without injuring the texture. Woollen materials should have the wrong side washed with a mixture of alum and sugar-of-lead dissolved in water, to restore the impervious condition which the cleaning may have disturbed.

Privileges of the French Nobility.

IT must be confessed that in days gone by the privileges of the great nobles of France were, according to all reasonable notions of liberty, tyrannically excessive both in number and degree. Happening to fall in with a document, copied a good many years ago from the "Archives du Royaume," bearing upon the subject of "privileged nobility," we thought we might as well add this mite of information to the general stock.

It was not simply in the affairs of this world that privilege was claimed and conceded to those of royal or noble lineage; their "great greatness," as Jonathan Wild would have called it, could only be satisfied by spiritual as well as by temporal advantages. An amusing instance of the liberal view which the higher classes in France were in the habit of taking of the excesses of their royal masters, is given in the following anecdote, related in the "Mémoires de Dangeau."

On the 27th of September, 1693, Prince Philip, one of the "hopes" of France, suddenly departed this life, after having diversified his career by every vice that could deform it. A knot of courtiers were moralising on the event in one of the ante-chambers of Versailles, and expressing their doubts of His Royal Highness's fitness for the celestial sphere, when they were interrupted by Madame la Maréchale de la Maileraye, who observed with an air of profound conviction, and with no wilful intention of uttering blasphemy: "I assure you God thinks twice before he condemns persons of the prince's quality."

These royal personages were also prepared for heaven after a fashion of their own. In taking the Sacrament the princes and princesses of the blood did not communicate with the common wafer such as the people swallowed, but had a kind manufactured for themselves; and the memoirs above cited tell us that the Dauphine was once "put to much inconvenience by having to wait, the priest who officiated having forgotten to prepare an exclusive wafer (hostie choisie) for her use."

It seemed, indeed, as if these "exclusives" fancied they condescended in allowing themselves to be redeemed at all; and the Chanoine-Comptes of the Chapter of St. John of Lyons were so impressed with their own dignity, that they actually refused to kneel during the celebration of mass and elevation of the host; and what was more extraordinary were confirmed in this "privilege" (which, however, Louis XIV. abrogated) by an ecclesiastical decree. The Canonesses of Verdun also enjoyed the same immunity from genuflexion, and had their heads covered at the religious processions.

The Abbé de Pompadour, who, although a clergyman, was of the secular order, was of opinion that it would be as serviceable to his soul, as probably it was, if he said his prayers by deputy; he accordingly gave his valet extra wages to read his breviary for him in the ante-chamber, while he, most likely, was playing cards in the salon. This pious abbé died in 1710.

We could multiply anecdotes like the above, but our document awaits us. It is intitled, "Petition of the Dukes and Duchesses (M. Mgrs. les Ducs et M. Mesmes. Duchesses) to His Royal Highness the Duke of Orleans, Regent," and commences in the following (humble) strain:

"Monseigneur,—So little respect is paid to us in public (dans le monde) that it is necessary we should have an express law enacted to replace us in our rights and privileges, with regard to the people, the inferior nobility, and the clergy. Who can be ignorant that the clergy are only allowed to be anything in the State, but because a certain number of peers have not disclaimed the titles of Bishop and Archbishop? It is necessary that a bishop, at the least, should be the person to administer the sacrament to us. We alone have the right to carry cushions (to kneel upon, carreaux) to church. It is our privilege to receive the sacred bread before any one else, no matter who. If we go to a conventual church, we must be waited for at least half an hour, whenever we should happen to be detained. In the streets all the other nobility must give the right-hand side (le haut du pavé) to a peer, whether that peer be in a carriage or on horseback; and as to the coaches of people of the commonalty (gens de la roture), they must be obliged to draw up as we pass, however inconvenient it may happen to be.

"A peer and peeress occupy, as a matter of course, the back seat of the carriage; indeed, it is necessary that the law should restrain them from giving up their places, if moved to it by politeness or natural modesty. At table their healths should be drunk before those of the master and mistress of the house. At the theatre they are to occupy the best boxes, and if these are filled on their arrival, those who are sitting there must immediately withdraw; any other arrangement, Monseigneur, would neither be just or endurable. A peer has no occasion for fighting a duel with a private nobleman, even if it should happen that he has been well beaten by him."

"No one can pretend to hold any place until it has been refused by the peers, the peers being so completely above the people, that they really are not called upon to recognise their existence. No workman or mechanic should be allowed to compel them by process of law to pay their debts. This sort of persons ought only to give them a polite intimation of the fact of their indebtedness, and the peers will satisfy them, if they think proper to do so.

"Finally, Monseigneur, on the same principle that a nobleman has not the right to draw his sword upon a duke, so the servants of noblemen cannot force those of dukes to make use of their fists in self-defence; and the latter should rather allow themselves to be thoroughly thrashed (se laisserent plutôt rouer de coups) than compromise the honour which they enjoy, of being in the service of their masters."

One would think that this "document" was the production of a joker who wished to raise a laugh against the pretensions of the "Ducs et Pairs"; but no such thing; it is a veritable State paper, taken from Box K of the Archives of France, in Paris, and was so extracted in the last year of the reign of Louis Philippe.

One of an Editor's Difficulties.

MR. KENINGALE COOK, in a letter to the Athenæum, tells the following story. The difficulty is one of which most editors have had some experience.

An editor accepted from a little known correspondent what seemed a publishable tale. When it appeared, letters were received from different parts of the country proclaiming it as one of Nathaniel Hawthorne's. The editor was severely blamed for not detecting the imposition at once. Certainly in the case of a native classic like Hawthorne, an American editor would, under such circumstances, have been deserving of the stigma of being an ill-informed man, but it must be something little short of omniscience that could make an editor acquainted, however superficially, with each one of the tens of thousands of short stories which have been written in English during the last fifty years. When Hawthorne's story and the newly-published plagiarism were examined side by side, it was discovered that they were identical in all but the diction. The one was a poor paraphrase of the other. The contributor was communicated with and taxed with fraud. He protested his entire innocence; the story, it was true, was not original; he had translated it from a German tale which he thought deserving of an appearance in English. In this way poor Hawthorne, who had been done the honour of being conveyed into Germany, was forced to come back to his own country in a borrowed suit and incognito.

An American Cat.

MR. WILLIS, who lives in Oldham county, Kentucky, had a cat which daily remained away from the house several hours at a time. One day Mr. Willis was walking through a small wood about a mile from his house when he saw his cat a few yards ahead of him, sitting in a kind of recess under a rock. It would sit still for a long time, then walk over to some object near it in the hole and rub its head against it, purring most contentedly. What was his astonishment when he came up to the edge of the rock, and saw that the object of the cat's attention was nothing more or less than a large snake. The snake was curled up in a ring, and when the cat would approach it the snake would thrust up its head to receive the cat's caresses. This continued for about half an hour, when the cat evidently grew weary, and after turning around several times to ensure a comfortable position, lay down beside the snake and was soon fast asleep. The next day Mr. Willis took a couple of friends with him to witness this strange spectacle. The manoeuvres were repeated. At length they resolved to kill the snake, and did so. This seemed to completely overwhelm the cat with grief, and it used to visit the rock daily, as usual, for several days, without, however, finding out what had become of its companion.

Some More Pianoforte Studies.*

WHEN the student has gone through the more elementary studies, there still lies before him an immense tract of undiscovered country. He may be likened to a traveller who, after a long and weary journey spent in overcoming difficult obstacles, suddenly comes to a place from whence he sees fresh mountains rise before his view. True, he has mastered the works of Bertini, and Cramer, and Moscheles; but of what avail does it seem when the giant forms of Liszt and Chopin are seen looming through the mist? He may have conquered the arpeggios written by Moscheles—they were mostly confined to the different positions of the chord within the space of an octave; but these are as nothing to Chopin's arpeggios, which rarely embrace a less extent than that of a tenth. The student should do under these circumstances very much what the traveller would under the same conditions—he should rest a little before bracing himself up to take the more difficult journey. It is well to take some studies, such as Stephen Heller's, which are more remarkable for grace of expression than difficulty of execution, and learn them as a kind of relief between more difficult works. From the very first it will be found an excellent plan to "sandwich" these studies of Heller's between books of dryer studies. Especially should they be learnt by those who are deficient in that art of phrasing which is the great crown and beauty of pianoforte-playing.

SOME of these exercises are so pretty that they have been published, under various fantastic names, as pianoforte pieces. "The Mermaid," from Book VIII., is the best known of these. The sixth book is one of the most useful as far as practice is concerned. The first and last of the studies in it are the most improving for execution, but all are good. The one in A minor is written very much in the style of a gondola song, and calls up visions of a quiet moonlight night, with the cry of the gondolier coming across the water. All of these studies are written in a very poetical style, and to play them without care and delicacy is to vulgarise them.

CHOPIN's studies are very difficult, not only to play but to read. Theorists have disputed over the origin of some of the chords, so it is natural that an ordinary person should find them troublesome. The difficulties are also very great, but once they are in any degree overcome they give the player the most delightful sense of mastery over the instrument. If you could play those studies as they ought to be played, you could play anything. They are particularly good for any player who is inclined to stiffness, as they produce great freedom of style. The student has many opportunities of hearing these studies performed, as they are frequently played at the best pianoforte recitals. It is only the other day that M. Vladimir de Pachmann made a wonderful success with the fifth study in Book I. So beautifully did he play it, so light and fairy-like and charming did he make it, that he had hardly finished before an immense shower of applause came from every part of the house—it almost seemed as if the roof was coming down. The audience would not be contented till the study had been played over again. The ovation was as general as it was spontaneous, but of all the listeners in that hall, you may depend the people who appreciated the performance most were those pianists who had learnt the study themselves and who knew how wonderful it was to make it sound nice. When it is played indifferently there is nothing pretty in it. It sounds like a carpenter sawing wood!

HENSELT's studies are extremely idealistic; they all embody some particular thought, but without plenty of study the idea escapes one. Many of them are played at concerts and make charming pianoforte pieces. It was something wonderful to hear Rubinstein play "Si l'Oiseau j'étais." The dazzling arpeggios flew up the piano; the longing, and struggling, and fluttering of wings were apparent, and the idea flashed into the listener's mind at once: "I would fly!" The "Prière d'Amour," in the same series, is a very charming little piece, full of expression and feeling. It is also an excellent study for playing a melody with the thumb of the right hand whilst carrying on the accompaniment with the fingers. "Repos d'Amour" is another piece somewhat in the same style, not so taking at first sight as the other, but full of interest to the person who studies it. It is an excellent study for part-playing, and also for bringing out a melody on the left hand. It commences with a melody in the bass, and then, after a time, another voice comes in, and a kind of duet is carried on up to the end.

It is difficult to say, without knowing the exact condition of the student, at what point in his studies he should commence the preludes and fugues of Bach. He should learn them when they are a pleasure to him, and not a drag; he should be able to take an intellectual delight in them, and be sufficiently advanced in his reading for the mere mastering of the notes not to fill him with discouragement. He can prepare the way by first learning the shorter "diversions" and "suites," so as to get a little into the master's style. All the preludes are delightful and interesting, particularly the one to which Gounod has set a melody, but there is no disputing the fact that the fugues are very tough work. Yet must the student brace himself up and attack them with a good courage, for the love of Bach is one of the tastes which grow with feeding, and the player who begins with thinking the work dry will often end by willingly spending hour after hour in polishing up some little turn or passage. Moreover, the study of Bach is a most important factor in the student's progress. No playing can be good without it, and the hard hours of work spent over its study leave a lifelong trace on the style of the player. Cleanness of touch and clearness of execution, vigour and precision, good fingering and proficiency in part-playing—all these things are the characteristics of the student who has played plenty of Bach. Even the very position of the hand and the "clever" look of the fingers will betray at once to the experienced eye that the pianist is well acquainted with the works of that "old man who is always young."

To leave for a while the consideration of particular studies to lay down general principles that apply to all of them, every book of studies should be gone through twice. That is the way to get all the good out of them. First, they must be gone through tolerably quickly for the sake of the reading—a two-page one occupying about the space of a week—and then the book must be gone through again, and this time it is the mechanical difficulties that must be mastered. Pay especial attention to the fingering, for the difficulty of many studies lies mainly in that. Whenever a choice of two modes of fingering is given you, study very carefully which one is best suited to the peculiarities of your hand. Get Bach's fugues unfingered, and try to put in the fingering for yourself. This in itself is an excellent study, as it teaches you to think.

It is needless to remark that every study is formed with a view to overcoming some special difficulty, and that this one characteristic is carried throughout, whether it be an arpeggio, or scale passage, or a succession of dotted notes. It is therefore easy to make for yourself a little exercise upon the exercise, so to speak, which you can play in the time usually allotted to scales and technical studies. If a passage seems troublesome, play it a hundred times, play it in every key, play it all up the piano. Grudge neither time nor trouble, nor exertion, for it is by these means alone that proficiency is attained.

Household Gardening.

THE month of March, weather being favourable, is one of the busiest in the gardening year. If work has been neglected, be it of whatever nature it may—digging, pruning, lawn-making, or shrub-planting—it should be entered on in earnest now, and completed as speedily as possible, as from this time onward almost every day will bring fresh duties, arrears becoming a burthen and a great impediment to free and satisfactory progress. Not only do seeds of flowers and vegetables require to be sown now, but garden enemies have to be combated, such as weeds and slugs; and those strike the most effectively against them who strike in good time. Insects, too, increase rapidly now, if nothing is done to prevent them.

CHECKS AND ENCOURAGEMENTS.

When two good objects can be attained by one operation, that surely is worth carrying out. Not only two but three advantages are gained at once by forking the ground over carefully at this season of the year, but never except the surface is dry. In the first place, slugs that are near the surface are buried, which materially checks their power of doing injury; in the second place, weeds innumerable that are just vegetating are arrested in growth; and, thirdly, lightening up the soil and admitting the air increases its fertility, besides bringing it into a better condition for the germination of seeds. Therefore, fork over all vacant ground at this season of the year, when the surface is dry, and then only; when the soil is very wet, let it alone.

RAISING SEEDLINGS.

Much seed is wasted every year by sowing it too soon, when there is not the proper conveniences for raising the plants. For instance, it is printed on seed packets that Stocks, Asters, Zinnias, and Vegetable Marrows should be sown in March under glass. This is correct advice, provided the full significance of the conditional term, "under glass," is appreciated.

A person may have a shaded or crowded greenhouse, and if he sows such seeds as those named in pots and boxes, and places them in the house, they will be "under glass;" yet, in all probability, the attempt to raise strong healthy seedlings would end in failure, owing to the want of sufficient light.

Another individual may have a glazed frame, but no means of heating it. In this the seeds of tender plants might be sown now, and they would be "under glass;" yet the chances of success following must be exceedingly remote, as the seedlings, if produced, would quickly succumb to the effects of cold.

A third class of flower lovers and plant raisers have neither a greenhouse nor frame, but have a warm room in which they grow window-plants; but it does not follow that where established plants exist and even remain healthy, that tender young seedlings can be reared. The seed may germinate and the surface of the soil in the pots be covered with a multitude of tiny plants; but unless these have abundance of direct light, nothing intervening between them and the sun, they will become drawn, get weaker daily, and eventually collapse.

This is no fancy picture, but a clear statement of facts, the direct outcome of much experience. It is not encouraging, some reader may perhaps soliloquise. It is not intended to encourage persons to court failure. It is intended to warn them not to incur it, nor to waste time, space, and seed. Those who have neither light, warm frames, nor greenhouses will act the most wisely by adopting a waiting policy; as in the course of a month the sun will make the present cold frames warm, and the dark greenhouses light; then, and not till then, will it be safe to attempt to raise tender plants from seed.

TEMPERATURE FOR SEEDLINGS.

When such plants as those above enumerated are advised to be sown "under glass" in March, it is assumed that there are frames or greenhouses with shelves fixed near the glass, having a steady temperature of from 45 to 55 degrees. Under such conditions there is no difficulty in raising seedlings, provided the requisite attention is given to the work.

The best of all places for rearing a number of plants from seed is a gentle hotbed on which a frame is placed. The bed may be formed of fermenting manure from horse-stables, mixed with tree-leaves where these are procurable. Beds also may be made of spent hops or tan, supported with boards. At this period of the year the bed should be nearly four feet high, and should be eighteen inches wider than the frame all round, as then, after the frame is placed on the bed, additional material can be packed round the woodwork, and the requisite temperature will be maintained inside the frame.

The surface of the bed under the glass should be covered a few inches deep with cocoanut-fibre refuse or sawdust for plunging the pots in, as the soil then will not only be kept warm but moist, thus lessening the necessity for watering, which is always a delicate operation in the work in question.

SOWING SEEDS IN POTS AND BOXES.

In sowing small seeds of Lobelias, Golden Feather, Petunias, Musk, Begonias, Mignonette, or, in fact, seeds of any kind of plants, it is important that the soil be quite moist to begin with. If so dry as to need frequent waterings after sowing, the probability is that the seed will not germinate, or at least the plants will not grow at all freely.

In preparing for the work in question, first place a good layer of crocks in the receptacles to be used, over these a few leaves, then fill in with soil, the top half-inch of loam and leaf-soil to be finely sifted and mixed with a little sand.

Then with a fine-rosed garden-pot water the soil thoroughly with hot water. This will destroy any grubs that may be in the soil, every particle of which must be made decidedly moist, a light surface sprinkling being worse than useless.

An hour or two afterwards sprinkle on the seed, thinly rather than otherwise, press it down very lightly, and then scatter over it with great care and regularity a very little of the finest soil, or even fine sand, just covering it and nothing more; burying small seed too deeply being the cause of many failures.

The pots or boxes must never be quite filled with soil, and squares of glass should be laid over them, with a space under the glass of about an inch, for the seedlings to grow. Over the glass, in bright weather, spread sheets of paper to prevent the sun drying the surface of the soil. The glass arrests the evaporation of moisture, the consequence being that water is seldom needed until the seedlings appear. That is the point to aim at, and those who accomplish it will succeed in the interesting occupation of raising plants from very small seed.

THE VEGETABLE GARDEN—PEAS.

Those who have space, and desire a few dishes of the most popular of all vegetables—Peas—should sow at once in good soil, in drills four inches wide and two deep, scattering the peas half an inch apart over the shallow trenches.

The finest of all Peas, growing about four feet high, is Carters' Telephone. The pods are grand in size, and the produce delicious. This Pea wins many prizes at exhibitions, is fit for the table of the Queen—on which it, in fact, appears; also on the tables of thousands of her subjects of every rank, over the length and breadth of the land. The rows should be five or six feet apart.

A dwarfier Pea, growing about two feet high, is Carters' Stratagem, which, of its class, is quite unequalled, being sturdy, vigorous, and laden with dark green pods of immense size. Persons who judge of the quality of Peas by the ordinary kinds, as sold in the markets, have no idea of what Peas really are, as represented by such splendid varieties as those recommended. The rows of the last-mentioned should be three feet asunder, and the plants are the more productive if supported with sticks.

THE FRUIT GARDEN.

Any young fruit-trees that were planted in the autumn should be pruned at once. This is a very simple operation, that can be performed by any thoughtful person who can use a knife; but this must have a keen edge, or it will tear the bark, which is always undesirable.

All that is needed with such trees is to cut out very weak branches entirely, and shorten the others to about half their original length. If left uncut the trees will make little, if any, growth; but, by shortening them, they will push strong healthy shoots.

Strawberry-beds should have attention now, by running the hoe through them on a fine day, to destroy incipient weeds, then covering the surface with rich manure. If household slops, with soap-suds, be poured copiously over the roots, the effect will be highly beneficial in encouraging the production of strong trusses, and eventually large, fine, highly-coloured fruit.

Manure or soil should be spread over the roots of Raspberries now. Many persons dig amongst them at this season of the year, and thereby make a very great mistake. It would be decidedly more profitable to pay a man for resting than for disturbing the roots of either Strawberries or Raspberries at the present time.

It is a very good plan to syringe fruit-trees with a solution of soft soap and tobacco-water as the buds are bursting. Pour half a gallon of water on two ounces of tobacco, and dissolve two ounces of soft-soap in a gallon of water; mix and apply, and the attacks of insects will be prevented.

Odds and Ends.

SEVERAL KINDS OF GIRLS.

A good girl to have—Sal Vation.
A disagreeable girl—Annie Mosity.
A fighting girl—Hittie Maginn.
Not a Christian girl—Hettie Rodoxy.
A sweet girl—Carrie Mel.
A pleasant girl—Jennie Rosity.
A smooth girl—Amelia Ration.
A seedy girl—Cora Ander.
One of the best girls—Ella Gant.
A clear case of girl—E. Lucy Date.
A geometrical girl—Rhoda Dendron.
A musical girl—Sarah Nade.
A profound girl—Mettie Physics.
A star girl—Meta Oric.
A clinging girl—Jessie Mine.
A nervous girl—Hester Ical.
A muscular girl—Callie Sthenics.
A lively girl—Annie Mation.
An uncertain girl—Eva Nescent.
A sad girl—Ella G.
A serene girl—Mollie Fy.
A great big girl—Ella Phant.
A warlike girl—Millie Tary.
The best girl of all—Your Own.

PROFESSOR SMYTHE tells an absurd anecdote of Sheridan's fidgety nature. One evening, during a hard frost, he called on the tutor to beg that his pupil might not be allowed to venture on the ice, then hard enough to bear a waggon. Smythe expostulated against the restriction, said that he always accompanied his charge, and had a man with a ladder and ropes stationed on the bank in case of an accident. Consent to the skating was at last extorted. Sheridan returned to his carriage, having to drive nine miles off, and the Smythe household retired to bed. Some hours afterwards they were alarmed by a furious pealing at the bell, which proved to announce the return of the author to say "he could not rest, nor think of anything but this skating, and he must have a promise that there should be no more of it." "Have a glass case made for your son," cried the justly indignant tutor, whose slumbers had been thus disturbed.

A HAT-FINISHER in one of the American hat factories applied for a pension, and in his application stated that on account of disease contracted in the army he could not do more than half work. One day there appeared in his shop a long, lank individual in a long, lank ulster, who took quite an interest in hat-making. He was especially pleased with the finishing. He came round to where our friend was at work, and after watching his motions a moment, said: "Are you new at the business?" "New! What makes you think I'm new?" hastily asked our friend. "Nothing," said the long, lank man pleasantly, "only I thought you didn't work as fast as the others." "Fast as the others!" gasped our friend. "I'll bet five dollars," he added with spirit, "that I can finish more hats than any other man in this shop!" A few days later the rapid hat finisher received word that his petition for a pension was refused. The long, lank man in the long, lank ulster was a detective in the employ of the pension bureau.

A NEWSPAPER proprietor advertised for an advertisement canvasser, and his test of their fitness, as they applied, was to tell them to get out of the office that instant, or he would kick them out. Several timid young men turned tail and left him with great disgust; but one, more brazen-faced than the rest, nothing daunted by the threat, coolly sat himself down and said he would not go until his testimonials had been read. So he locked the door, put the key in his pocket, and handed in his papers. "Ah!" said the advertiser, "you'll do, I can see. I don't want testimonials; your style is enough for me. No one will ever succeed as an advertisement canvasser who will be influenced by a threat to be kicked out of any office."

ALMOST everybody is trying to get a living without work, or, at any rate, any work of physical character. The cry for industrial schools is a plea for an education conducive to material production, as it is a confession that to a degree our public school system is a failure in this regard. Nothing but experience will convince the people that in the long run wealth is created only, or mainly, by such labour as tends to develop or to utilise the natural resources of the country. It is gained by ploughing, by making cloth, by the legitimate exchange of goods, by cheapening cost through invention. But these imply an education adapted to a life of work, and not a life of indolence or show.

TAKE a grain of falsehood, a handful of runabout, the same quantity of nimble-tongue, a sprig of the herb backbite, a tea-spoonful of don't-you-tell-it, six drops of malice, and a few drachms of envy. Add a little discontent and jealousy, and strain through a bag of misconstruction, cork it up in a bottle of malevolence, and hang it up on a skein of street yarn; keep in a hot atmosphere; shake it occasionally for a few days, and it will be fit for use. Let a few drops be taken before walking out, and the desired result will follow.

REVENGE is a momentary triumph, which is almost immediately succeeded by remorse, while forgiveness, which is the noblest of all revenges, entails a perpetual pleasure. It was well said by a Roman emperor that he wished to put an end to all his enemies by converting them into friends.

At times, into some hours of life is crowded so much of anguish that we seem to live years; yes, to become aged in a brief space.

A LOVING heart and a pleasant countenance are commodities which a man should never fail to take home with him.

EVERY one does, or ought to, feel unhappy till he finds out what to do.

How much have we all suffered from evils that have never occurred.

CAN there be any thing in this world more useful than happiness?

A CERTAIN cobbler's sign bore the announcement: "Shoes half sold." A passing drummer observing the omission of the e in sole, stepped in and thus addressed the artisan: "You advertise shoes half sold here?" "Yes, sir." "Well, I would like to understand what you mean, whether you sell half of a shoe or half of a pair, or whether you have a lot half of which you want to sell. It's the most ambiguous advertisement I ever saw." The cobbler scratched his head and looked up over his spectacles in surprise at the drummer. After a pause he asked: "Can't you understand by the sign that I put half soles on shoes?" "No, sir," replied the drummer; "I can't understand any such thing from your sign. You have left an e out of the word 'sold,' and as it stands now it means to sell, or already sold." The cobbler smote his hand upon his knee and said: "By jinks! I thought that the word 'sold' didn't look just right. I thought it wanted an e. Thank you, sir, for calling attention to it." After the drummer's departure the cobbler went outside with a brush and added an e to the word, making it "solde."

A GOOD story of the Viennese carnival is current in the Austrian capital. At a ball given by the Viennese Choral Society, which is always sure to be so thronged that it is the work of hours to reach the entrance, a member of a well-known financial house hit on an original but successful mode of conveyance. He arranged with four bearers to carry him through the crowd on a hospital stretcher. Of course the crowd made way; and great was their amazement when he threw off the covering, and jumped out alive and hearty.

THERE is a set of men who are continually boring people for autographs; few have the talent of refusing them with politeness. Talleyrand being once asked a similar favour by an English nobleman, promised to send him one in a few days, and thus kept his word. He sent him an invitation to dinner: "Will you oblige me with your company to dinner on Wednesday next, at eight o'clock? I have invited a number of exceedingly clever persons, and do not like to be the only fool among them."

In a contest over a will a certain witness was giving his evidence as to the disposition of the testator. "Was he a good-natured man?" asked the attorney. "Not altogether." "Was he cross, then?" "Well, yes, rather, in places." "Was he very cross?" "Considerably." "How cross was he? Give us an example of his disposition." "Well, sir, he was that cross that when he called up the cows at milking-time it made the milk sour." "That's enough; stand down."

MISS MITFORD, the authoress, had a pleasant and good-humoured face, but of the art of dress she knew nothing. On her way to an evening party she purchased a most unbecoming yellow turban, which caused her to be for some time an object of merriment to the whole room, owing to the fact of the shopkeeper from whom she had bought it having forgotten to remove from behind it a large ticket bearing the printed inscription, "Very chaste, only 5s. 6d."

"WELL," said an old general at his club, "what do you think of Mr. B., whom I introduced to you?" "An excellent man, but without memory. I have already described the same battle to him twenty times without his having noticed it." The same man finding Mr. B. in the smoking-room, said: "Well, what do you think of the general?" "A very brave man; but he has no memory. He keeps telling me the same story. In short, he is an old bore."

In a suit of separation the counsel for the wife pleaded, among other motives, the incompatibility of temper, and began to trace a portrait of the husband: "Brutal, violent anger—" The lawyer for the husband, in his turn, painted the wife: "Wicked, violent, peevish—" "Excuse me," said the judge, interrupting the advocate; "gentlemen, where do you find incompatibility of temper?"

THE canvasser for a new paper wrote to the publisher of the Morning Oracle: "We note your advertisement in the Evening Swell. We will insert it at twenty-five per cent. less than that paper charges." The publisher of the Morning Oracle replied: "We get the advertisement for nothing. We accept your terms; please send cheque for difference."

THIS story is told of a reviewer who paid an author back in his own coin. The author, Mr. John Morley, had insisted on printing "God" as "god" throughout one of his books. The reviewer was equally careful in the frequent mention of Mr. Morley's name, to have it appear as "mr. john morley."

THE Duke of Wellington, as is well known, stood as godfather to the Duke of Connaught. On the prince's birth the warrior received an odd rebuff from the nurse. He asked, simply enough: "Is it a boy or a girl?" and received the crushing reply: "It is a prince, your grace."

"FATHER, what is poetic licence?" "Well, my boy, as nearly as I can learn, poetic licence is something which enables a man to say things in verse which would incarcerate him in a lunatic asylum if worked off at a political meeting."

It must make a clergyman feel complimented, after delivering a sermon an hour long, to see a three-inch report of it in the paper next day, preceded by the words: "The substance of Rev. Mr. Textual's sermon is given below."

THE Burmans believe that when a man is critically sick, the best thing to do is to give the patient a mixture of everything in the medicine-chest. A good many doctors in this country seem to have the same idea.

THE celebrated "orator" Henley once attracted to his oratory an audience of shoemakers by announcing that he would teach a new and short way of making shoes, his way being to cut off the tops of boots.

A VISITOR in Dublin was asked by a car-driver if he wanted a car. "No," said he; "I am able to walk." "May yer honour long be able but seldom willing!" was the witty rejoinder.

"MY best thoughts are always the hardest to write," said a literary man. "Yes," replied an acquaintance, "and they are always the hardest to read."

THE boy who was discovered in the act of concealing a piece of mincepie in his mother's clock, explained that he was only trying to kill time.

PRACTICE makes perfect. True; but a man can contrive to drop a hot plate as readily the first time trying as the second.

Correspondence.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Enquiries will be attended to as quickly as possible, but, as we have to go to press several days before publication, some delay is inevitable. In no case can questions be answered "next week," as some of our friends demand.

We have received several very unreasonable complaints of delay in attending to letters, which have been addressed to us by Correspondents who have paid no regard to the instructions which are given every week in this Journal.

The Editor is therefore compelled to give notice:

1. That all letters containing postage-stamps for copies of this Journal, or on similar business, must be addressed to the PUBLISHER.
2. That all letters containing enquiries for the Correspondence Column, or on literary business, must be addressed to the EDITOR.
3. That Correspondents are urgently requested to adopt distinctive pseudonyms, and not to use such vague signatures as "A Constant Reader," etc.
4. That Correspondents wishing to write on two or more subjects—say to send in an answer to a Correspondent, and to enclose stamps for a copy of the Journal—must send each communication in a separate envelope, properly addressed as above indicated.
5. That NO ATTENTION can be paid to any Correspondents who do not observe these rules.

ANSWERS.

AMATEUR DRESSMAKER.—The proper kind of Confirmation cap is merely a square of white muslin drawn in at the back. If you like to send an addressed envelope and three penny stamps we will forward you a pattern. The dresses can be made in any simple fashion, and it should be borne in mind that for this occasion the dress cannot be too plain. All kinds of white woollen materials are worn for Confirmation dresses, as they clean or dye well afterwards. Cashmere, merino, serge, and nun's veiling. The last is cheap, but not profitable, as it cleans badly. Send to Pryce Jones, Newtown, Montgomeryshire, for some patterns. White shoes are unsuitable at a Confirmation. Black are preferable.

BOMBAY.—A correspondent kindly sends the following advice for your benefit and that of "Perplexed Housekeeper," to whom we replied on this matter in HOUSEHOLD WORDS, No. 145: "Make a few small 'squibs' of Keating's Powder and Sulphur in equal proportions. Take a room or two at a time, close every aperture which might admit air, place three or four squibs in each, suspended over a saucer, light them, and go away. Return in an hour or two, and throw open windows. No fleas can stand this."

E. BROWN.—We readily answer enquiries relative to the culture of plants, but could do so much more effectually if the age, size, and condition of the plants were made known to us, with the means at the command of the cultivator for growing them. Notes on the culture of the Arum Lily will shortly appear, and they will be of greater service to you than anything we could briefly insert in this column.

IMPECUNIOUS.—We do not know of any other institution than the Dental Hospital of London at all likely to help you. No doubt you could there get advice how to have your want supplied as cheaply as possible.

JESSIE CARELESS.—Moisten the spot with water: rub in a weak solution of citric acid, and keep it wet for a few days. Strong applications will make a hole in the fabric.

MISS E.—"Dame Durden" is published in three volumes by Messrs. Tinsley, 31s. 6d. You can get it at any circulating library.

MOTHER'S HELP.—All the information you seek of the first principles of cookery is to be found in the articles which have been given from time to time in this Journal. It is a common mistake to suppose that a knowledge of cookery comes by intuition, or that it can be picked up anyhow without expense or without trouble. A great deal of experience is required to enable anyone to cook with certainty, and to produce invariably good results, and you must not be surprised or disheartened at failures. Always try and discover what was the cause that the dish was spoiled, and you will then find that in cookery, as in other matters, "failure is the high road to success."

PARLIAMENT.—The Chiltern Hundreds are Burnham, Desborough, and Stoke, an estate of the Crown on the chain of chalk hills that pass from east to west through the middle of Buckinghamshire, the stewardship whereof is a nominal office, with a salary of 20s., conferred on Members of Parliament when they wish to vacate their seats, as, by accepting an office under the Crown, a member becomes disqualified, unless he be again returned by his constituents. The strict legality of the practice is questioned.

PHILIPPA.—If you do not wish to have shoes and stockings the same colour as your dress, try bronze shoes and flesh-pink silk stockings, or dark red shoes and pink stockings.

PICTORIAL.—1. You will find full information about all the picture exhibitions in "Dickens's Dictionary of London." The dates at which pictures are received and the exhibitions opened will be found under the different headings. 2. We have successfully washed fine raised old point-lace as follows: Make a lather of Hudson's Extract of Soap, a table-spoonful to a quart of hot water: let the lace lie in this until the lather is cold, moving it about now and then. Gently squeeze it with the hand, dipping it in and out of the lather until it seems clean. Mix a ten-spoonful of powdered borax in a pint of water and rinse the lace in it. Have ready several folds of soft linen cloth, on which spread the lace, covering it with more folds, pressing it with the hands, after which leave it for a day, when, if not dry, put it in fresh cloths. With an ivory crochet-needle work the patterns into shape, and the lace will then be ready for use. Old lace, being very tender, will not bear pulling out, and it is better not to iron it, or use any starch. The borax gives a slight stiffening.

ROSA LE B.—The poem, "My Kate," is by Elizabeth Barrett Browning. It is too long for us to print in its entirety, and we can only give the first and three last verses:

She was as pretty as women I know,
And yet all your best made of sunshine and snow
Drop to shade, melt to nought in the long-trodden ways,
While she's still remembered on warm and cold days—
My Kate.

None knelt at her feet confessed lovers in thrall;
They knelt more to God than they used—that was all;
If you praised her as charming, some asked what you meant,
But the charm of her presence was felt when she went—
My Kate.

The weak and the gentle, the ribald and rude,
She took as she found them, and did them all good;
It always was so with her—see what you have!
She has made the grass greener even here—with her grave—
My Kate.

My dear one! when thou wast alive with the rest,
I held thee the sweetest and loved thee the best;
And now thou art dead! shall I not take thy part,
As thy smiles used to do for thyself, my sweetheart—
My Kate.

SAUCE FOR THE GOOSE.—1. Escallops can either be stewed or scalloped, and are now in full season. Having carefully freed them from sand, put them in a stewpan with sufficient water to cover them, and a small bit of butter. Stew very gently for twenty minutes, or until perfectly tender. Thicken the liquor with flour mixed smoothly in a little milk; season with cayenne pepper; add a small quantity of lemon juice and serve very hot. If to be scalloped, stew the escallops, and finish exactly as for oysters. 2. For full particulars of the National Debt, see "Whitaker's Almanack."

STALL-HOLDER.—We know of nothing by which you can make so much money, or furnish your charity bazaar stall more effectively, than by articles made with the "Patent Silk Ornaments." The "Art Needlework Crevell Appliques" of this company are beautiful, and not to be distinguished from hand embroidery. The Ecclesiastical designs, comprising crosses and sacred monograms in gold-coloured silk, are equal in merit to the floral designs, and many articles of church use can be quickly and satisfactorily made with them. The "Art Needlework Feather Appliques" are very handsome and wonderfully cheap. Send three penny stamps for a catalogue to "The Patent Silk Ornament Company," Finsbury House, Finsbury Square, E.C.

UNCOMMERCIAL.—1. The carriage of parcels to Switzerland can be prepaid, and can be sent through Pitt and Scott's Foreign Express, 44, St. Paul's Churchyard. The rate, which does not include custom charges, is, not exceeding 2lb., 2s.; 5lb., 2s. 4d.; 9lb., 2s. 4d. There is a duty on tea which must be paid at the other end. 2. It is necessary to endorse a cheque if made payable to order, whether crossed or not.

W.—Mealworms can be readily propagated by putting a handful of the larvæ into a stone jar (well glazed in the inside), three parts full of bran, barley, or oatmeal, and some pieces of sugar-paper, cloth, and shoe-leather. The jar should be covered over with a piece of board, fitting closely, or a piece of cloth, and left undisturbed for three or four months, when a numerous colony will have been formed, for the larvæ soon change into beetles, which lay an enormous number of eggs, and, if kept warm, a plentiful supply will always be at hand of an insect highly relished by every kind of bird. The flour, etc., must, of course, be renewed from time to time. See "The Amateur's Aviary" (3s. 6d.), by W. T. Greene, M.D. (L. Upcott Gill).

WHITE MOUSE.—You should certainly get medical advice, either privately or at some hospital. There are several medicines which would no doubt benefit you, and these will be prescribed by a doctor on seeing you. You will do well to get into the open air as much as possible.

WIDOWED MOTHER.—1. The schoolmaster will be your best adviser: only a person who knows what progress your son has made can tell if he requires special preparation for the examination. 2. It depends on what department of the service he enters. 3. We should say that, failing to pass the examination, your son should turn to the business or profession for which he has the most aptitude, and for which your means enable him to qualify himself.

The Second Mrs. Glyn.

(A COMPLETE STORY.)

CHAPTER I. THERESA'S TROUBLES AND JOYS.

MR. GLYN had married again, just two years after his first wife's death; many of his friends were surprised, and some of his connections went so far as to be angry about it. Was not his daughter all that a girl should be, and the adored of the old, never-changed servants who gave a particular stamp to his house?

And now—he had married again! Had married a young woman, positively penniless, the orphan daughter of some scampish artist, a young woman who seemed to have no relation in the world but a needy brother, worse than herself, who had nothing to recommend her but a fine figure, a pair of sparkling black eyes, and very rosy cheeks—a young woman with loud voice and audacious manners. Most of Mr. Glyn's friends were content to condemn her unseen, and to lament the day when he found her, living as a companion in the house of some superannuated lady of his acquaintance. She called this lady "a sort of cousin," and she was too feeble, so said Mr. Glyn's connections, to contradict her. The wedding took place at the old lady's church, the breakfast was given at her house. And now what was poor Constance Glyn to do with such a stepmother?

It must be confessed that Constance herself rather ruefully echoed this question. Ever true to the traditions of her life, this good girl had held that her father could do no wrong; it had always seemed to her quite right that he should do what he liked, while his wife and daughter stopped at home and did what they ought. It was quite improper for women to criticise men, because women did not understand "business." Such was the girl's simple social creed. Of course she did not criticise her father when he married again; but was it in human nature not to pass judgment on his second wife?

I am afraid Constance judged her almost as severely as cook did, or Jane, the excellent old housemaid, or even Martha, once Constance's nurse, now her attendant and speechlessly indignant champion.

It was the first morning after the bride's coming home; Constance rose at her usual early hour, let Martha give her a preliminary breakfast, and read "history and literature" as usual till eleven o'clock.

Presently she heard a loud contralto voice singing on the stairs, a door opened and shut rather noisily, then the singing ceased, and the voice called out:

"Where shall I find breakfast? Will anyone show me the way?"

Constance opened the door, and Theresa ran down to her, handsome, blooming, but, thought the girl, decidedly odd. She wore a loose pink morning-robe, with white fringes and bows, tied round the waist with cord and tassels; pink high-heeled slippers tapped the ground as she walked, and her hair was gathered up picturesquely and put away under a little concoction of lace and pink ribbon, meant for a cap. Her wide smile showed the long gleam of her white teeth as she met Constance; she was perfectly at home, and happy, and made no apology for her late appearance.

She pulled up the blind, and stood by the window talking gaily and noisily; excited by the light and sound, the canary began to sing shrilly; the sunshine made all the plate and silver on the table glitter again. Somehow the whole room seemed suddenly filled with sound and glare, and a fear came over Constance that wherever Theresa was, noise and glare would certainly be.

"Cook came up for orders," remarked the young lady presently, as a suggestion of duty. "Would you like to see her now?"

"Not at all. Tell her to give us something fit to eat—not such soup as yesterday. Your father could not touch it. We can't keep her if she sends up such horrible things."

"Not keep her!"

Constance echoed the words. She was the only cook the girl remembered, except a dimly-recalled vision of a "Sarah" of her babyhood. Not keep her! What a horrible idea!

"Oh, you don't know how nice cook is," she pleaded.

"What is the good of the cook being nice, if her soups are nasty?" said Theresa, leaning back in her armchair. She had put her clasped hands behind her head, and stuck out her slipped feet in an attitude that certainly would have tempted Dr. Johnson to "kick them in again," but which was not without a certain audacious gracefulness.

"However, my dear," she went on, noticing her companion's dismay, "if the cook is a pet of yours, we must manage to get on with her somehow."

"Breakfast, please," as the maid appeared at the door.

Jane withdrew very hastily in some displeasure.

"Nice time for breakfast," she said to herself; "and when, pray, was luncheon to come—or dinner?"

And there arose a sense of wrong in her breast as she thought of the misplaced meals.

Constance saw how much virtuous indignation Jane was suppressing, and feared Theresa might find out too; but that lady was too full of contentment, it appeared, to see clouds anywhere. She chattered of her past life in Continental studios and cheap schools, to the wonder of Constance; she dwelt on the charms of her brother Harry; she breakfasted remarkably well, and finally carried off Constance upstairs to inspect her new treasures.

Always merry, reckless, kindly, a gaudy picture without any shade, Theresa seemed to Constance a tiring creature to contemplate. But Mr. Glyn was full of admiration, and forsook his club for her; he escorted her to "sights," for which she had an insatiable appetite, and went with her to the theatre with the most wonderful docility.

Then Sunday came and all the traditions of the house were upset by the announcement that Harry Lane, Mrs. Glyn's brother, was coming to dinner. Sunday visitors! It was high treason to the servants, and they went about with that look of martyrdom so effectively used in "quiet families."

Constance shared the dismay, gave leave for Jane to go to church in the morning, as she would be kept in that evening, and went off herself before Theresa came down. Somehow there was to her a sense of wickedness in going out and leaving those closed rooms and drawn blinds behind, as if it were the very essence of Sunday that was being shut out.

It was a new experience, for Mr. Glyn was one of those who do make sacrifices to their good opinion of themselves, and one of his sacrifices was going to church on Sunday morning. It was quite dreadful to his daughter that he should stay away.

When she came home the door was opened to her by the excellent Martha with a countenance of mingled mystery, consternation, and triumph, as who should say: "We are very uncomfortable indeed, though we must not own it, and I always knew we should be."

"Oh, Miss Constance, my dear," she whispered (it was one of her protests to whisper, it implied that she had too many enemies about to speak aloud), "your pa was so vexed at Jane's going to church! She ought to have brought up Mrs. Glyn's breakfast, it seems, and he didn't like my doing it, but don't you say I said so."

Mystery was unladylike in Constance's eyes. She walked sedately into the dining-room, where Theresa, in her pink robe, was playing with her coffee-cup, and Mr. Glyn was looking at his newspaper, sitting at ease, with slippers on. Constance came in as a contrast in Sunday attire, prayer-book in hand, but she softened the stern virtue of her appearance with an apology for the absence of Jane.

Mr. Glyn looked a little annoyed; having stopped at home himself, of course it was incumbent upon him to show that this was the most virtuous thing to be done.

"Yes, my dear, yes," he said. "Every duty has its time, and it strikes me Jane would have done better to stay at home and look after her mistress."

The imperturbable Theresa interrupted with a loud laugh and hope that Jane would do all the sermons for her mistress, who would willingly spare her on that condition.

A speech this which happily averted a discussion, but shocked poor Constance. By-and-by her feelings were more keenly tried by the appearance of Harry Lane, a reckless young man, idle, and given to too much smoking and billiard-playing. His characteristics were so strongly marked that even Constance understood them at first sight, and Mr. Glyn began to feel that his wife's love for her brother charmed him less than any other point in her character.

Very incongruous elements certainly poor Mr. Glyn had brought into his house, and dimly he felt his indiscretion already—he who so valued everything irreproachable in his household, who felt so indubitably that if any small faults were committed there they could only be excusable in himself. But Theresa's high spirits and fuller nature overpowered him, and matters went on submissively enough till one morning an unexpected bill of Theresa's—a milliner's bill contracted before her marriage—brought on an alarming storm.

Mr. Glyn was particularly sensitive about money-matters, he was consistently economical even to parsimony, where his own pleasures were not concerned. And the bill was really extravagant.

No wonder the storm raged fiercely—no wonder Theresa felt suddenly that her power over her husband was swept from her hand.

Constance, from whom she kept no secret, looked on with dilated eyes, aghast, and honestly pitying her father. Why, if things went on like this the man would actually have to yield and be self-denying for the woman's sake—a reversal of all propriety in her eyes. Certainly it would have been equally shocking to her father, but Theresa's charms had still a great effect upon him. After the first shock she used her invincible good-humour and brightness so effectively that peace once more prevailed. Only Mr. Glyn was understood to have purchased a certain emancipation when he paid the bill; her theatres and sight-seeings were henceforth to be reduced in number. No matter, she made herself happy without them.

Constance, rejoicing that the tempest had spent itself, did not notice signs of more gathering clouds. Mysterious signs and hints from Martha about the grocer's remarks, or the novelty of the baker's-book being "left to run," passed by her unheeded, till she was roused to a sense of danger and dismay, the more terrible from its suddenness.

It was a wet and chilly day, the rain beat against the windows, and the mist was creeping up dismally outside. But they had lighted the fire, and it shone with a pleasant unexpectedness, as summer fires are wont to do. Theresa was chattering and laughing as usual, whilst Constance was in an absent mood, and had no idea what she was saying, when the door opened hastily, and Mr. Glyn came in. He had been with them till after luncheon, lingering over the fire, and they fancied that he had gone out for the evening; but there he was again, with an unusual look of anger on his face. He was not a man who was often capable of more than pettish vexation, but on occasion he could give vent to some poor passion, suited to the poverty of his nature. Now he came in, evidently on the verge of such agitation, holding a crumpled note in his hand.

"Theresa," he exclaimed in a tone that startled her, "I have just received this. Have the goodness to explain it."

He put the paper into her hand, and stood facing her while she read it.

"What does it mean?" he repeated.

Theresa looked up with a heightened colour, but with a smile.

"Unluckily," she said, "the meaning is only too plain. Your baker wishes to be paid for the bread he has sent you. These people are so selfish; they'll do nothing without money."

"And is it true that he has not been paid since the beginning of March?"

"I dare say it's true if he says so, for he keeps account more correctly than I do—bad luck to him!"

"Then I desire to know what you have done with the money with which I supposed you discharged these debts."

His weak voice was strained with his violence, and Constance, in great alarm, hurried from the room.

"Do you suppose," he went on, "that I am a rich man, able to pay anything your extravagance requires?"

"I hope you are able to pay that bill, as he seems rather bent on getting the money."

"Is that the way you answer me?"

"Is that the way you speak to me?" she said in the same unmoved tone. "Sit down and speak civilly if you want me to listen."

"Have the goodness to leave off that tone of levity, and tell me at once what you have done with the money I gave you."

"Different things—paid other bills with it. There's always plenty to do with money, you know."

"Is this baker's bill the only one left unpaid?"

"No."

"What else?"

She did not answer.

"I insist on knowing the truth," he said.

"Don't agitate yourself unnecessarily. The fact is, the grocer has not had any money lately, I'm afraid, nor that useful individual, the butcher."

"You have paid nobody, then? It is intolerable!"

If there had been a little more power in his wrath, she would have been subdued; but he was weak, and she smiled provokingly as she answered:

"Now, Wilfred, don't bully, and I'll make a confession to you. I owed some more money before I married besides that dress bill. Some tradespeople have such confiding dispositions."

"Theresa," he almost shrieked, "talk like that, and you'll drive me mad! I won't stand it—I tell you I won't stand it." He got up in fury. "Why don't you tell the truth at once? Why don't you say you gave the money to your scoundrel of a brother?"

"You are going too far," she returned with a sudden change in her face, and her lips growing white.

"Am I? Now listen to me, madam, and see how far I'll go. This is my house—do you hear?—and as long as I live that fellow shall never enter my doors again. I swear it!"

"Wilfred!"

"Never again—so now you know. A rascal! a scoundrel! I should like to give him in charge."

It was at this auspicious moment that the servant announced "Mr. Lane."

"Show him into the dining-room," shouted the master. "And sit down," he pursued to his wife as she sprang up hastily.

She remained standing, however, eyeing him rather scornfully as he went to the door; then he returned, drew a chair to the table, and wrote a note hastily with trembling hand.

"To tell him to keep out of my way for the future," he said.

"Why don't you tell him so to his face?" she asked.

There was no reply. The note was presently sent down, and Mr. Glyn listened a little anxiously, till the front door had banged again, and a message was brought up that Mr. Lane would see Mr. Glyn at his club.

Theresa stood transfixed; the loss of her husband's confidence, the discovery that she had given his money away, did not pain as it ought to have done; she had not been taught to feel shame for such things. But for Harry she could feel—Harry, coming to her perhaps cold and hungry, wanting a dinner perhaps, and thus cruelly sent away. She had little sense of dignity, and though a moment before she had been disposed to despise her husband for his weakness, she now became his humble suppliant.

"Oh, Wilfred, pray—pray think better of it. I will do anything you like, only be good to Harry. It was all my fault, I lent him the money—he did not know how it was."

But there was no spark of generosity in him to answer her.

"You can spare yourself the trouble of remonstrance," he said. "You have received Mr. Lane here for the last time. I shall be nearly enough ruined as it is."

He felt it so, indeed, at the moment; it was too exasperating, too maddening, to be treated thus. Theresa did not answer him; she sat gazing drearily into the coals, following Harry in her thoughts, till a pause in Mr. Glyn's speech gave her an opportunity of rising, and making her escape from the room.

Wretched hours followed meals of evident warfare, when Theresa talked and laughed, and Mr. Glyn ostentatiously abstained from attending to her, times when everyone knew that the servants were judging the merits of the quarrel, and condemning their mistress. Mr. Glyn stopped at home, looked over bills, and seriously confided his distress to Constance; for he was grieved and hurt indeed when he perceived that he could not make up for Theresa's recklessness simply by stinting his family, as he naturally wished, but that a crisis might arise in which he would really have to stint himself.

Constance truly sympathised as she listened; she wished the fortune she inherited from her mother were her own to help her father with. But she was only eighteen, and had nothing to dispose of but a yearly allowance from her trustees.

As these dull days went on, the burden grew heavier than the culprit knew how to bear. Her nature was rather heedless than strong; she could love after her fashion, and had some ineffectual gratitude towards her husband. She had known very little kindness before she had married him, and for his daughter she had a dawning awe, a sense that there was goodness in her, beyond anything she had ever fancied before. And she had lost the regard of father and daughter too. It took her some time to realise this, for there was little sensitiveness in her slowly awakening nature. But when she did find it out, the knowledge was very bitter to her.

Tears gathered in her eyes and dropped into her lap as she sat in the twilight, thinking. Constance was too good for her; she had never known the sordid things that had burdened Theresa's life.

"But I would have been nice to her, and perhaps got her to like me in time; and I would have got the bills straight when Harry was better off, and could pay me, and then perhaps they would all have been friends with me. But that will never be now."

She had been alone almost all the afternoon, and as the evening drew near the dreariness seemed more than she could bear. It was positive relief when her husband marched solemnly into the room, sat down opposite to her with his utmost attempt at majesty, cleared his throat, and tried to be very impressive.

He had a painful subject to speak about, he said. He wished to show her, what she must doubtless already see for herself, how very badly she had treated him.

He then presented the whole list of his domestic grievances, plainly showing her how impeccable he was, and how wicked she, after the fashion of setters-forth of grievances in general. He did not spare to dwell upon her extravagances, her carelessness of his interests, her deceit; and, happily for herself, she was just then too far gone for any attempt at mockery or justification.

She listened in silence, with more and more sinking of the heart, as she told herself that Constance had heard all that top. The thought deepened and deepened like a black cloud, till at last she could bear it no longer.

"Oh, Wilfred!" she cried out, "stop!" and with one of her sudden movements she threw herself on her knees beside him, and laid her head in his lap. She forgot everything in an impulsive longing for peace and forgiveness at any cost.

He was so very much astonished that he stopped in his speech, and stared at her drooping head awkwardly.

"Oh, Wilfred, I know I've done wrong! I know I'm a plague to you. I dare say you're sorry you ever married me; but don't scold me any more just now. I feel stupid to-night, as if I couldn't bear it."

She clasped her hands before her face, and sobbed and cried in the curiously-unrestrained manner in which she usually laughed.

Mr. Glyn felt embarrassed. He had never seen her cry before, and he did not know what to make of it now. Besides, he was touched. He thought this pathetic effect was produced by his own eloquence, and such a thought is always touching.

He was not an unfeeling man either, exactly; only he always felt for himself first, and he did not like to see this bright, handsome creature shaking with sobs, though she had behaved badly. He looked at her now for the first time, as when he was scolding he kept his eyes on the fire, and he became more softened every moment.

He was not to be baffled though, or to lose sight of his chief object of solicitude, namely, himself, in this momentary agitation.

On the contrary he felt sure it was best to bring out all his plans during this surrender of the enemy; now was the time for getting some definite submission out of her.

"Theresa," he said, putting his arm round her, "you must know I do not complain without cause."

"Plenty of cause, but if you only wouldn't just now!"

"And I think you will see that I must make some change in our style of living."

"Yes, do."

"I was willing to make a greater effort," he continued, "than I was perhaps justified in making to satisfy your wishes; but, after all, your imprudence has made it impossible to go on as I have begun."

"Oh yes; change anything you like, only be friends with me."

"The changes must be decided and immediate, you know. We must begin at once, live very quietly, keep only two servants, hire no carriage." He was hurrying out his conditions all in a breath, anxious to get the articles of the treaty ratified while the best of the combat was his.

"Anything, anything if you'll only be kind again and not so hard on poor Harry."

"Haven't I good reason to complain of your brother's behaviour? Was it not regard for him that made you treat me so ill?"

"Oh, Wilfred, you are very hard!" and she put down her head again and sobbed violently.

"My dear Theresa, don't do that," he said, anxious to pacify her now that his intentions were known and undisputed. "Don't make me feel myself cruel when I am only saying what I could not help."

Then he raised her head and kissed her, and made her sit beside him, while he put his arm round her and explained how good he was to her, and how much consideration was due to him. She cried herself quiet, and began to be happy again; he was friends with her, he would perhaps get Constance to be nice to her too, and the rest would blow over in time. She did not feel the painfulness of being forgiven, as some natures do; she did feel that her eyes were sore, and her cheeks hot, and her head aching, she did feel subdued and speechless when she went down to dinner. And when the two ladies were alone after dinner, she horrified Constance by exclaiming that she had been morally beaten, and she felt black and blue.

"I never used to mind," she went on rather pleadingly, "I have been knocked about a good deal, and I got used to it, you know. But if you happen to be fond of the person who's beating you, so much the worse for you and for him too."

"Don't talk so," exclaimed the girl, shrinking from her words. She could not realise that she was called upon to hear such things from her father's wife.

CHAPTER II. AN EXPLOSION.

MONTHS glided away so peacefully that Constance had almost forgotten all about the storms. The household was certainly far more quiet and frugal in its ways than it had been, and Harry Lane appeared among them no more. But this was all as it should be, and did not trouble her. As to Theresa, she seemed happy and contented as ever, and Mr. Glyn enjoyed much of his old liberty.

It was therefore a surprise to the girl to be met by her stepmother one day with a very troubled face.

"Look here, Constance," she exclaimed, "I'm in such a state of bother and fuss, really I don't know what to do."

Constance's expression became troubled, and a dread of new domestic storms came over her. Sweet as she was in most ways, she was still very far from giving her stepmother any sympathy. She did not think at all of pitying Theresa, but only was troubled at the idea of fresh disturbances.

She looked at a letter in Theresa's hand, suspecting the document of being a bill; but it was not a bill, as it happened.

"You know, dear," Mrs. Glyn went on, "that your father was so vexed about poor Harry, he said he mustn't come here any more. Now it's an age since I saw him, and he's sent me this note."

"DEAREST T,"

"I'm in a deuce of a scrape. Must see you at once. Write to me at Hawkins's, in the City, and say when and where."

"Yours,"

"H. LANE."

Constance read in silence, put the note down, and looked at Mrs. Glyn without speaking.

"Now, you see, Constance, I must go to him. I must find out what's the matter, or I don't know what will be the end of it. But I don't quite see how to manage it."

Constance still did not speak.

"I don't know how to manage it," repeated Theresa, looking at her, "I don't know where his rooms are now, and he don't mean me to go there, as he has only given his City address. But I can't go and see him in the City, and it's not comfortable meeting out of doors this kind of weather. I should like to have him here, only I don't know what the servants might say."

"But papa—" Constance began, and then she stopped short.

"He forbade Harry's coming here, you mean? Constance, I dare say I'm bad enough, but I do hate humbug, and I tell you plainly there are some things in which I shall always disobey my husband, if I get a chance."

"Then you had better not talk to me about it," said the girl with rising colour, for she felt the disrespect to her father.

"I may as well tell you the fact," pursued Theresa. "Of course I'd rather obey him, putting it at the lowest, that saves the trouble of thinking, at any rate, but there are some things in which I never shall obey him, I am very sure. The question with me, in this particular case, is how I can disobey him most conveniently."

"I cannot say," said Constance stiffly.

"I like you for being huffy about it," said Mrs. Glyn, "and I don't know why I spoke to you at all, only I must have somebody to talk to. I think I shall tell him to meet me in the waiting-room at the Great Western. That's convenient; I should not have far to go. We could have a good talk there, and nobody be the wiser."

Constance kept silence, resolved not to be more of an accomplice than she could help. It was a relief to her when a message presently arrived from her father that he would not return home till late, and still more a relief when Theresa came home through the falling twilight and hurried up the stairs. But surely something strange had happened to her? She was so strange and silent, crouching over the fire, and trembling, with face hidden in her hands. The mystery grew unbearable at last, and Constance knelt down by her stepmother with a new tenderness, and, with arms enfolding her, begged to be told the worst.

"It's Harry, my brother," Theresa cried at last. "He is ruined, and I am not to see him and help him. How can I turn my back upon him, and forget how we used to be alone in the world together? If he's not good, he never had a chance, and I'm not good either; we have both been too much knocked about in the world to be good. I dare say people who can sit at home, and wear what's bought for them, and eat what's cooked for them, can take care of their goodness. I believe you are good; but you never had to scheme for a bit of food, or something to wear, and we have had to do it often enough—there's the difference."

"Don't," cried Constance, in tears; "I won't be told I'm good—I'm not. But do tell me what is the matter. Let us see what we can plan."

"Harry's utterly ruined if I can't get him a hundred pounds before three days are over, and I haven't a hundred shillings, and don't know where to get any. That's what's the matter. I can't explain any more."

She came back again to her crouching over the fire, while Constance thought what she could possibly do. It seemed out of her power to find any suggestion but an appeal to her father, and this Theresa would not hear of. So the weary evening passed away.

Next day Theresa appeared strangely flushed and excited. When Constance would have said something about her trouble, she laughed an unnatural laugh, and declared she meant to think no more of Harry's scrapes; with her husband she was specially gay, only irritated when he observed that she looked ill and had no appetite.

When he left them alone again for the evening, she heaved a deep sigh of relief, confessed to a terrible headache, and suddenly suggested that Constance should amuse her by showing her the family jewels she had inherited, but would never take courage to wear. Constance tried to make a cheerful show of her diamond ear-rings and ancient bracelets and brooches, but there was something too strange and feverish in the gaze Theresa fixed upon them, and in the laugh with which she made them flash in the firelight. When at last she was persuaded to go to bed, she exclaimed in a constrained, high tone: "Let me take those diamonds with me to try on at my glass," and the colour deepened in her already fevered cheeks.

"Not to-night, pray," replied Constance; "some other time. You really ought to go to bed at once."

A look of intense disappointment and anxiety overspread Theresa's face, but her companion did not particularly observe it; she was busy collecting her jewel-cases.

"Let me carry some for you," and they went upstairs dividing the precious freight.

When they reached Mrs. Glyn's door, Constance paused for her to go in, but she kept possession of the cases, and passed on to her stepdaughter's room, saying:

"You must come with me to-night."

"Certainly," replied Constance. "But you should not stay here in the cold."

"Oh, you won't be a minute," observed Theresa, eagerly watching the girl's movements.

Constance unlocked a drawer, and put the jewels into it. As she did so Theresa shivered.

"Oh, pray go to the fire; let us make haste," she said, hastily re-locking the drawer, and throwing down the keys on her dressing-table. Then Theresa suffered herself to be taken to bed at last.

"Let me sit by you for a little while," said Constance.

"No, no, thank you. Go. I can ring if I want anything."

"Well, at all events I shall not go to bed just yet," the girl said as she left the room.

Theresa raised herself upon her elbow and listened intently for the direction of the retreating footsteps. She heard them descending the stairs, and fell back with an expression of relief.

Constance sat in the drawing-room, and waited and listened, but heard nothing. Yet there was a stealthy movement above—a foot-fall that could be soft enough upon occasion. Theresa, with shaded light, passed noiselessly from her own room to her stepdaughter's, and in two or three minutes as softly returned.

Constance sat up till her father came in, very late, and went to his room without seeing her. Then she, too, retired, sighing, and rather dreading what to-morrow might bring. But she was by no means prepared for Theresa's first observation when she went to visit her next morning.

"I shall get up and I shall go out."

"Nonsense! that would be a mad thing to do."

"Mad! that would just suit me. I am a little bit mad, I believe."

Constance perceived that argument would be worse than useless, it would be better to treat the proposition as a joke, so she laughed slightly, which is generally a safe reply, and proceeded to make arrangements for her patient's breakfast.

Theresa was very eager in persuading Mr. Glyn to go out as usual, and would not hear of his putting off an engagement on her account.

"Good-bye, then," he said affectionately, "till this evening."

"Ah, till this evening! What will have happened by the evening, I wonder?"

He looked a little startled, but she only gave an odd sort of laugh and said he must bring her all the news; wherewith he went out, not very well satisfied.

All the morning Theresa seemed quiet enough, inclined to be amenable, but about one o'clock she got up and dressed herself in spite of remonstrance.

"Now, you really must sit close by the fire, and keep very quiet," said Constance.

"No, I am going out." Her voice was hoarser, her face more flushed than ever, and the girl looked at her incredulously.

"Nonsense! you will try and take the broth that Martha has got ready for your lunch; you know you had no breakfast."

"I will have some before I go out."

Constance administered the broth, but very little was swallowed, and then Theresa rose silently and went upstairs. She was there a few minutes, and then Constance heard the steps coming down again; they passed the drawing-room door, and went on towards the hall. Constance ran out to see, and there was Mrs. Glyn with her bonnet on going towards the front door.

Constance darted after her downstairs, but before she could reach her Mrs. Glyn was gone, and the girl was left to new anxiety as she paced the room, looking first from one window, then from another. It was a cold afternoon, threatening snow; as the gusts of icy wind swept by she trembled to think of that poor fevered creature exposed to such weather.

The light faded, and the street was quite dim; she watched the lamps starting into brightness one after the other, her heart sinking more and more. Where could her stepmother have gone? Why was she so long? Had some illness come upon her out of doors? Was she unable to return?

Again and again she asked herself what she might have done.

Might she not have held Theresa by force, have called for assistance, have prevented this mad act? More and more the minutes dragged; more and more sickening grew the delay; but all at once her heart almost stood still. There was her father coming towards the door, she saw him plainly under the lamp opposite, now he crossed the road, and now she heard his latch-key rattle in the lock.

What would he say? How could she tell him?

She turned round, but did not advance as he opened the door, but stood near the window trembling.

"What! all in the dark here?" he said in a cheerful tone, then looking round he perceived Constance, and asked, "Where's Theresa?"

"Oh, papa!" Constance's voice faltered, and she stopped short.

"What! is she worse? Is anything the matter? Is it anything catching?" he asked, hurrying out the questions that most haunted his fears.

"No, no, papa; she is—gone out."

"What?"

"Gone out."

"Good Heavens! Gone out! Where?"

"I don't know. Oh, papa! don't be frightened, she will be back again soon, I am sure."

Then he questioned about this astonishing proceeding, and Constance told him the time and manner of the departure, not venturing to explain more. He was full of ghastly conjectures on his part, and they watched together till their figures were indistinct in the dimness, and he began to move about, pushing against the furniture, pausing at the window, opening and shutting the door, and declaring every five minutes that if she did not return at once he must go and do something.

Many a time they stopped in their talk at the sound of wheels, and looked out to see if anything were coming to them.

At last Constance said:

"There's a cab; is it coming here?"

It drove up and stopped at the door; Mr. Glyn went downstairs, and his daughter stood clasping her hands, fearing she knew not what.

In a few moments her father came in again with his wife leaning on his arm. Constance stirred up the fire with an instinct of welcome; the flame showed her the two coming in. Neither spoke, until Mr. Glyn said:

"Theresa, what can you have been doing?"

She made no reply.

"It was the maddest thing to go out like that. You have frightened us terribly. I really cannot understand it. What have you been doing?"

She stood opposite to him, making no answer, and in the firelight her eyes shone fixed upon his face.

"Theresa! what is—why don't you speak?"

"Not now, not now," she returned in a whisper.

"You must—you must give me some explanation. What is the matter? What have you been doing?"

"Oh, Wilfred! I would not have come back—I would not have come back, only there was nowhere else to go, and it was cold, and I was ill. But I know I ought not to have come back."

He retreated a step or two in a sort of horror.

"Tell me what you mean," he said.

"You thought I was ill," she went on in a monotonous kind of voice, "and I was; but it was partly fright and trouble. Harry sent for me to go and see him, and then he told me he was in great distress. He had taken away a hundred pounds of his master's money, and if he could not replace it by to-morrow, all would be discovered and he would be ruined. I had no money. I dared not ask you, you were angry with Harry. I did not know what to do. I could not help it. I took away Constance's diamonds and pawned them to-day for a hundred pounds, and took the money to Harry. Wilfred, I would not have come back, only—what could I do?"

Constance stood frozen with horror. Mr. Glyn gave a little gasping sound.

"Oh, Wilfred!" Theresa went on in a beseeching tone, "I know you must hate me, and Constance will hate me; but I could not help it, and Harry is so—" Suddenly she reeled, her voice failed her, and she fell fainting at her husband's feet.

Mr. Glyn did not speak. He raised his wife quietly from the ground and placed her on the sofa, then stood looking at her in a bewildered fashion. It was Constance who called for help, helped Martha to bring restoratives, and dispatched a message for the doctor.

Theresa was many days before she knew them again; she lay raving of jewels and of her brother, while Constance stood looking pitifully at her, as Martha ministered to her wants. Mr. Glyn never spoke to his daughter of Theresa's terrible words; but she found the diamonds in her room, placed there by him without any explanation, and he mentioned to her incidentally that he had assisted Harry Lane to leave England for Australia. No one said anything of the cause of Theresa's illness, except Martha, who seemed rather to revel in so fine an example of the results of exposure after "a chill."

Yet, somehow it was generally known among Mr. Glyn's connection that something had happened in his household beside an illness, and many were the conjectures indulged in on this matter. But Mr. Glyn did not hear them, and if any were conveyed to Constance's ears, she calmly refused to heed.

That was a long and weary winter in the Glyn household, and when the spring was coming they fled from London to brighter places in the South of France. Theresa seemed thankful for the change, though she spoke little now, and was always seeking their forgiveness by her submission and gratitude. Health returned to her, and many assurances of affection from her husband and his daughter, but she continued still a woman "sadder and wiser."

As the years went by, Theresa lived a gentle, womanly life, till all but herself forgot the past, and people were moved to acknowledge that there was something not displeasing in the second Mrs. Glyn.

Missed.

Low breathes the wind, and quiet shines the moon,
The leafless boughs away softly in her light;
Yet still a restless wail is in the night,
And all the pulse of time is out of tune.

The measured chime the fevered senses jars;
The falling coal sends thrilling to the heart
The nameless terror in the foolish start,
And the owl's hoot speaks omen to the stars.

And round my head, like ghosts, sick fancies call
Of change and doubt; and last, with bated breath,
One creeps on close and closer, muttering Death;
For, I have missed his greeting—that is all.

CHAPTER III.

When troubles come they come not single spies,
But in battalions.

"Dust, to dust, ashes to ashes." . . .

Bare-headed, Sir Ivor stood beside the grave, and listened to those words. The sound of the earth falling on the coffin-lid seemed to fall like a dull blow on his own heart.

It echoed there, and lived there as he went back to the old desolate house—always to be desolate now, so he told himself, since for him no love of wife, or voice of child, was to gladden, or to cheer it.

The empty years stretched before him dark and hopeless enough, brightened only with memories that had turned him into a sad and lonely man.

"I can't live here—I can't stay here," he says that night, pacing to and fro his mother's room. "I must go away at once—I—"

A timid knock at the door cuts short his words. He turns, and his enquiry almost startles himself, so strangely does his voice fall on the silence of the dark and quiet room.

The door opens, and in the entrance stands Tom—a changed Tom now—a hungry, ragged, dreary-looking Tom no longer—but a tall, well-built, neatly-clad youth, with only the timidity and shrinking of that miserable past to identify him with the prosperity of the present.

"Your pardon, sir," he says respectfully, "I made so bold as to look in, knowing as how you was in great trouble. I—I hope you're not angry, sir."

"Angry, no," says Ivor gently. "Come in, if you wish. You've something to tell me, Tom, I know."

The lad's face flushes, he twists his cap nervously in his hands. But he enters the room and closes the door behind him.

"Yes, sir," he says, "I have. They've all been talking in the servants'-hall, sir, about—about your going away, and shutting up the Court for a year, or more."

"Well," asks Ivor, as he pauses, "what of that? You won't lose your place, Tom, if that's what you fear."

"Oh no, sir, it's not that, indeed," cries the lad eagerly. "It's—"

"Don't be afraid to tell me," says Ivor, pitying his confusion. "Do you want more wages?"

"Wages!" burst out Tom indignantly, "there'll never be no question of wages, sir, 'twixt you and me. I'd serve you till I died, only just for a kind word or look from you, and that's gospel truth, I swear. Oh, sir, you'll think me very bold, I know, but if you go away from here I—I want to go with you, sir. I can't bear to stay on here and never get sight of you. I know I'm a rough fellow, but I'll do my best, and I'm quick to learn; and I'll do anything—anything in the world, sir, only don't ask me to stay here without you!"

He stopped, breathless and hoarse with intense emotion, and there was something in his earnestness that touched Ivor deeply.

"My good lad," he said gently, "I really don't know what to say to you. I—I don't know what I could do with you abroad."

"I'll learn to valit you, sir, indeed I will!" burst out Tom.

"And I'll be that faithful and careful you won't repent it. I heard your man say as he detested furrin ways, and he warn't a going to trapeze all over the Contingong any longer, 'twas so discomfordin'; but I don't mind anything, sir, I assure you; and you might not feel so lonesome like if you had some one with you as know'd you and loved you faithful, and was always willin' to do all that a mortal man could do for your sake, sir, and for sake of the little dead gentleman that was good to him."

Ivor's heart was touched by such fidelity. The lad's white face spoke out the intense earnestness of his prayer, and such devotion coming in this time of sorrow, and grief, and loneliness, moved him more than he cared to say. Not one of all the pampered menials of that great household cared for his sorrow or felt his loss, though to them, these two who had died had been kind and generous protectors. But this lad, this miserable offshoot of poverty and degradation, who had been unnoticed, and almost forgotten, he alone carried warm and grateful remembrance in his heart. For a moment or two Ivor was silent, his eyes searching the pale, eager face where love and honesty spoke out in every line.

"Very well, Tom; have your way," he said at last. "After all, one can't buy service like yours. Get my fine gentleman to give you some hints, if he will. You've not much time, for I leave here in a couple of days. No, you needn't thank me," he added, stopping the rapturous flood of words. "It's something to know there's such a thing as loyalty and fidelity left. See, I give you credit for that, not for desire to step into Burke's shoes or—salary. If you come with me you're to rough it as I do, and get no more than you do now."

"Sir!" cried the boy, his eyes filling with tears. "You don't mean—you can't mean that you think so bad of me. I—I wish I could show you different."

"No, no," said Ivor kindly, "I don't misjudge you, Tom; I'm sure you meant every word you said."

"That I did, and do, sir," said the lad with simple earnestness.

"Perhaps some day I'll be able to prove my words, and then you'll know."

There was a moment's silence. Then the lad touched his forehead and turned to leave the room.

"I can't thank you enough, sir," he said. "I've cause to care for you and think of you, though you ain't never had no sort of reason to be so good to me. God bless you, sir!"

The door closed. Ivor was once more alone.

He moved over to the window and stood there for long, wrapped in anxious thought.

Another task still lay before him—an unwelcome one, and one from which he shrank with an unaccountable dread—the task of looking over his mother's papers, kept in the rosewood escritoire, which he never remembered to have seen unlocked until that day when she had been found stretched beside it.

Even now as he stood there and held the keys in his hands a shiver of nervous fear ran through his frame. He felt more than half inclined to leave this duty alone until his return from abroad. But another thought cut short his indecision.

"If anything happened to me," he said to himself, "if I were to die, this would be at the mercy of strangers. Surely it is best to learn what is to be learnt at once. Perhaps, after all, I am only alarming myself needlessly."

Mastering his weakness by a great effort, he drew a chair up to the cabinet and proceeded to unlock the drawers in succession. He went through a great many, finding only bundles of letters, tied and docketed, papers, bills, memorandum-books, but nothing of any special importance. In the last drawer he opened, lay a sealed packet, unaddressed. It was the letter his mother had been writing on the night of her illness.

He turned it over and over, marvelling for whom it was intended. At last he broke the seal, meaning only to read the first line as a clue to whom it was written.

But it commenced without any form or preamble, and instinctively he read on.

"Something warns me that my time on earth is drawing to an end. You have broken my heart, and you know it. I might have expected no mercy, for has not my past shown me what mercy your race are alone capable of showing? And yet, as you know what I suffered at other hands, you at least might have spared me now. I am glad that death is approaching, it will be kinder than you have been, and as my secret dies with me, so also dies your power. Do not attempt to threaten my son as you have threatened me—do not for one instant flatter yourself that he will buy your silence, or preserve the secret of your power as I, his weak and most unhappy mother, have done. You have sown distrust and coldness between me and the only earthly thing I loved. I cannot find it in my heart to forgive you, but I do say, Heaven deal with you as no human law or human justice can. Sometimes I think I have been wrong to believe you—that I should have fought you on your own ground, or confessed the truth to one better able to deal with your cunning and your power. But it is too late now. I was weak enough to yield once, and that once was all you needed. If death releases me from my bargain, it will be kinder than any human friend can be. One thing more I must say. Ivor has forbidden your presence here. Do not, therefore, force yourself upon me. Remember that flesh and blood cannot always stand such tyranny as yours, and one day I—even I—might be weak enough to repent and confess all. You best know how far such confession would serve your ends. Do not try my strength too severely. The cheque is enclosed as usual, and, as usual, I must request the form of a receipt. The total is nearly reached now—at what cost you know as well as I myself."

That was all. As Ivor Grant reached the last line, his face turned ashy pale; yet even now he was as far as ever from solving the mystery that had placed his mother in the power of this man. He dropped the paper on the table, and his hand, as it rested on the margin of the drawer, involuntarily grasped the wood with a fierce, nervous pressure. As he did so, a faint "click" caught his ear. The wooden panel at the back of the drawer fell open suddenly, revealing an aperture containing some papers. He started to his feet; a cold sweat bathed his brow. Swift as thought, his hands seized the documents and dragged them from their hiding-place.

One by one he opened and read them. One by one they brought to him at last the revelation of that secret to which he would have given any history, any name, save this. This—What was it that flamed and burnt before his eyes—a truth too plain, too terrible for doubt—a truth that framed itself into one bitter word, and so faced him there in very mockery of that dead woman's love, and weakness, and—

What was it? Dishonour? Aye, and worse than dishonour—beggary, ruin, a lasting shame, a lost inheritance—a very earthquake of desolation that in one second of time blasted and laid low his whole life.

The papers fell from his nerveless hand—fell one by one like the hopes they had slain, the memories they had poisoned.

One great, tearless sob heaved his chest; he sank slowly down, and his head fell forward on his arms.

There was a great silence in the room—a silence as of death.

For it was worse than any death-blow that had struck Ivor Grant down now to the very dust of agony and shame; and he met it without a moan, without a word of reproach against the woman whose hand had dealt it—blindly, ignorantly, perchance, but only too surely and fatally for all that.

CHAPTER IV. TREACHERY.

DUSK and sombre fall the shadows in the little churchyard beyond the rectory.

A woman is standing beside a mound of newly-turned earth, gazing down on it with white and sorrowful face. Her eyes turn from thence to the gables and towers of the Court, where they catch the dying glow of the reddened sky.

"How lonely he must be!" she says to herself. "How lonely!"

Great tears gather in her eyes as still with that intent gaze they watch the distant building—watch it as though they sought to pierce through stone walls and closed doors, and rest again in their remorseful tenderness on one face, hidden from her sight, but present in her memory as when last she read its sorrowful farewell.

The tears are on her lashes still, as a footstep echoes on the gravel-walk behind. They are there as she turns round and confronts the intruder on her solitude.

"Why—Tom!" she says, surprised.

A hand goes up to touch a cap, ragged no longer. A bright, honest face looks up to hers in undisguised delight.

"Thank you, ma'am—yes, ma'am, it's me," he answers, as if she might be in doubt on the subject. "I've just bin to speak to the sexton, ma'am, as Sir Ivor ordered. Your pardon, ma'am, are you a goin' up to the Court to see my master?"

A flood of scarlet rushes over the white face.

"I—oh no!" she answers hurriedly.

"I thought as how you might," the lad says, sinking his voice to lower tones as a troubled look comes over his face. "I wish someone would see him—someone as could do him good or cheer him. He's so changed, ma'am."

"He is in great grief," she remarks faintly, longing—oh, how wildly and vainly—that it were not so wrong and so impossible to follow the lad's simple wish, that only for one moment she might touch the hand and look on the face of this man who is so dear to her.

"Changed!" echoes Tom. "Aye, he is changed; but it ain't that I mean. Somethin's come to him worse than any grief, though he did grieve sorely for his mother, poor lady. But 'tis two days ago that the new trouble came. Oh, ma'am," he cries, coming a step nearer and speaking yet more earnestly in his great dread, "you and he was good friends, I know. Can't you do nothing for him? I don't know what to make of it. 'Tain't only a couple of days he said he was a going on the Continent, and I was to go with him. We was to travel about—rough it, so Sir Ivor said, and oh, ma'am, I was that pleased and honoured, and now—now he sends for me, and he says, 'Tom,' he says, 'my plans is all changed. I am a poor man, not a rich one. I'm going away all by myself. This place ain't mine at all, Tom,' he says. 'There's been a great deception and a great wrong. I'm not your master any longer, and I'm just as poor, Tom, as you was yourself when first I knew you.' There, ma'am, them's just his words, and I leave you to think if I wasn't knocked all of a heap when I heard them. Now, what does it all mean, that's what I wants to know?"

"Mean! I can't imagine!" exclaims Beryl Marsden. "He must be dreaming. Not master of the Court! Why, who is?"

"That's just what I ses," cries Tom triumphantly; "and all those lawyer chaps have been down a worriting and a puzzling their heads about it, and one of them ses, 'You stay here, Sir Ivor, until it's proved. It's a most mysterious affair.' But he says he won't stay, and oh, ma'am, if you were to see him, so white and so changed, and such an awful look upon his face, it would make your heart ache. I know it makes mine."

"But this is very mysterious!" she cries in agitation. "What can have happened? Mrs. Grant had no other son. Of course Sir Ivor is the rightful owner of the Court. Perhaps grief has affected his mind."

"I don't know," says Tom dismally; "he promised as how I was to go with him and now he ses I ain't, but all the same I means to follow wherever he goes," he adds, dropping his voice and glancing around. "'Tain't wages I wants. I'd serve him till I died; he was so good to me, he was, and I ain't a going to forget it."

"You're a good lad," says Beryl hastily. "Yes, don't leave him. He may want a true heart to serve him one day, and be very sure, Tom, your fidelity won't go unrewarded. Oh, I wish—I wish I knew what his trouble was," she cries passionately; "I wish I could help him."

"Why don't you go and ask him, ma'am?" suggests Tom. "He's lonely enough up there, only the lawyer chaps come, and they worrit him more than enough, I bet. Why don't you go, ma'am?"

"I—I can't," stammers Beryl hurriedly, as again that hot, shamed flush stains her white face. "I'm very, very sorry, Tom; you may tell him that—tell him it from me; but I can't say more, and I can't do anything. I wish to Heaven I could!"

"He was so good to the little gentleman," says Tom wistfully; "I seed him myself a nursin' and a watchin' him night after night. Seems queer to me that you, as is his mother, can't help my poor master even by a word. All his friends seems a turning their backs on him now. That's just what he said."

"Oh, hush—hush!" cries Beryl passionately; "you don't know what you're talking about. He—he will understand what I mean if you give him my message."

"I'll give it safe enough," says Tom, looking more and more puzzled; "seems to me, though, the quality has a mighty strange way of showin' friendship. If one of my sort's in trouble, neither man nor woman makes any sort of fuss 'bout going to them, if 'tis only to say they're sorry for 'em. I'm sure Sir Ivor would take it much kinder if you went to see him, 'stead of sending a message."

"Be silent!" she cries almost fiercely. "You forget yourself; you don't know what you say."

Tom shrinks back alarmed and abashed.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," he says. "No offence meant, I'm sure. If you'd seen my master as I've seen him, you'd feel sorry too. I didn't think you'd be angry if I told you."

"I'm not angry," she says, with a sound as of tears in her voice, and a look of passionate yearning in her eyes as they rest on the old Court's gabled roof. "You're a good boy—a faithful boy. You mean well, I know. But don't speak to me any more. I want to be alone. I—I came here to be alone." Then trying slowly and won-

Tom stares at her bewildered. Then trying slowly and wonderingly to take in the meaning of her words, he turns and goes away down the gravelled path, and the drooping branches of the trees fall over him, and hide him from her sight.

She makes no sound or movement till that solitary figure is visible no longer. Then her arms go up with a wild gesture, and she throws herself down on the cold clay of the new-made grave, sobbing as if her heart would break.

How long has she lain there—an hour?—two, three? Half a lifetime it seems to her, for sorrow comes with slow tread; 'tis only joy that passes by so quickly that the flying feet are gone ere we have felt quite sure of their presence. Be the time long or short, however, she is awakened to some consciousness of its existence at last by the touch of a hand on her shoulder, and springing to her feet she sees in the light of the cold wintry moon the face of the man for whose sake that hour of bitter grief has been passed.

Changed ! Oh, God, how changed ! she wildly thinks, reading its sorrowful lines, its anguish and pain, as only a woman's eyes can read the face of one she loves.

“Beryl!” he says hoarsely. “You here?”
Her pale face grows paler still. The hand she has raised to greet him falls listlessly by her side.

"Did I not love her also?" she says. "Was it wrong that I should come to her last resting-place?"

"Wrong!" So great a flood of joy lights his face and sweeps over his heart that it needs no words to say how little she need fear one word of accusation. "It was kind of you—very kind of you."

Then his voice breaks, and for a moment's fear-filled silence they stand and gaze into each other's eyes, as never had they thought to gaze again.

Quite suddenly the woman's pity bursts asunder the barrier of her self-control. It is not in her power to gaze on such a changed face unmoved.

"You have had great trouble. I—I heard it. If I say to you, I am sorry—"

But then her strength gives way. A burst of sobs escapes her breast.

"Oh, Ivor—Ivor!" she cries, "what is it? Can't you tell me?"
His face grows white as death, and his strong frame trembles like a leaf.

"I can tell you, if you wish," he says hoarsely; "you will hear it soon enough. It is only that I am a nameless beggar, instead of being what—I have always thought myself."

"I can't understand," she says brokenly. "It isn't true. You—of all men."

"Even I—of all men," he echoes. "Times are changed since I was the idle fool whom you honoured with the title of 'My Lord Conceit.'" His words came sharp and shrill across the

"Don't!" she cries, her words cutting sharp and shrill across the still night air. "For Heaven's sake spare me such memories. What do you mean? What is this mystery? I—I can't understand it."

do you mean? What is this mystery? I—I can't understand it."

"It is very simple," he said. "My mother told me nothing of her early life, but at her death I discovered that my father was not her first husband. As a girl, she had been at a school in France. There, at the age of sixteen, she fell in love, or imagined herself in love, with a man who appealed to her romantic youth with a story of banishment, chivalry, adverse fortune—Heaven knows what. He really was an Italian who taught singing at the school. She fled with him, and they were married. She was most unhappy. Two years later he deserted her. The story was hushed up by her parents. No one knew of it. Soon after, came news of this man's death. He had been wrecked while crossing in a schooner from Naples. The news was in all the Italian journals, and her father took all possible precautions to have it verified. Am I wearying you? I will make the story as brief as possible. About that time she met my father, Sir Hector's younger brother. He fell madly in love with her, and her parents were eager for her acceptance of him. This time all was prosperous, clear, satisfactory. They were married at the English embassy in Rome. A year after I was born. We came over to England and lived at the Court. My father died when I was still a child, and our home was here, as you know."

She looked up at the weariness and suffering in his

He paused. She looked up at the weariness and suffering in his face, and marvelled what had yet to come.

"How or when she discovered that she had been deceived I cannot tell," he went on. "But she did discover it, and determined to keep her secret, and bring me up in ignorance of the fact that I was a usurper here. Someone—a spy, who makes it his business to trade on family misfortunes, found out that, instead of dying when it was supposed, her first husband escaped from the wreck, took arms under Victor Emmanuel, and was shot at the battle of Solferino two years later. Consequently her marriage with my father was illegal, and— You don't need me to say more, Beryl, do you?"

His voice sounded choked. So bitter it was to him to put his shame into words for her—for the woman in whose sight he would have stood in honour.

Her hands went out to clasp his own. In this moment she remembered nothing save that he was in trouble, and she so longed to comfort him.

"The shame cannot touch you," she cried. "Do not take it to heart like this. After all, the proofs may be wrong. Who brought them? Who knows the story?"

"Count Savona."

She recoiled suddenly. Her eyes grew dark with wrath.

"He! That coward—that traitor! Oh, Ivor, don't believe him! He's a liar, a liar, a liar! I am sure it is he!"

"He! That coward—that traitor! Oh, Ivor, don't believe him! Don't accept this wrong at his hands. It is all a lie—I am sure it is!"

He shook his head sadly. "My dear, it is the bitter truth. The papers I discovered prove that."

She was silent. What could she say? What could she do? Knowing how proud, and true, and honourable he was, she could read only too plainly the suffering and agony this news had brought; but comfort—what comfort lay in any words to bring him even brief relief from the shame that filled his whole life?

"It was a dreadful blow," he said at last. "I think it almost stunned me. I—I am glad my poor uncle died in ignorance of it. He was so fond of me always, and he used to tell me all his plans, and all he would wish me to do here; and, after all, I have no more right to the Court and its surroundings than the veriest beggar in the streets."

"How can you bear it?" she almost sobbed.

"I have had almost as hard a thing to bear before," he said simply. "I suppose I am getting used to trouble now. Heaven knows I've had some hard strokes lately."

"And what are you going to do?" she asked.

"I leave here to-morrow. I have told the lawyers the facts of the case, and they don't see any loophole out of it. The only difficulty is to find who is the next heir to the property. The direct line fails with me—without me, I should say," he added bitterly.

"It seems hard to trace back the remote branch who will hold its honours. As for myself, I shall enlist, I think, under a foreign

"Don't talk so bitterly," she entreated. "It is not like you to be hopeless. Have you—have you seen Savona since this discovery?"

"Great Heaven!" he cried hoarsely, "I forgot. In all my own trouble, I forgot that his villainy could touch you also. I can't do anything for him now."

"What promise?" she asked sternly. "You would not buy his silence for—for my sake. Oh, Ivor, do not tell me that."
